Oral Answers to Questions

WORK AND PENSIONS

Incapacity Benefit

1. Mr. Harold Best (Leeds, North-West) (Lab): If he will make a statement on plans for incapacity benefit. [190389]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): Most people who claim incapacity benefit want to work and we are determined to do more to address the challenge of inactivity and ensure that those who can return to work are given the right medical and employment support to do so. We are offering that support through our flagship reform programme, pathways to work. I can announce today that there are already extremely encouraging signs of success, with pathways areas showing twice the improvement in job entries of that in the rest of the country.

As we go forward, we shall continue to work with the health service, the voluntary sector and employers to help more people to return to and remain in work and to deliver our commitment of work for those who can and security for those who cannot.

Mr. Best: I am sure that my right hon. Friend agrees that the introduction of incapacity benefit brought much relief to people who had hitherto suffered unnecessarily. Can he give those same good people an assurance that the Government have no plans to introduce a cut to either their incapacity benefit or their rights to it?

Alan Johnson: I assure my hon. Friend that we have no such plans. Indeed, the purpose of the pathways to work experiment is to concentrate on giving help and assistance that people on incapacity benefit have not previously received. They have previously been considered to be passive recipients of benefits and expected to go away and not come back. In pathways to work, we have found that, if they get help through rehabilitation and help into work, they take the opportunities. That is why the early signs from the pathways experiment are so encouraging.

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): In welcoming the Secretary of State to his new position, I am sure that I reflect opinion from all parties when I acknowledge his predecessor's work. We are grateful for that and wish him well.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State mentioned rehabilitation because 50 per cent. of the stock of people on incapacity benefit are over 50. It seems to me—international experience confirms it—that a reinvigorated, activated rehabilitation service can help many of those people back to work and provide a direction that they want to take.

Alan Johnson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments and associate myself with his remarks. My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) was a first-class, splendid Secretary of State and I am proud to be able to pick up some of the work that he set in train.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would be interested in another statistic from the early days of the pathway. Although the experiment is for those in their first year on incapacity benefit, we have found many people who have been on incapacity benefit for longer than a year—and therefore have no obligation to become involved—knocking on the door of Jobcentre Plus to become involved. That demonstrates and underlines his point.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend and other hon. Members for their kind remarks. I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his appointment and wish him every success as Secretary of State. Does he agree that the early success of the pathways to work pilots owes a great deal to the path-breaking close collaboration between Jobcentre Plus, the national health service, the voluntary sector and the new deal for disabled people? Does he also agree that the pilots point the way forward in the direction of further reform?

Alan Johnson: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend. Indeed, I believe that the programme will be known as the Andrew Smith pathways to work scheme. When we consider the exciting prospects, the co-operation between the health service and the excellent personal advisers, who are well trained to do the job, gives the scheme a new dimension. I saw the programme in action in Gateshead. Those developments and initiatives would be under threat if we privatised the whole Jobcentre Plus service. The staff should be congratulated and I associate myself with my right hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): To follow the question of the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Mr. Best), it has been reported that the Government have a "four year plan to put strict time limits on incapacity benefit".

Can the Secretary of State rule out putting time limits on present or future payments of incapacity benefit or other related benefits?

Alan Johnson: I saw some of those press reports on the first weekend that I took on the job. None of them is based on fact. I am not in the business of ruling anything in or out. I am four weeks into the job and carefully considering how we take the matter forward. However, I stress that any longer-term reform to incapacity benefit has to build on our existing approach in pathways to work and ensure that those who are most seriously sick and disabled receive the security to which they have a right and that they deserve.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that, in Glasgow, there are more than 60,000 incapacity benefit claimants, which means that, among people of working age, the ratio of those working to those out of work is less than 2:1. Does he agree that that situation is unacceptable and that, to ensure the future prosperity of Glasgow, it is essential that we reduce the total number of people on incapacity benefits?

Alan Johnson: I agree with my hon. Friend. That group of people, not very charmingly called "the stock", were just left. There was a lot of attention on the flow of people coming on to incapacity benefit, but not much was paid to giving those people the help that they needed and asked for—nine out of 10 say that they want to get back into work. It is a stunning fact that, if someone is on incapacity benefit for a year, they will be on it for eight years. If they are on it for two years, they will die or retire on it. We must work harder to change that situation, which is why the pathways to work experiment is vital to the future of this important issue.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I too welcome the Secretary of State to his new role and wish him well. This morning, the Prime Minister referred to 1 million people being on incapacity benefit wanting to work. Can the Secretary of State confirm that that is the same 1 million people whom the Department that he leads was talking about six years ago? Does not that show how little progress has been made? Will he condemn any rhetoric that implies that the majority of people on incapacity benefit are skivers or malingerers? Actually, most of them want to work. Will he ensure that that rhetoric is not used? Will he look at the demand side? Too often, in many places, it is not that people do not want to work but that employers do not want to take them on. What is he doing to encourage employers to take on people on incapacity benefit?

Alan Johnson: I do not know of anyone on the Labour Benches ever using the kind of terms that the hon. Gentleman mentioned and I am not about to refute comments that I have not made. I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Mr. Best) that nine out of 10 people on incapacity benefit want to work. All the evidence from the pathways to work experiment reinforces that message.

The hon. Gentleman raised an important point about those coming on to incapacity benefit directly from the workplace—a third of incapacity benefit recipients come straight from work. I think, and the Health and Safety Executive agrees, that there is more that we could do in that regard, but all our efforts must be put into helping those who are on incapacity benefit. They sometimes feel, as one person to whom I spoke who was severely disabled eloquently put it, that they are left lying in a ditch and after a while the ditch becomes very comfortable. That is an issue that we must help them with. I do not know what petty political point the hon. Gentleman was trying to make but I certainly will not be involved in any attempts to stigmatise people on incapacity benefit.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I too welcome the Secretary of State to his position. Has he had time yet to look at the incapacity benefit figures for Birkenhead? Is he aware that the vast majority of people who claim incapacity benefit in the town joined the ranks of claimants from industrial injury, which then became a disability and many of them now have a mental disability? Does not that underscore the importance of joined-up government, so that the national health service responds quickly to people who have injuries before they get down that track? Does he accept that, as we begin to debate pension reform, and if the Government are thinking in the longer term of raising the retirement age, many of our constituents will never reach that age, as they will simply be worn out at work? For them, we must have a new robust incapacity benefit paid at a generous level.

Alan Johnson: I assure my right hon. Friend that I have looked at everything to do with the constituency of Birkenhead since I got this job. I cannot say that I have committed all the figures to memory yet. He makes an important point, which is at the heart of the debate: how do we ensure that we provide assistance, in the new world we are in, to those people, many of whom went on to incapacity benefit during the dark years of the 1980s and early 1990s, when the number of people on the benefit trebled from 700,000 to 2.6 million? Those people were used conveniently to try to keep the unemployment figures down. We now have high employment and low unemployment, which is why we need to turn our attention to this group of people. We need to join up government and to join up the issues affecting incapacity benefit and pensions. My right hon. Friend is absolutely right in his remarks.

Jobcentre Plus

4. Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): When he expects the Jobcentre Plus roll-out programme for new offices to be completed. [190394]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): Jobcentre Plus is central to this Government's strategy to deliver full employment in every region and to modernise welfare delivery. Our roll-out programme is progressing well, with over 530 new offices already in operation. The roll-out programme will be complete by April 2006—on time and on budget.

Mr. Pike: My right hon. Friend knows that I am a strong supporter of the Jobcentre Plus concept, because it provides a much better service to the public whom it serves. It works far better than the old system. In the final part of his answer, he said that the programme would be achieved on time, so can he assure me that the Jobcentre Plus office in Burnley will be open by the early part of 2006?

Alan Johnson: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. My understanding is that the building of the new Jobcentre Plus office in Burnley will commence construction in February 2005 and be completed in 2006.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I had the great pleasure during the recess of opening the Jobcentre Plus office in Malton in my constituency and I pay tribute to the work of staff there. I want to ask the Secretary of State two questions. First, will he confirm that those offices will be able to give face-to-face interviews, which are needed from time to time by people who find it difficult to understand the benefits to which they are entitled? They need to see someone rather than be dealt with over the telephone.

Secondly, does the Secretary of State agree that the success of the programme in linking at least two Government Departments depends on a partnership between employers—particularly small and medium-sized enterprises, which are the providers of many of the jobs in our constituencies—the Department and, more particularly, training providers? Will he confirm that private and voluntary sector providers, which have a better success rate at getting people back into work through training, will be encouraged to take part in the process?

Alan Johnson: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman attended the opening of his Jobcentre Plus and that he appears to be such a fan of the Jobcentre Plus service, but I suggest that he has a word with some of his Front Benchers about the importance of maintaining that important service. He is right about the role of the voluntary and private sectors. Indeed, a third of the services are provided through that route at the moment. However, I find it difficult to comprehend the "public sector bad, private sector good" philosophy that says that the whole lot has to be privatised to make it effective. I can also reassure him that personal counselling will be available, which is why we are increasing the number of personal counsellors by 10,000 over the next few years. Although the internet and telephone service is important, face-to-face contact is also crucial. I can also confirm that the partnership with employers is probably one of the most exciting aspects of the Jobcentre Plus programme.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central) (Lab): I am fortunate that my constituency has one of the most enterprising, innovative and effective Jobcentre Plus programmes in the country. I think that I am right in saying that the Grampian district was the first service to be awarded the charter mark last year. The Secretary of State made an announcement on 16 September about the centralisation of benefit processing. We in the north of Scotland were a wee bit surprised to see that Aberdeen was not going to have a processing centre.

In answering the last question, my right hon. Friend mentioned the importance of face-to-face contact, but that is going to be taken away from my constituents, particularly the most vulnerable ones. I ask him to reconsider that gap. We must be the only district in Scotland that will not have a benefit processing centre in the area. That will be a severe disadvantage to my constituents and to others in the area.

Alan Johnson: I recognise the excellent service offered in the Grampian region and I understand the sensitivities around the issue. I can give my hon. Friend an assurance that the district managers have made it clear to me that they will get involved in discussions with concerned MPs. That is in addition to other lines of communication. I am perfectly happy to meet colleagues on this matter. I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand that merging the Employment Service and the Benefits Agency—thereby using some £5 billion of investment in the DWP in the past few years to make the service better and to improve the technology available—involves some tensions, in the sense that we need to prioritise the benefit centres that we are opening. Having said that, I will think again about my hon. Friend's proposal and meet him and any other concerned MPs to discuss it.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): Will the Secretary of State note that, when the new offices are rolled out, it would be extremely desirable for my constituents to have a one-stop shop for their various welfare and benefit services and assistance, rather than having to go into Birmingham for some of them? That would establish a state of grace in Solihull, and I thank the Secretary of State in anticipation if he thinks that a reasonable chance exists of that happening.

Alan Johnson: Establishing a state of grace in Solihull is one of my political priorities and I am very willing to listen to the hon. Gentleman's representations.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The Rhondda has been part of the Bridgend pilot for Jobcentre Plus roll-out, which has been phenomenally successful, especially in Tonypandy, and a brand new office is being built in Porth. The staff have done a very good job, but many are nervous about change in terms of where they will be working; for example, the back office is moving out of the Rhondda to Merthyr Tydfil or Swansea. Will the Secretary of State look at what can be done to ensure that more DWP jobs are located in some of the poorest constituencies in the land, such as the Rhondda?

Alan Johnson: I will certainly look at that issue. In my four weeks in this job, I have been extremely impressed by the work and dedication of DWP staff. This is a difficult time for them, but they will understand that, although we are reducing back-office personnel by 50 per cent., we are also increasing the number of front-office personal advisers by 80 per cent. We want to do that by looking at the Lyons philosophy—a philosophy that I know well through my role as MP for Hull, West and Hessle—which is concerned with trying to get such jobs into the poorest areas. I shall certainly take cognisance of the point that my hon. Friend makes.

Access to Work Scheme

5. Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the access to work scheme for people with disabilities; and how many individuals have benefited from the scheme and gone on to permanent paid employment. [190395]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): Access to work helps disabled people enter into or retain paid work by assisting with the cost of equipment, adaptations, travel and communication support. Since 1997, we have almost trebled the number of people helped, and more than trebled the budget spend.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am among those UK employers who have actually taken advantage of the access to work scheme. It is outstanding, and may I suggest that those hon. Members who have not looked at the scheme do so, because it provides an opportunity to bring people with various disabilities into the workplace? However, its administration remains a significant challenge on Merseyside. What is being done to make it more effective and efficient?

Maria Eagle: I congratulate my hon. Friend, who is well known for putting her money where her mouth is. She has a fine record in supporting disabled people—not just with words but with deeds. I know that her experience with her own member of staff has shown that the scheme's administration has given rise to some confusion and delay, and I admit that not all our attempts to process access to work payments and provide support are as swift as they might be. However, in Merseyside and the north-west we managed to get support in place for some 87.5 per cent. of such cases, which is the target figure. My hon. Friend will doubtless accept that assessing need and finding the right kind of equipment, support and help often give rise to difficulties, because such need varies for every person. However, we aspire to improve the service's administration. We have already regionalised it, and improved the standard of assistance and the speed with which it can be put in place, but we aspire to do more.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Will the Minister double-check the implications of the national minimum wage rules for work experience schemes for those with learning disabilities? Earlier this year, I was approached by a constituent who told me that one such scheme had to be abandoned because the organisation responsible for it was forced to follow national minimum wage guidelines. As a result, the whole nature and economics of the scheme changed. The Minister will doubtless agree that such schemes are essential and worth while, and that we do not want them to be obstructed because of rules that apply to a different part of the labour force.

Maria Eagle: I am very much in favour of people with learning disabilities, who are some of the most disadvantaged people in the labour market, being given every chance to work like anybody else, but that requires that they also be given the chance to earn a proper wage. I would not suggest for one moment that it would be appropriate to abandon the national minimum wage for those with learning disabilities. I am happy to look into the particular instance that the hon. Gentleman raises, because I know that the interaction between the benefit rules and such regulations as the permitted work rules and benefit disregards can sometimes appear to be a disincentive to work. I am aware that that is an issue that needs further work, but the answer cannot be to disadvantage disabled people in the labour market by undercutting the national minimum wage. I would not approve of that.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Access to work is very successful and, at long last, many more employers are beginning to hear about it and to use the scheme. If my hon. Friend looks at the administration of the scheme, will she consider examples in which employers employ sub-contractors or the self-employed, especially in the media and on short-term contracts? The employers are happy to pay for the supply of the equipment, but they need advice. The delays in obtaining the advice means that, by the time that it arrives, the person has moved on or the contract has already been fulfilled. In such circumstances, it is often better for disabled people to be self-employed and retain flexibility, but it is difficult for the employer to obtain advice quickly to allow them to employ a disabled person.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend has a point in the sense that it is often difficult to get access-to-work help in place in time for very short-term contracts. The scheme has perhaps been more designed to support permanent full-time work, rather than short-term jumping around from job to job. However, it is important not to underestimate the difficulties that assessment itself can bring. Not every disabled person with a particular condition is easily assessed to determine what help they need. It is a reflection of the success in more disabled people coming into the labour market, which I welcome, that we now sometimes have difficulties in finding appropriate agencies to assess needs and I agree that we need to look more closely at that problem.

State Pension

6. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): What representations he has received from the National Pensioners Convention concerning the level of the state pension. [190396]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): A copy of the National Pensioners Convention "Pensioners Manifesto" was received earlier this year. The Government share its aims of securing dignity and fulfilment for pensioners.

The system that we have in place for today's pensioners is balanced, fair and sustainable, and targets money on the poorest who need it most. In addition, all pensioners have benefited from a 7 per cent. real-terms increase in the level of their basic state pension between April 2000 and April 2004.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will my right hon. Friend meet the National Pensioners Convention to discuss its aims that the state pension should become a major part of the income of retired people and that the calculation of the state pension should be linked to the increase in earnings, starting from a state pension that is the equivalent of the minimum income guarantee, so that pensioners get a substantial increase? In advance of the Turner report tomorrow, does he recognise that the state pension is the best hedge against poverty for older people, rather than the vagaries of the stock market?

Alan Johnson: I will be delighted to meet the National Pensioners Convention to take forward a discussion that we have already begun, because I went to its reception at party conference a couple of weeks ago. It is important that we make it clear that the basic state pension is a central part of pension income. When we came into government, we had a crisis in which millions of pensioners were in abject poverty. It is dealing with that issue that is still a priority. It might not make the Sunday colour supplements or the leisure and style magazines, but it is crucial to millions of our constituents and it is central to how we take the debate forward.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept the fact that, as so many of the costs that pensioners face, especially council tax, have risen by much more than the basic state pension, roughly half our pensioners are left on means-tested benefits? A very large number of people who are coming up to retirement are asking what possible point there is in saving. By the time they have paid tax and seen the withdrawal of various benefits, including council tax benefit and housing benefit as well pension credit, there will be no extra benefit in self-provision or in people saving for their retirement.

Alan Johnson: I find that a confusing argument. First, we are providing an extra £100 because of the specific problems of council tax payments this year. We also found, when getting people on to pension credit, that a large number of them were entitled to housing benefit and council tax benefit, so as a result there has been an added bonus, through helping those people, too.

The confusing part of the argument is that it is almost as if we would be better off saying to pensioners in abject poverty, "I'm sorry, but rather than confuse you or add complexities to the pension system, we are going to leave you in abject poverty." We had to do something about that and we are right to continue to pursue it as a principal priority.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Can the Secretary of State assure me that he will not increase the state pension by cutting targeted help to the poorest families in our community? Can he also assure me that he will ignore comments from the Opposition, who seem to ignore the poorest pensioners in Britain?

Alan Johnson: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. It is important to remember that we have concentrated on the poorest pensioners, but as I said in my answer all pensioners have received a real-terms increase, above inflation, of £5 a week. They have had the winter fuel allowance and the free TV licence, which are universal. It would have cost us £3 billion to link pensions with earnings, but we have actually spent £5 billion on all pensioners universally—not just the poorest pensioners but right across the board. It is important to keep that in mind when we look at the balance that we have struck on pensioners' incomes.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Secretary of State prayed in aid the money given to some pensioners to offset council tax increases, but of course that was for one year only. As no one expects council tax to go down next year, will he say that they will receive that money again or do they face a double whammy—increased council tax and a reduction of £100?

Alan Johnson: I shall not make policy on the hoof. The £100 for this year was to address a specific issue, which we may seek to address next year as well. The basic issue relating to pension credit and means-testing is how we can lift the poorest pensioners to a level where they can live a life of security and decency. That is why targeting the resources is so important.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): Thousands of my constituents in receipt of pension credit have an average award of £66 a week, among the highest in the country. The reason that it is among the highest is because I have such a high proportion of pensioners who are not entitled to the full basic state pension. In reviewing future developments, and accepting that the basic state pension must be a cornerstone of post-retirement entitlement for future pensioners, will my right hon. Friend ensure that the position of people who have not reached the full basic pension entitlement—particularly women—will be protected?

Alan Johnson: I know my hon. Friend's constituency well. I was born there and lived there for 19 years. I understand why she quoted a figure of £66 a week. The average for the country is £41, with more than £1,000 being paid in arrears. My hon. Friend points out one of the problems with saying that the magic bullet solution would be simply to link the basic state pension to earnings, because that would do little for the women to whom she referred, who do not even have the national insurance contributions to get the basic state pension in the first place. That is another area to which we should pay more attention. My predecessor was certainly looking into it and I shall carry on that work.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I, too, welcome the new Secretary of State to his post. I very much appreciated the decency and courtesy of his predecessor; it is good to see the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) in the Chamber today.

The Secretary of State faces a crucial strategic decision, which he will have to take early in his time as Secretary of State. Does he envisage for the foreseeable future a large number of pensioners dependent on income-related benefits, or is he willing to consider reform of the state system and, in some form or other, increasing the value of the basic pension so that fewer pensioners need to claim income-related benefits?

Alan Johnson: I wonder where anyone has ever got the notion that we have said that the basic state pension must be preserved in aspic, frozen and kept the same into the future. I shall come back to that point in just a second.

This is the issue for the hon. Gentleman: I heard him say on the radio this morning that the Conservative party has been part of shaping the consensus that the basic state pension should increase. Once upon a time, that party proposed radical, cutting-edge ideas. Now, it wants to take a little bit of credit for helping to shape a consensus. That shows where the Tory party has gone. Achieving that consensus is easy: anyone could go into the Dog and Duck in Havant and ask, "Do you believe that the basic state pension ought to be increased?" This is pretty mind-numbing stuff. How many people would say no? People will very easily achieve a consensus on whether to increase the basic state pension.

The real question that the Government must face in an era of people living longer, lower birth rates and a new situation developing in the next few years is how we can have the basic state pension at the core of pension provision, how we can ensure that other provision is available because people will not retire comfortably on a basic state pension alone, and how we can also look after the poorest pensioners. That is the nub of the argument about means-testing. Means-testing is supposed to be deeply sinful. It is pensioner poverty that is deeply sinful. We could not go to the pensioners who were in abject poverty when we came to government and advise them to go to an actuary, to look at how much they were saving, and to wait for the consensus on the future of pensions to emerge. We had to give them immediate help, and the fact that we have lifted two thirds of pensioners out of abject poverty and the fact that now, for the first time in generations, pensioners are less likely to be in poverty than those in any other strata of society is crucial.

Mr. Willetts: I always enjoy exchanges with successive Secretaries of State, but it is always better if we can keep up the pace just a bit, rather than having long speeches.

May I tell the Secretary of State that what is really sinful is that 1.7 million pensioners are entitled to the pension credit but are not claiming it because they are put off by the system? I do not know why he was so sniffy about consensus. The Prime Minister said this morning that he wants consensus on pensions. We are offering him consensus on pensions, alongside the National Association of Pension Funds, Age Concern and many people of all parties, and saying, "Reform the state pension", rather than defending the mass means-testing of pensioners. Is the Secretary of State really going to spend the next the six or eight months until the election defending mass means-testing? If he thought that defending the Government's higher education policy was difficult, he will find that one hell of a sight harder.

Alan Johnson: I will try to be more pithy. I entirely accept the point that the hon. Gentleman makes about the pensioners who are entitled to pension credit but not taking it up. We must work harder. Although we are the first Government ever to set a target for people claiming benefits and we are doing very well on that target, there is more to do. But that is a completely different argument from criticising the Government for concentrating on the poorest pensioners. If we had tried to put all the money into the basic state pension, every pensioner would have got £11 more; the poorest pensioners would have got £30 less a week, even with £11 on the basic state pension. That is why I make the point that that is a crucial part of our policy. Means-testing is not the only part of our policy, but it is a crucial part of our policy, when we are dealing with the legacy of pensioners in abject poverty that we found when we came into government in 1997.

Jobcentre Plus

7. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What assessment he has made of the likely changes in demand for jobcentre services over the next two years. [190397]

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the new Jobcentre Plus services have been rolled out already in Southend, and my assessment of future use is quite simple: we will offer our services outside jobcentres, such as in local community surgeries and at shared sites with local authorities. We will use new technology, such as job points, call centres and the internet. Those innovative approaches will enable people to gain access to many of our services without having to call at a Jobcentre Plus office.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Have the Government assessed whether the unemployment figures are likely to increase or decrease over the next two years, and in particular, is the Minister aware of the growing concern about the unreliability of official statistics, observing for example that we now have a missing million young people who are not at work, in education, in training or on benefits, and who therefore do not appear in the figures?

Jane Kennedy: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in these issues, and he will be aware of the success of the Government's policies and the new deal in reducing unemployment to the lowest level of any European country and in increasing the employment rate to a level of which we can all be proud. We are refocusing services through Jobcentre Plus precisely to help the people who face the greater barriers to getting back to work. He is right that we must bear in mind all the time our efforts to help everybody to share in the wealth from which we all benefit, through the growth in the economy achieved by this Government.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to consider the representations made by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) and me about the appalling delays in the processing of benefit claims and claims for jobseeker's allowance in Berkshire? Given that her officials are blaming staff shortages for the problems, what plans does she have to improve jobcentre services over the next two years?

Jane Kennedy: I am sorry to hear about those concerns, and I will be more than happy to meet my hon. Friend and his colleagues if they want to come and talk to me about the problems to which he referred.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): Can the Minister answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor)? What has happened to the million people who seem to be missing from the official statistics?

Jane Kennedy: The figures to which the hon. Gentleman refers are fictitious. The fact is that we now have in Great Britain the lowest level of unemployment in recent history and the highest level of employment of any country in the western world. I do not recognise the figures to which he refers and I dismiss the criticism that he raises.

Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): The Minister will be aware that there are serious concerns about the roll-out of Jobcentre Plus in Lanarkshire. We greatly value in Cumbernauld the 1,000-plus jobs in the Inland Revenue—they are really important to us—but there are serious concerns about the proposal to close both the Kilsyth and the Cumbernauld benefit offices, with the loss of some 70 jobs. Will she guarantee that the trade unions and the work force will be involved in deciding the way forward, that there will be an improved service to my constituents, and that there will be a serious look at how those who cannot transfer to alternative civil service jobs will be compensated?

Jane Kennedy: I am aware of the concerns of my hon. Friend and her Lanarkshire colleagues. If they want to raise particular concerns, I will be happy to meet them. She will have heard my right hon. Friend saying that district managers stand ready to discuss the arrangements with local Members of Parliament, and of course I assure her that the trade unions are consulted throughout the process.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Sadly, my constituents are about to lose their jobcentre in Faversham. In my discussions with the Minister's officials, two problems in particular have come to light. First, there has been a sharp rise in the number of people claiming disability allowance, who very much regard the jobcentre as their spiritual home. Secondly, although the number claiming jobseeker's allowance is relatively small, those are precisely the people who find it difficult to access all the new facilities that she mentioned. Can she do anything to ensure that those factors are considered again before the jobcentre is closed?

Jane Kennedy: I will look at the specific circumstances that the hon. Gentleman raises regarding his constituency. The reform of the Employment Service and the Benefits Agency was clearly an effort to bring about focused help centred on delivering as much support as possible for those people who face the greatest difficulty getting back to work after periods of unemployment. I shall examine the difficulties that he raised regarding his constituency.

Youth Unemployment (Ipswich)

8. Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the level of long-term youth unemployment in Ipswich. [190398]

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): There are currently 120 young people in Ipswich between the ages of 18 and 24 who have been unemployed for more than six months, which is a reduction of 63 per cent. since 1997 and of more than 29 per cent. over just the last year.

Mr. Mole: Does the Minister agree that that downward trend would be unlikely to continue if the new deal were abolished?

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Scrapping the new deal would have a catastrophic effect on the stability of the labour market, and we know that it has had unprecedented success in bringing about the greater flexibility that has helped to fuel the economic growth on which our success is founded. Independent evaluation has found that youth unemployment would have been almost twice as high without the new deal for young people, and it has increased our gross domestic product by £500 million a year.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): May I congratulate Fox's Marina Ipswich Ltd. in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Mole) on joining in with an initiative that took place last Saturday in and around my constituency, alongside the Prince's Trust, called "Get Into the Marine Industry"? Stena Line, DFDS Seaways, the Harwich Haven Authority, Trinity House and, of course, Fox's Marina joined in the project. While youth unemployment in my constituency has fallen by 50 per cent., there is still a long way to go. Does the Minister agree that such initiatives and the new deal need to be encouraged, and that now is not the time to scrap them?

Jane Kennedy: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. Whether judged by their record or plans, the Conservatives are the party of mass unemployment. They believed that unemployment was a price worth paying, but I assure him that a Labour Government—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Small Businesses (Health and Safety)

9. Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): What steps he is taking to encourage the provision of health and safety advice in small and medium-sized firms. [190399]

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): It is 30 years since the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 came into force and the Health and Safety Executive was created. Since then, workplace fatalities in Britain have fallen by 70 per cent. and we now have one of the best records on workplace health and safety in the world. The Health and Safety Executive offers advice and support to all types of businesses. In particular, we have developed an occupational health, safety and rehabilitation model that supports small businesses, which we will be piloting shortly in the construction industry.

Kevin Brennan: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does she agree that one of the best ways to improve the record on health and safety in small and medium-sized enterprises is by encouraging the membership and recognition of trade unions? She mentioned the construction industry, which still has a record of which we cannot be proud, so will she praise the efforts of the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, the construction workers' union, and tell the House something about what she will do to try to encourage trade union involvement in promoting health and safety at work?

Jane Kennedy: I associate myself with my hon. Friend's words about the importance of trade union representation in the workplace. We share the concerns of the Health and Safety Commission that too few workers are consulted on, or involved in, health and safety. The aim of the worker safety adviser scheme is that projects that we will develop and pilot shortly will facilitate worker involvement in health and safety, even in workplaces in which there is no formal trade union organisation. We will bring the pilot forward shortly and have committed £3 million over a three-year period to fund the project. I am delighted to be able to look forward to launching the pilot.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I know that the Minister is aware of widespread concern among businesses in the outdoor activity and leisure sector about the possible health and safety impact of the new "work at heights" directive. More than 40 respected organisations from throughout the sector have come together to suggest an alternative regulatory approach to the one currently proposed by the Health and Safety Commission. Will she assure me that she will support such an approach, which would ensure that professionals whose lives depend on their safety judgments would continue to have the final say on safety in their businesses, thus avoiding the threats to businesses in the industry and the nonsense inherent in the directive?

Jane Kennedy: I am very impressed by the safety record of the industry, which the hon. Gentleman rightly brings to the attention of the House. He will know that we had a useful meeting just before the summer at which we discussed the issues in depth. The Health and Safety Executive continues to consider the issues that he, other colleagues in the House, and representatives of the industry raised. We have not yet resolved everything that was raised, but we are working hard to do so, conscious of the need to do that before the directive takes effect.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Rather than allowing employers to have the last word on what is good and bad in health and safety, will my right hon. Friend accept that there are many very bad employers and that we need the Health and Safety Executive not only to issue advice to the good employers, but to increase prosecutions of the rogues, to ensure that the strong lesson goes out that breaching the health and safety of employees and the public will be met by penal sanctions?

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend is right. Enforcement is, and will continue to be, a very important role of the HSE. However, he will know that small businesses account for more than 90 per cent. of companies. As they are not a single group, the HSE is using a wide variety of routes to target different audiences. That is the right approach. Enforcement is important, but encouragement and persuasion are also important tools. The development of worker safety advisers will allow the HSE to bring together employers and employees in the partnership that is required if we are to continue to have a good record on health and safety in our workplaces.

Pensions (Means-testing)

10. Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): What assessment he has made of the impact of means-testing on people's willingness to save for pensions. [190400]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): Eligibility for income-related benefits is one of many factors which may influence willingness to save. The issue of incentives, and the role of taxes and benefits within it, is a complex one. We have established the independent Pensions Commission, which will be publishing its interim report tomorrow, providing a thorough analysis of the UK pensions system, including a review of long-term savings. Meanwhile, we have already taken action to tackle poverty and reward savings for today's pensioners through pension credit.

Mr. Lilley: May I, through the Minister, congratulate the Secretary of State on taking on one of the most important jobs in government, and wish him well?

The Minister will know that many financial advisers are worried that they will be guilty of mis-selling if they advise people on average or below average earnings to save, because their savings will not just bear the pensions tax, but result in their losing 40p in every pound of extra pension that they get through the loss of means-tested benefits? Will he, either now or in writing subsequently, give me an unequivocal assurance that no financial adviser who advises people to save will be guilty of mis-selling if those people lose means-tested benefits?

Malcolm Wicks: I am not responsible for financial advisers, and I am very grateful that that is the case. As a previous Secretary of State for Social Security, the right hon. Gentleman presided over a system that knocked off any savings, pound for pound, against income support. We are the Administration who recognise the importance of savings and have introduced a savings credit. Moreover, under income support in those days, someone was expected to live on £69 a week. The minimum income for a single person is now £105 a week. I am proud of our record.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend accept that those of us who have spoken with pensioners in receipt of the pension credit found it the most positive and encouraging conversation that we had over the past year? These people typically receive £42 a week, which is the difference between living with dignity or living with poverty. Does he accept that the Government should be praised, not criticised, for providing additional help to those who previously got none? Whatever arguments are produced by Mr. Adair Turner tomorrow to encourage the working population to save, this Government should not accept that that will be encouraged by denying help to the current generation of pensioners who need help now and who are entitled to get it.

Malcolm Wicks: I thank my right hon. Friend for those remarks, not least because many of our elders who are the most hard pressed and the poorest, and who are often women, do not have an organisation to speak for them, and we need to listen to those silent voices. It is no coincidence that of the 3 million-plus individuals who receive pension credit, 2 million are women. Why? Because, as the Secretary of State said, they do not have full national insurance contribution records and have not had the opportunity, because of caring for their children, to have occupational pensions. This is an important gender issue. Pension credit is a success in tackling pensioner poverty.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I wonder whether the Minister has seen the recent Association of British Insurers survey, which shows that 50 per cent. of people who responded said that they would increase their saving for retirement if means-testing were reduced. Can he really defend a system under which more than half of pensioners are subject to means-testing—that proportion is set to rise inexorably—and 1.7 million of the poorest pensioners are not even claiming pension credit a year after its introduction?

Malcolm Wicks: It will be a curious message to send out in the springtime, or whenever, that the Conservative party will take away from 3 million-plus individuals—more by then—their pension credit, which is so important to the hard-pressed and particularly to women. We are determined that more and more people should receive pension credit, because it is a success. It has an important role to play in the development of a state pension system—a system which I hope, with the development of occupational pensions and in other ways, will see more people retiring on incomes above income-tested levels.

Mr. Waterson: May I assure the Minister that we have no intention of scrapping pension credit, and no pensioner will be worse off under our policy. I congratulate him on at least flirting with the growing consensus, of which my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) spoke, that means-testing is undermining pension provision. Does he recall saying to a fringe meeting at the Labour party conference that pension credit was a > "short-to-medium-term policy only"?

Does he stick by that view? Has he changed it in the light of what his new Secretary of State has just said? If he still takes that view, has he broken the unpalatable news to the Chancellor?

Malcolm Wicks: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for following the Brighton fringe carefully—even if occasionally he goes beyond the fringe. I repeat that, with the development of occupational pensions, savings and the development of the state pension scheme, we would like more and more people to retire on incomes above income-tested levels. There are currently groups of elderly people—often those in their 70s, 80s and 90s, and mainly women—who are without savings and occupational pensions and with only a partial national insurance pension. That is why we have brought in pension credit. I repeat that we are proud of it.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the main reasons why people cannot save for pensions is that they simply do not earn enough? That particularly affects women, as he has pointed out. When will he bring forward the report on women's pensions, so that we can see exactly the inequalities and how the Government will tackle them?

Malcolm Wicks: I have mentioned the importance of gender. I was pleased to accept in Committee on the Pensions Bill the suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) that we should publish a report on women and pensions, and we shall do so next year. That is a very important dimension. Our ambition is that in different ways more women as well as men should be able to build up occupational pension rights during their careers. There are a number of ways in which that is happening and we need to maintain that progress.

Pensions Payment

11. Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): What steps he has taken to find out why pensioners were not able to access their pensions through the Post Office immediately before the August bank holiday. [190401]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): It was quite unacceptable that so many pensioners should have been left without access to their pensions, even for a few hours, owing to an error by a supplier to the Post Office on 23 August, for which the Post Office has publicly apologised. I have discussed the incident with the chief executive and senior managers of Post Office Ltd., and they have assured me that the appropriate management controls are now in place, so that pensioners are not inconvenienced in such a way again.

Mr. Flook: Many of my pensioners were indeed inconvenienced on 23 August, and for more than just a number of hours. That would not have happened prior to their being forced to accept a system that relies on computers. Although I hear what the Minister says about the assurances that have been given to him, surely if the delivery mechanism has faults, there should be a back-up system to ensure that such events do not happen again?

Mr. Pond: This had nothing to do with a computer failure; it was a management error. The computer system for the Post Office card account remains robust, and I have received assurances that it will continue to be so. Some 3.5 million people have already opted for the Post Office card account, and 12 million have moved across to direct payment. Ninety per cent. of those who have moved across tell us that they are very satisfied with the way the process is working. It gives them more flexibility and choice. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman speak to pensioners in his constituency who have made the transfer before suggesting in the House that there are widespread problems.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you received any indication from the Minister for Sport and Tourism that he intends to come to the House to make a statement on the future of the British grand prix? The matter is vital for three reasons. The British grand prix is one of the great events of the UK sporting calendar. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should not be in discussion during a point of order.

Hugh Robertson: The motor racing industry employs 40,000 people in this country, and many of their jobs may be at risk. The loss of the grand prix would be a huge blow to the nation's sporting prestige and is bound to affect our chances of hosting other international sporting events. The Minister has been making statements to the press over the past three weeks.

Mr. Speaker: I refused an urgent question from the hon. Gentleman regarding this matter, and I would not like to pursue it on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will the House consider that this is an important matter, both locally and nationally, in terms of jobs and prestige, and also that it is urgent because, as I understand it, if a decision to reinstate the grand prix is not taken by Wednesday, we will lose it for a year, which will obviously have long-term implications? Anything that you can do, Mr. Speaker, to encourage Ministers to take the matter seriously will be appreciated.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the appropriate Minister will have heard the hon. Gentleman.

Orders of the Day

Mental Capacity Bill

[Relevant documents: The Report of the Joint Committee on the Draft Mental Incapacity Bill, Session 2002–03, HL Paper 189-I and HC 1083-I; the Government's reply thereto, Cm 6121; and the Fifteenth Report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Session 2002–03, HL Paper 149 and HC 1005.]

Order for Second Reading read.

3.34 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am delighted to be able to introduce this important and long-awaited Bill. Voluntary organisations, individuals and their families, and many Members on both sides of the House, have campaigned for the Bill for many years—since 1989. The Bill will empower, protect and support people who lack mental capacity. We can and should no longer dismiss people by simply labelling them incapable. Professionals, families and friends who care for people who lack mental capacity need to understand more fully and more clearly their legal rights and responsibilities.

The Bill will affect everyone in this country. Nearly 750,000 people have dementia. At some point, 1 per cent. of the population will suffer from schizophrenia and 5 per cent. from depression or serious bipolar disease. More than 5 million people in England and Wales are carers for people who lack mental capacity. All those people, and many others, may need decisions to be made on their behalf, or need to make decisions on behalf of someone else.

The Bill's journey began many years ago. In 1989, the Law Commission said that specific legislation was needed, pointing out that case law was unsystematic and full of gaps and that it often did not reflect changes in attitudes. The Bill has benefited from input from numerous people and organisations with experience, expertise and commitment. They include Age Concern, the Alzheimer's Society, Mind and the other organisations that make up the Making Decisions Alliance. I thank them for all their support and advice.

Many hon. Members know that a draft Bill was scrutinised last autumn by a Joint Committee of both Houses. I thank all members of that Committee for their commitment and dedication. We accepted the vast majority of the Committee's recommendations. The Bill is much improved as a result of that scrutiny: in particular, we renamed it the Mental Capacity Bill to emphasise its focus on enablement; we included a set of key principles up front to frame the Bill; and we reworked the clauses on acts in connection with care and treatment to make their purpose clear.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way so early in his speech. The Joint Committee, of which I was a member, received many representations from people who regarded the draft Bill as introducing euthanasia by stealth—by the back door. We demanded assurances that that was not the case. I am sure that he will refer to the matter later, but will he take this early opportunity to reinforce that message, which some people still do not accept?

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for all the work she has done to bring the Bill to fruition. I know that in some of our communities there has been a debate with some groups that cast the Bill in that light, but we state categorically in the Bill, at clause 58, that it is not about euthanasia. Euthanasia remains a criminal offence in this country and the Bill does not change that fundamental arrangement. I am grateful to the Joint Committee for its work in stating that the draft Bill was not about euthanasia. I am also grateful for the work that we have been able to do on that important issue with the Catholic Church in particular, and for the Church's indication that the measure is not about euthanasia.

The Bill is about life and about people who suffer extremely debilitating diseases, such as schizophrenia and depression. Later in my speech, I shall discuss advance decisions, which are the matter that has attracted most attention. However, because the Bill is about the whole life of an individual, it will take me some time to reach that subject.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): Will the Minister clarify his comments that the Bill is not about euthanasia? Does he accept that there is a difference between the act by omission and the act by commission, and that in the drafting of the Bill the Government have dealt with the act by commission? Carefully left open are the issues surrounding the Bland judgment, particularly as that refers to the act by omission.

Mr. Lammy: I have said that the Bill does not change current common law. It makes it clear that any decision must be made in the best interests of the person who lacks capacity. We shall come on to discuss the advance decision, in particular.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): Will the Minister be very specific? What concerns those of us who fear euthanasia by omission is the definition of treatment, not only in the Bill but in its associated code of practice, and particularly in the definition of futile treatment. Will the hon. Gentleman categorically assure the House, with no ifs and buts, that treatment does not include, under the Bill, the provision of assisted food and fluid?

Mr. Lammy: I have said that the Bill does not change the current arrangement. Artificial hydration, with which I think the right hon. Lady is concerned, relates definitely to particular cases, some of which find themselves before our courts. The Bill does not alter that situation. Extremely difficult determinations have to be made involving hydration and nastro-gastric tubes and the balance between personal autonomy and dignity as well as sanctity of life. The right hon. Lady is right to pick up a difficult issue. As I have said, the Bill does not change the current law, the position on euthanasia or the difficult determinations that are made in the court of protection.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Lammy: I shall give way to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and then I want to make some progress before we return to these issues.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Many of us are concerned about how the Bill does or does not take forward the issue of euthanasia. Will my hon. Friend give the House an undertaking that if any of those people who do not, perhaps, have the capacities that most of us normally have are to have any of their rights infringed, they will have someone who acts as a champion for them and they will be able to go to an outside tribunal before any detrimental decision is made in "their interests"?

Mr. Lammy: We have ensured that an independent consultee will assist with decisions involving health and welfare, put the best interests of the person who lacks capacity at the centre of decision making and established a new court of protection. Given all the safeguards that we have put into the Bill, which no doubt we shall scrutinise in detail, we have been able to proceed without setting up a separate tribunal system. I shall now make some progress.

I have said that we renamed the Bill the Mental Capacity Bill to emphasise its focus on enablement. We included a set of key principles to frame the Bill. We reworked the clauses surrounding acts in connection with care and treatment, to make their purpose clear. We made it clear that the court would set clear limits on the authority of deputies. We followed the recommendation to bring into statute legislation on advance decisions to refuse treatment, with clearer and tighter safeguards. We included provisions on research as it suggested, again with strict safeguards. The Joint Committee agreed that concerns linking the Bill with euthanasia appear to be misplaced, but it thought that it would be helpful to include additional reassurances in the legislation, and we have done so.

I now want to say why the Bill is so important. First, it is about the rights of the individual person. It starts by saying that individuals should be assumed to be capable of making decisions, and helped to make them. If they cannot make them, the Bill says that each decision or act under the Bill must be based on the "best interests" of the individual. Secondly, the law is unclear, and the Joint Committee agreed that we needed to clarify the law as it affects day-to-day life. Thirdly, the Bill makes it clear that relatives and carers should be consulted when other people do things without consent to someone who lacks capacity. Hon. Members will know from their own constituents that this does not always happen. People come to us and say that something has happened, and that the person concerned did not have consent. We have tightened up those provisions. Fourthly, the Bill clarifies what can be done, and who can do it, when someone lacks mental capacity, and emphasises that they must act in that person's best interests.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I am also grateful for clause 58, and for the assurance that he has given to the House that this is not an attempt to introduce euthanasia by the back door. However, many Christian groups, including those in my constituency, are still very worried about this issue. Would it not be possible for the Minister to build in those assurances on the grounds of omission and treatment, as well as on the grounds set out specifically in clause 58? He would find an awful lot of good will around the House if he did so.

Mr. Lammy: We have worked very closely with all the Christian communities, particularly the Catholic Church, and many of the provisions in the Bill, including clause 58 and parts of clause 25, are a direct result of recommendations made by the Catholic Church. Also, central to the issue of omission is the best interest principle. The principles underlying the Bill are up front in clause 1, which says that people who lack capacity can come in and out of capacity. We have sought to put safeguards in place in that regard. These are difficult decisions, however. Doctors, carers, parents and loved ones make difficult decisions every day of the week, up and down the country. The Bill puts a framework around that process.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Will the Minister set out for the House the standards by which the best interests of the patient are to be determined? It is certainly not clear from the Bill.

Mr. Lammy: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman says that. If he looks at clause 4, he will see that all circumstances are relevant. This is the first time that we have laid that out in statute. He will see the assumptions that should be made about someone who has or has not lacked capacity. He will also see that, for the first time, we are saying that loved ones should be consulted, and that a person's values, beliefs and concerns should be taken into account. It does not get much clearer than that. We have attempted, in the Bill, to ensure that the person who lacks capacity is central to the discussions about their best interests, and that those who know that person can make recommendations on their behalf. The best interest principle involves an objective assessment, however, that will be made primarily by a doctor.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con) rose—

Mr. Lammy: I want to make some progress.

The Bill is about empowering and protecting people who lack mental capacity. That is its starting point. People have told us that they feel as though they have been "written off" as unable to do anything for themselves. That is why the principle of an assumption of mental capacity is set out in the very first clause of the Bill. The Bill also says that mental capacity must be considered in relation to the decision that needs to be taken at the time. People may be perfectly able to take decisions about some parts of their lives, such as what to wear, while needing a parent, a carer or the medics to come alongside them to help with other, more complex decisions, such as how to manage their investments.

The Bill also says that such people should not be treated as unable to make a decision merely because they make an unwise decision. We have all done things that our family or friends think are unwise. In a sense, the intention is to give people with impaired mental capacity the chance to express their individuality, as everyone else does.

The Bill also protects and supports people who lack mental capacity. Sadly, as we know, there are occasions when people without mental capacity are abused by those whom they trust. Cases such as Longcare have increased our awareness of the risks of abuse. Accordingly, we have introduced in the Bill a new criminal offence of ill treatment or neglect, with a maximum sentence of five years. We cannot tolerate abuse of vulnerable people.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I am grateful for the Minister's careful explanation of the Bill. Can he explain the circumstances under which that new offence might kick in, which would not be covered, for example, by the existing law of negligence?

Mr. Lammy: One of the questions that people have asked is: to whom do they go when they are worried about what is happening with a particular person who lacks capacity? We have been keen to ensure that in implementing what I hope will become the Mental Capacity Act, the Public Guardianship Office, social services, carers and parents are clear about the safeguards, the increased criminal offence and the increase from two years to five years. We must ensure that they understand to whom they can report people about whom they have fears, particularly in relation to abuse. The hon. Gentleman will also understand that the independent consultee may play an important role, particularly because people who are not befriended have no one to act on their behalf. If necessary, they can report things about which they are concerned.

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): I welcome the Bill, which has potential to give people who have great difficulty in making and communicating decisions, such as those with autism, much more control over their lives. My hon. Friend will be aware, however, that there is some disappointment in relation to the lack of an independent advocacy service, particularly for those with the most severe disability. Will he keep an open mind and look again at that aspect? As I said, he will be aware of such concern.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her point and for all that she does to campaign in this area. The independent consultee proposal is new, it is supported by money, and we have indicated in the draft code that we are keen to look at ways of extending and framing it. At the same time, she will know that we must strike a balance between existing advocacy services, which independent organisations and charities run in all communities, and parents and carers. Two weeks ago in Brighton, I met some of those who provide that role, and those who lack capacity are keen for them to do so. They ensure that the most vulnerable are provided for, which is why we have introduced the independent consultee. I understand my hon. Friend's concerns and the reasons why people are keen to ensure that vulnerable individuals, with various disabilities, have someone to act on their behalf.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): In relation to what the hon. Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) has said, can the Minister confirm that he is willing to entertain amendments in Committee that will enable us to extend the right of advocacy in the Bill?

Mr. Lammy: I have said that we are consulting. The hon. Gentleman will have seen the draft code on the framing of the independent consultees. It is not helpful to devise a system that requires statutory advocacy services in cases where, first, we know that the services are independent, secondly, it is right that local social services and primary care trusts make the determinations and, thirdly, people have parents, siblings and carers who already provide such services. However, we shall hold that debate in Committee.

The package has two elements. If a person has no relatives or friends to consult about serious medical treatment decisions or long-term changes of residence, an independent consultee will help to ensure that the decision is genuinely in the person's best interests, and especially that the person's views and wishes are fully considered.

We acknowledge that there may be other circumstances in which it would be helpful to have extra safeguards. We have therefore included a regulation-making power to extend the independent consultee provisions and we hope to consult about and discuss that more fully in the coming weeks.

I want to explain how the Bill sets out what people in a caring role can and cannot do when the person for whom they care lacks the capacity to consent. The principle of best interests is critical to that and I have already had much to say about it. When someone cannot make a decision, the best interests principle requires that any act done or decision made under the Bill must be in that person's best interests. That principle must be at the heart of all decision making. That means not only what the person would have wanted but an objective test, considering all relevant factors. Clause 4 sets out some of them in detail.

Chris Grayling: Apart from the concerns that my hon. Friends have articulated about euthanasia, I have a specific anxiety that is based on experience in my constituency, which has five large old mental hospitals. They have been run down in the past few years. There have been tensions between the residents' families, who want their relatives to move to a village environment, and the care agencies, which want to push the residents out into much smaller community homes. The families feel that that is the wrong decision for their relatives. Will the Minister reassure me that the provisions that define best interests give a fair balance between the families' views and those of the agencies? My experience shows that the agencies often have the upper hand.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful for that question and I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks. For the first time, we are providing in statute for a duty to consult, and saying that beliefs and values are relevant to the determination. We are also making it clear that the best interests test is objective. I believe that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will be in a much stronger position once the Bill is enacted than they might have been without it.

Clause 4 sets out some of the relevant factors, including: considering whether the person is likely to regain mental capacity; permitting and encouraging the person to participate; considering the person's wishes, feelings, beliefs and values; and taking account of the views of others who know the person well. Indeed, the last factor reflects the hon. Gentleman's example.

The checklist is not exhaustive but designed to make it clear that decision makers should take everything that is relevant into account. In that way, the person who lacks mental capacity stays at the centre of all decision making. The list also gives people a clear basis for discussion if there is any doubt or dispute.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): The Minister knows that the scrutiny Committee recommended that the Bill should pass the Bournewood test. He referred to the people who know the person best. Let us consider the paid carers in the Bournewood case. As the Minister knows, the European Court found in favour of Mr. L last week. In that case, the paid carers knew the person best, but I do not believe that they would be at the top of the list of consultees under the Bill. In the light of last week's judgment, does the measure pass the Bournewood test, or will the Minister amend it?

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, who brings much expertise to these matters. She served on the Joint Committee and has continued to press the Government and others about these important issues. The Bournewood decision is less than a week old. Clearly, it is important. We are considering it and what amendments we may or may not have to make in that regard, but she will know that it pertains to circumstances five or six years ago. It is important that we look at it in the context of matters as they are today. However, I accept her point. We are looking at the matter very carefully.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I apologise for the many interventions, but the Minister will understand that this is a highly charged and emotional issue. The point that my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) made is important. He talks about consultations and taking other views into account, but is not the nub of the matter that the person who is responsible is the person who is placed with the power of attorney? That person will decide what happens. Under the Bill, that could be an appointed deputy, who may have no personal understanding of the individual concerned and thus may not necessarily take advice from others whom they should consult. Is not that the reality? The issue of euthanasia by omission lies at the heart of the Bill. While that provision is there, the attorney, all powerful, makes the final decision. That punches a hole in the Minister's argument.

Mr. Lammy: The right hon. Gentleman has some experience of these matters. He has a hospice in his constituency that many of us in north-east London have campaigned for. No doubt he has received representations in this regard. He will know that the attorney is most often the wife or partner of the person who may have dementia. They will have taken on that role and been with that person for many years. It is important not to conflate the lasting power of attorney under the Bill with the role of a deputy where someone has no one. The court brings in the deputy. Under the Bill, that will be done in the least restrictive manner. It is a de minimis power, subject to court scrutiny, and it can be revoked if there is a challenge or problem. It is important to that bear that in mind.

Clause 5, entitled "Acts in connection with care and treatment", is an important clarification of the law surrounding what someone can do to or for a person lacking mental capacity who is unable to give consent. The current law is based on the poorly understood and obscure "doctrine of necessity". Hon. Members will know of constituents who are worried and uncertain about what they are allowed to do, because they do not understand the law. For example, a nurse may want to restrain someone who is having an epileptic fit. Someone caring for an elderly patient at home may need to help them to use the toilet. Someone whose daughter suffers from bipolar disease may want to go to her house to cook for her and to help her to eat because she is in too much distress.

It is not right that people in such situations should have to rely on what seems to them to be an outdated and obscure legal concept. Clause 5 explains what they can do. It provides that one is protected from liability when the person cannot consent, provided that one takes reasonable steps to establish whether that person lacks mental capacity in relation to the matter in question, that one reasonably believes that the person lacks capacity in relation to the matter, and that what one does is in the person's best interests.

The Bill will introduce a new specialist court. The new court of protection will have the statutory power to make declarations about a person's capacity in relation to a particular matter or matters, and whether any act in relation to that person is lawful.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Before the Minister moves on, will he confirm that the same removal of liability applies to allowing medical research to be undertaken on someone where they have not given consent and where their family have not given consent?

Mr. Lammy: There are strict criteria and codes concerning medical research, which I hope to discuss. I would not want the hon. Gentleman to conflate that issue with that of acts in connection with care, which is dealt with separately in the Bill.

Supported by a public guardian, the new court of protection will be an important new specialist resource and final arbiter. For instance, it will be able to act in cases where urgent medical treatment is needed, and in serious cases involving ethical dilemmas in untested areas.

It is also important that I talk about how the Bill gives people the opportunity to plan ahead if they wish. Although we do not like to think about it, any one of us could lose our mental capacity through illness or accident; indeed, much recent case law has arisen because of car accidents and other such incidents on the road. Members will already know that they can plan ahead for financial matters by making an enduring power of attorney. We think it right that people should be able to do this, but I do realise that for many years, Members have raised concerns about the potential for financial abuse under the old EPA system. We have addressed these concerns by strengthening the safeguards. Lasting powers of attorney must now be registered before use, so that a person's claim and entitlement to hold an LPA can be checked on a register. Others must be notified when someone applies for an LPA, and given the chance to object. If concerns are raised about a person's use of an LPA, the public guardian can investigate the matter and, if necessary, the powers can be amended or revoked.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I have been attending closely to his argument. It struck me that his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on the issue of whether research could be conducted on a person without that person's consent was, to put it mildly, studiously opaque. Given that it appears from Lord Filkin's reply in a letter to my hon. Friend that there are circumstances in which such research can be carried out when the individual affected lacks capacity to consent or otherwise, will the Minister confirm that no such research can be carried out if the person now lacking capacity to consent previously expressed opposition to the idea, or can he not assure us even on that front?

Mr. Lammy: Of course, if the person concerned made an advance request, we would rightly look to consider that. The hon. Gentleman will know that ethics committees make such determinations every day of the week—I shall deal with research in due course—and that they are central to that discussion. So in that regard, this is nothing new.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Surely the problem with the issue of medical research is that the Bill as drafted allows such research to take place on a patient who does not have mental capacity, even though its being carried out might be of absolutely no benefit to them personally. That raises serious ethical issues that we will have to consider carefully in Committee; otherwise, I fear that the House will go in a very wrong direction.

Mr. Lammy: First, I should point out that this is something that the Joint Committee wanted. The hon. Gentleman is right in part, but the provision is for the benefit of the patient and of those with a similar condition. However, we will have that discussion in due course.

We know that many people would like to have the LPA option for health and welfare decisions, and for the first time the Bill provides such a choice. If they wish, people will be able to appoint a relative or friend whom they trust to take decisions on health and welfare, should they lose mental capacity. No one will be forced to make an LPA—it will be a matter of personal choice—but for some, knowing that someone close to them will be acting for them will be a great comfort.

It is important to stress that attorneys will not be able to act simply in the way that they think the person concerned might have wanted. They, like everyone else, must act in the objective best interests of the person. If they fail to do so, they will be liable for a breach of their duty of care.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): May I take the Minister back to his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), to make sure that I have understood what is being proposed? The Minister said that, if someone made an advance decision that they did not want to be a subject of research, it would be something that he would "look to consider" in reaching a decision. At the same time, the Bill says, as I understand it, that if someone made an advance decision that they did not wish to be resuscitated, a doctor would have to follow that decision on pain of criminal prosecution. Is that not correct? Is there not an imbalance there?

Mr. Lammy: Someone can make an advance decision concerning research. However, I am coming on to the point that, while it must be right for people to be able to take a decision now about what should happen, what we are doing for the first time is strengthening the powers and laying out the context in which such advance decisions can be made. That has to be a good thing, but let me explain in more detail what that means.

Mr. Duncan Smith rose—

Mr. Lammy: People who have mental capacity have the right to say that they do not want a specific treatment. Some people may choose to plan for a time when they might lose that mental capacity by setting out such refusals in advance. I know that there has been much discussion about that issue, but let me be clear that, under the common law, any one of us could take an advance decision to refuse treatment now. All of us can do that and we believe that it is right to establish a framework and to set out the criteria for people who want to take such a decision.

That is also important because doctors and others who have to deal with such patients must be clear about their status and the safeguards that apply. Medical professionals—nurses and doctors—need to be confident that an advance decision genuinely represents the person's fixed decision. That is an important factor and we have set that out at the heart of the Bill in clause 25. We have made the criteria surrounding advance decisions tighter. Under the Bill, it is tougher for a doctor to argue in law that an advance refusal of treatment is valid and that treatment should therefore be withheld than it is for him to defend a decision to go ahead and treat. If in doubt, there is a clear presumption in favour of the preservation of life. That is the strong implication of clause 26. A suicide note saying "I want to die" would not be a valid advance decision because someone suffering from suicidal despair or depression would not have the required mental capacity.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister is coming on to a key issue on which he may be able to provide further reassurance to the House. It is certainly my understanding from reading the Bill—I would be grateful if the Minister would confirm it—that any expression of an earlier wish when a person has capacity that is either tantamount to a request to commit suicide or falls into the grey area where the person is asking to be assisted into death when that course is unnecessary and contrary to common sense would not be made legitimate by the Bill.

Mr. Lammy: That is absolutely 100 per cent. correct because the person, obviously in distress, would not have capacity. Any doctor or medical professional treating that person would not accept the suicide note or similar expression of the patient's will. The person's wishes would not be deemed valid or applicable in that context.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): The Law Society was keen that the Mental Health Bill and the Mental Capacity Bill should, because of the close connections between them, proceed in parallel. Will the Minister make it clear that, although there is a gap between the two Bills, the Mental Health Bill is now before the House in draft form?

Mr. Lammy: Many people, as my hon. Friend will know, have campaigned for this Bill for many years. It deals with a broad group of people—not only those who lack capacity, but their carers and others. The Mental Health Bill will deal with much more specific circumstances to do with mental health. For that reason, it is important for this Bill to make progress and for the Mental Health Bill to receive the required scrutiny. We must ensure that we achieve good legislation in that area as well.

Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware that fears about euthanasia have been raised in relation to this clause and this Bill, but they have nothing to do with euthanasia. The Joint Committee was clear that such fears were misplaced. The Bill in fact clarifies the law, and strengthens the safeguards, but in response to people's concerns we have amended the original Bill to remove all doubt. In particular, we have added clause 58 to say, in so many words, that > "nothing in this Act is to be taken to affect the law relating to murder or manslaughter or . . . assisting suicide".

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): The Minister mentioned clarification. As I understand it, he has told the House that a patient with mental capacity would be able to refuse to have research carried out on them, but that it is not possible for that person to refuse it for any future point at which they might lose mental capacity. That is what the Minister appeared to tell the House.

Mr. Lammy: I dealt with that point. I made it clear that a person can make an advance decision not to participate in research. That is clear from the Bill and I thought that I had made it clear. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not hear me. I hope that these changes will finally lay to rest the fears about euthanasia.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): When my hon. Friend the Minister addressed the concerns of Opposition Members, I understood him to say that if a person has an advance directive to the effect that they refuse to become the subject of research should they lose capacity, or that they did not want treatment or to be resuscitated, those directives would be treated in exactly the same way when it came to a decision being made.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is why I laid out the terms under which the advance decision would be considered. It would have to be valid and applicable. There is also a presumption that the doctor has to be satisfied, as stated in clause 26.

The last issue that I wish to discuss is involvement in research. The Joint Committee explicitly recommended that we cover research in the Bill, otherwise people without mental capacity would be denied its benefits and the legal criteria for research would remain unclear. I assure the House that the Bill's provisions are designed to ensure that research does not leave people who lack mental capacity open to exploitation or abuse.

We therefore propose that research should be allowed subject to strict controls. Any research must have the potential to benefit the person without mental capacity, without imposing a disproportionate burden, or must be intended to provide knowledge of the causes of a condition or of the treatment and care of people affected by the same or a similar condition, but with negligible risk or intrusion. In either case, the researcher must consult someone who cares for the participant about his participation in the project.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. Let me take him back through that decision. Let us assume that the individual who is incapacitated has no family and has an appointed deputy as their attorney. If that appointed deputy did not express the opinion that such research should not take place, the decision would be left to those who wanted to undertake the research. That is the change in the Bill, because the research would not necessarily have to be to the benefit of the individual concerned. Surely that is the critical issue.

Mr. Lammy: In those circumstances, I doubt that the research ethics committee would let the process take place. I also doubt whether the deputy would not have made a contribution in that regard. Ultimately, what is important is that we have the criteria and that the process is not intrusive. It must be neither intrusive nor overly burdensome and it must go to the research ethics committee, within the existing framework, for final determination. There cannot be more guarantees than that.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): That sounds like non-therapeutic intervention and it does not square with another part of the Bill that seems to say specifically that if, for example, there is a road accident or something happens where blood is spilt, and where there is currently no provision for the medical professions to take a blood sample from a person without capacity, it would be illegal to do so under the Bill, whereas the Minister has just said that there are circumstances in terms of research where it would be legal. Could he clarify that specific point relating to non-therapeutic intervention?

Mr. Lammy: I confirm what the hon. Gentleman says; it would be wrong to deny it, but many groups, especially people with learning disabilities, campaigned to have such legislation drafted, specifically because they said they wanted to be involved in benefiting medical advance as regards their illness. Without that provision, we could not make those advances. It was a difficult balance. It is right to include the provision, but we must also have the right safeguards to ensure that the process is not intrusive or burdensome and that people are consulted, or if they cannot be consulted, that there is someone who can be. That will obviously involve the research ethics committee, and the court of protection might also have a view if there was a particular dispute or problem.

Mr. Grieve: I am very grateful to the Minister; he has taken a large number of interventions.

Is it not the case, and one of the nub issues with which the House may have to grapple, that the philosophical principle underlying the way in which the Government have framed the research clause introduces the clear possibility—to be sanctioned by the House—that, in the public interest, research could be carried out on a person who does not have capacity to consent, but that there would be safeguards to ensure that it is not overly intrusive? That, as the Minister may agree, is a very difficult ethical issue and there is no point in trying to duck it. The House will have to grapple with that issue as the Bill goes through.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he puts the argument. I am not trying to duck the issue. I said that we had included safeguards and that is the difference. I acknowledged the comments made by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) about non-therapeutic care, but it is important to emphasise the point made to the Joint Committee: people, especially those with learning disabilities, said that they wanted to be part of the process. Indeed, in a sense, it is appropriate that we are having this discussion on the day of Christopher Reeve's death. He was a huge campaigner on such issues. People like him say that they want to be involved in research governing their condition and in improving life for others.

The research provisions, like the rest of the Bill, aim to help us learn from the experiences of people who lack mental capacity, so that we can better empower, protect and support them. This is a Bill with potential to benefit all of us, whether as people planning for our future, caring for someone else, or acting in a professional capacity. It is an ethical, empowering Bill, which deserves the full support of the House. I ask that it be read a Second time.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for his attempts over an extended period to explain the legislation. If he came to the House with the assumption that he would have an easy ride, he will now have been disabused of it. Legislation should be our core business in the House—a somewhat old-fashioned view, but one that I strongly hold—and every so often an issue arises, such as this Bill, that is relatively uncontroversial in party political terms but significantly or massively controversial in its implications, and which greatly and genuinely exercises a number of interest groups. It is perhaps unsurprising and even fitting that that should be so when the Bill deals with the loss of the essential capacity of human beings to act as autonomous moral agents—souls, if the Minister prefers, and I think that he and I would both be happy with that phraseology. Indeed, in certain cases the Bill can at least affect materially their life and well-being. Equally, the Bill deals with the necessity for another person to stand in and act for the person when that capacity is lost. There are moral challenges and hazards in that role, too.

I should like to emphasise at the outset the scale of the problem. The minimalist definition of capacity by function involves determining whether it is possible for the person in question to take a decision for himself, even if other actions are not open to him, rather than sweeping them all up and saying, "He can't manage, you know." Even on that reductionist view of capacity, there will be between 1 million and 2 million people in this country at any time to whom the Bill may apply directly. The number of decisions involving their daily care—let alone, of course, the material decisions that exercise so many people—is almost infinite. The growth in the number of the extremely elderly—those over 85—is likely over time to increase the figures, particularly in connection with dementia, while at the beginning of life the improved survival chances for babies lead, sadly, to a steady though not dramatic expansion in the number of people with learning difficulties, and in turn, those people are living to adulthood and maturity. Of course, I welcome those opportunities; they are a challenge, not a threat.

The House would do well to recognise the complexities of the situation, including, as well as the two life conditions that I have already mentioned—learning disability and dementia—permanent or temporary mental incapacity following trauma or as a result of long-lasting or intermittent mental illness. Of course, the emphasis of the functional definition adopted in the Bill is that capacity may be retained for some everyday matters, while it may not run to major decisions, for example, on the disposal of assets, or an individual's future residence or care conditions. Many of the conditions that I have described can co-exist. It is possible simultaneously to have learning disabilities and mental illness—although, of course, they should not be confused in any way—so an even larger number of people, other than the person involved, are swept into the issue as carers or health or social care professionals, as well as those required to administer a person's affairs in the business sense.

Perhaps I can give the Government a pointer by saying that, on reflection, I have decided that it is probably better to have—for example, in the provisions for lasting power of attorney—the opportunity to consider holistically the financial affairs of the person, together with their care, because it may be necessary for court decisions to be split, or even for those functions to be split among the individuals who are appointed for that purpose, either by the person before they lose capacity or by the court. We should at least consider that as a whole, rather than separately.

In view of the complexity of the situation that I have described, it is hardly surprising that the process that has culminated in this Second Reading began some 15 years ago—even the Minister will recall that there was a Conservative Government at that time—with the referral of the issue to the Law Commission in 1989 by the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay of Clashfern. After six years, the Law Commission reported back, the Government consulted and published a White Paper, and then a subsequent White Paper, and there was a draft Bill, which was much assisted and expertly commented on by a Joint Committee. That led to many valuable amendments, including a name change—names matter, and to refer to capacity rather than incapacity, emphasising the positive, is a good signal. It also led to an up-front statement of principles—we may tinker with them in Committee, but at least they are along the right lines—and to clause 58, a declaratory clause, about which we have already heard a great deal, in relation to murder, manslaughter, euthanasia and assisted suicide.

Mr. Damian Green: My hon. Friend will be aware that some of us, while accepting that there are many good things in the Bill and good principles behind it, are genuinely worried that, despite all the assurances that have been given, it could be a significant step on the road to legalising euthanasia, which would be wholly unacceptable to the House. I had hoped to be reassured by the Minister, but candidly, I was not. While he is on clause 58, will my hon. Friend refer in particular to the issue of the classification of food and fluids as medical treatment that could be withdrawn, because that goes to the heart of the worries that many of us have?

Mr. Boswell: I shall certainly deal with that matter in a very few moments, as it is of great concern to many people, not only on our Benches but throughout the House.

My party will be on a free vote tonight, which I feel is entirely appropriate for an issue of conscience that affects so many people who have written to us or expressed their views in other ways. My personal sympathies are to a great extent with the Minister. He has experienced that before on previous legislation, and may not welcome it. My sympathies are towards getting on with legislation. As my hon. Friend just said, there are many good things in the Bill, and I am well aware that it is supported by the Making Decisions Alliance, which runs to almost 40 charities expert in the field that have to wrestle day to day with the practical problems. Like the Minister, I have no difficulty with the alliance, and indeed I appeared on one of its platforms at my own party conference, but I do not feel that the concerns that have been expressed to us—not exclusively about euthanasia—can be brushed aside, because they will require really adequate and searching explanations from Ministers, which, with respect, I do not believe we have had today.

We are unlikely to achieve that aim in a Committee stage programmed to finish before the end of this month, but I am given to understand, in the rather numinous way in which such matters emerge, that there may be the possibility of some modification of that programme. I say to the Minister, in all good conscience, that it will be much easier if we feel that we have had a good chance to go through all this. In that, I speak not only as a Front-Bench spokesman but on behalf of my Back-Bench colleagues and others throughout the House.

These things cannot be brushed under the carpet. We have had 15 years to get this right, and I think that the Minister will have understood from our proceedings so far today that many people here, without a party political handle on it, do not feel that we have yet done so. If we can have at least 15 sittings—I pick the number only by analogy with the number of years—to have a good go at this and get it right, we may all feel far more satisfied about it.

We will be looking for not only words, but visible action, to beef up the safeguards that are built into the Bill. From my lay perspective, I shall table many amendments to probe the issues, and I have no doubt that other amendments will emerge shortly, as they should. Ministers have a duty to the House to tackle such issues in good faith—they have sometimes not done so, but we should not go into that because our discussion is not partisan—and until they are shown to be able to do that, I can best describe my attitude as one of constructive scepticism. I hope that the word "scepticism" will resonate in one or two places.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The Minister said several times that there is an objective test of best interest in the Bill. Is the hon. Gentleman satisfied that such a test is provided?

Mr. Boswell: In a sense, there is a fall-back position of using an objective test of best interest if a matter reaches litigation, but many people may filter it through their actions before that stage is reached, which is among the genuine concerns that must be explored.

Mr. Swayne: My hon. Friend will recall that when I asked the Minister about that principle, he said that the standards would be such that all sorts of people—relatives and the rest—would be consulted about such things as their values. Does my hon. Friend agree that that, by any standard, is a subjective test of what is best for the patient, rather than an objective one?

Mr. Boswell: It is right that if one person consults someone else, two views will be expressed, and the inference is that one view may prevail. The worries that are being expressed address the fact that that view might be more detached from the reality of the person's interests. Such matters could ultimately be brokered through the court of protection, which will try to take an objective view, but the difficulty for the House is that that process must first be reached. Lives could be lost in extreme circumstances and interests could be prejudiced while the matter is resolved.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Given that the best interest of an incapacitated person is the overarching principle of the Bill, and that those who determine the best interests of such people merely have to take into consideration those people's wishes, beliefs and values, surely the Bill is inconsistent with the best interests of incapacitated people. Should not the previously expressed views of incapacitated people be paramount in decisions taken in their best interests?

Mr. Boswell: I understand what my hon. Friend is driving at. We would all want that to happen whenever possible, although there might be extreme cases in which it could not. Perhaps I can resile from that point and tell the Minister that he will have to explain carefully in Committee how people's previously expressed views, which may or may not be consistent with their actual best interests at the time, will be handled.

It is important that I make it clear that my personal position remains one of constructive scepticism. I shall listen to the debate and the further exchanges that take place and I may well withhold my support from the Government tonight pending assurances being given in Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I did not say that to get a cheer, but because we are considering serious issues. We must construct the right framework so that the Minister can do the right thing, if I may put it helpfully.

The Minister will hardly be surprised if I say that hon. Members on both sides of the House are exercised about right-to-life issues relating to euthanasia and research.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Boswell: Given the right hon. Gentleman's shared interest with me in disability issues, I shall give way.

Mr. Clarke: Until the hon. Gentleman made his last point, I thought that he was making an especially measured speech, but if he is to probe in the way in which he rightly said that he would, if he is to ask questions in the way in which he is entitled, and if he is to put forward the views of his constituents, as one would expect, how can he do so if the Bill is denied its Second Reading?

Mr. Boswell: I do not believe that one should overplay one's hand, but with respect I have a feeling—I may be entirely wrong—that if I were not to join the right hon. Gentleman in the Lobby tonight in support of the Bill, it might well receive a Second Reading anyway. If it does not, we will be sending a powerful message to the Government to think again, which might be beneficial in itself. A carry-over motion is already on the Order Paper. We need to sit down together, in a common endeavour—in an effort to be more consensual, I agree with him on that—to get it right.

I share the Minister's view that the Bill does not permit euthanasia. If it did, I would oppose it, as would the Conservative party and, I am sure, the overwhelming majority of individual Conservatives. The Conservative party opposes euthanasia and so, incidentally—at least according to the view of Lord Goff in relation to the Bland case—does the common law. It is not on the map and it should not be on the map.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): My hon. Friend mentions the Conservative party and speaks from the Front Bench. He also said that he does not think that there is euthanasia by omission. I have been in the House slightly longer than he has—although I have not served with such distinction, I hasten to add—and in all those years, both in government and in opposition, the Conservative party has had a policy that is opposed to euthanasia by commission or omission. That is also the view of the current leader of our party, who supported my private Member's Bill. There seems to be some confusion.

Mr. Boswell: I think that there is no confusion. The Conservative party is not in favour of euthanasia. As far as I know, no other responsible party in this place is in favour of euthanasia. The issue is, inevitably, the definition of the particular acts and the nature of the circumstances that precede them. The Joint Committee clearly supports the Minister's view, and that is a cogent consideration. As a result of its specific request, we have a declaratory clause—clause 58—which is important.

However, I can hardly fail to be aware of the strength of deep and sincere feeling on the issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) identified that when he expressed his concerns about the Bland judgment in respect of artificial nutrition and hydration, which are intrusive procedures and treatments. There must be a debate in Committee on whether that is the right state of the law, but it is undoubtedly the current state of the law, and I am not disposed to follow others in changing it.

Other issues raise legitimate concerns about the interaction with decisions made in advance—the so-called living wills—and the ability of a medical practitioner, acting independently, to take life and death decisions without reference to the court or members of the person's family. Those issues must be aired and must not be brushed aside by Ministers.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that at a meeting in the House of Lords on 17 September, it was revealed that an attorney or a deputy, if given the power of attorney, will have the power under the Bill to order a doctor to refuse treatment in the form of food and fluids, which would effectively bring life to an end? If that is the case, and it has been set out clearly in the House of Lords by very qualified people, would it not simply be a form of euthanasia?

Mr. Boswell: It is difficult for any third party to order a doctor to take a particular course of action. My interpretation does not precisely coincide with my hon. Friend's, but there is a serious issue, which needs to be got right.

Frankly, I am more intensely in sympathy with the shorthand of the pro-life representations about the clause introduced to deal with research. It is one thing for a person with capacity to agree to be a guinea pig—to submit themselves to research—or even by advance decision taken with capacity to indicate one's readiness to be so, either after mental capacity is lost or after death by organ donation, but once capacity is lost and it falls to another person to decide, the principle of best interest cuts in and supervenes. I am worried that, however convenient it may be in relation to CJD, for example, or other terminal illnesses, to offer up a person without capacity for research, it cannot, as parts of clause 31 imply, be allowable to override the principle of best interest of the person involved and no one else.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I have looked at clause 31 very carefully and I can see nothing in it that ensures that the person on whom the research is conducted will benefit from it. It ensures that others might benefit, but not the individual concerned.

Mr. Boswell: If I may say so, that is precisely the point that concerns us.

Mrs. Humble: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boswell: I wonder whether the hon. Lady will forgive me and allow me to make a little progress. I am conscious of the time, and many Members want to speak.

In considering the Bill as a whole, I want to enter an important caveat for those seeking to oppose it root and branch. Some people have written to us in those terms and expressed themselves strongly, partly on euthanasia and also on the issue of representation. The Bill codifies practice that has arisen out of common law. I am genuinely grateful for the fact that, to complement my interests in this area, I shall have the assistance of the shadow Attorney-General, my hon. Friend Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), in considering the Bill. It is from common law that we have the definition of best interest and also the occasionally contrary acceptance of advance decisions as overriding best interest.

It is also arguable—indeed, it is incontestably true—that things do go wrong under the present common law regime. To take a simple case, I think of the number of fraudulent cases of use or abuse of enduring powers of attorney, which is striking and alarming. It would be a brave Minister who argued that even when the law is codified, as the Bill provides, and with the best safeguards Parliament can find, nothing would ever go wrong again. Indeed, there is a genuine risk—we must watch this—that in seeking ever to tie things down more tightly for all the right motives, we might create instead of the flexibility characterised under common law a culture in which every move is litigated on, where it is impossible for anyone to do anything without going to the court of protection. That would be unhelpful for all concerned, both in human terms and in terms of the resources involved.

At this point I should expose more clearly what I feel is the inherent and unspoken tension in the Bill. There are, on the one hand, the interests of the person without capacity, and on the other, the interests of those looking after him or her. Before that is misconstrued, I say immediately that the whole House will want to recognise and celebrate the contribution of some 7 million carers towards those and similar problems. I mention in the same breath the work of doctors, nurses, social workers and other professionals who shoulder the burden of decision making in such cases. For the first time—this is one of the Bill's strengths—the Bill provides a comprehensive hierarchy and framework for their participation. There are real benefits in the clarification of that, such as for parents of an adult son with a learning disability who may for the first time have a formal locus in decisions taken about his care.

It is absolutely no disrespect to the Making Decisions Alliance, the Royal College of Psychiatrists and many others who have played such a part in bringing the Bill to its current state of readiness to recognise that their interests may not be identical to those of the person lacking capacity. Even if those bodies are acting by their own best lights, as I hope they are, their interests are still different. Indeed, they may conflict with one another—for example, when family members genuinely, and not necessarily for malicious or personal reasons, disagree about the regime or type of care, let alone about the disposition of family property. There may be differences between families and professionals, who have resources and budgets to consider. There may also be differences between professionals themselves. There is a systemic problem in that Ministers have confused the second opinion given by a professional about somebody with, for example, a psychiatric complaint with the work of an independent consultee, who may be a layperson, whose job is to represent that person's interests and who is not approaching the situation as a professional or someone with any axe to grind.

The Minister—understandably, given the pressure that he was under—was somewhat sketchy about the machinery in the Bill for resolving such issues. That machinery, most notably the relationship between the Official Solicitor, representing individuals, the public guardian and the court of protection, will require careful scrutiny. It is also clear that many interested parties are concerned about the rudimentary state of provision for truly independent advice given by someone with no axe to grind in the interests of the person without capacity. The issue of who will stand up and act only for the person in question, without any interest of their own, reads across into many of the most difficult issues in the Bill; for example, the concerns about euthanasia and research and those about the Bournewood gap.

The Bill does not take over those conflicts, but it needs to provide for them to be recognised and reasonably resolved. Above all, as I think the Minister will agree, those conflicts have ultimately to be resolved in the interests of the person without capacity. We do not see this as a Bill to whitewash the actions of carers or to protect them from the attention of the law, and I do not wish to caricature it as such. Most carers will not need that protection because they are acting in good faith and in the best interests of the person involved. We have to remember, however, that when push comes to shove it is the individual who is at the centre.

Although the Bill has already been 15 years in gestation, it is essential that it is scrutinised in detail and, put simply, got as right as human wisdom can make it in an imperfect and challenging world. That world is changing, too, so we have to achieve the right mix of safeguard and flexibility. If Ministers are disposed, and I think that this Minister will be, to approach this task in the right spirit, and not to cut corners or to rush, the scepticism that I have expressed today, which has been well represented and, indeed, enhanced by my colleagues, may in due course be converted into support. However, this is a case in which support is not something that Ministers can claim; it is something that they have to earn.

I close on a more personal note. The House would do well to remember that even though these are issues of law and we need to get them right—that is what Committee stage is for—there are real people out there, and even if they now lack mental capacity in the strict sense, they may not lack feelings and they are entitled to our respect. It is for everyone, their granny, their partner or their child. We should recognise too that for all our own confidence and self-assurance now, we may well go down the same road ourselves in the future.

In considering the Bill, with all the concerns that have been expressed, we should as a House collectively resolve to follow the good principles established in clause 1 and to add to them our deepest respect for those who may now lack capacity but were once autonomous human beings as we are, and with whom we, as individual moral agents, share the mystery of a common humanity. We owe them no less than that.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): I declare an interest in that I am a lay member of the General Medical Council, the regulatory body that polices doctors within the UK, advises them on how they should conduct their work, and gives advice on the education and training of doctors.

I support the Bill's aims of empowering adults with impaired mental capacity to make as many of their own decisions as possible and, where that is not possible, of ensuring that there are safeguards in place to protect adults when decisions are made on their behalf. The Bill is designed to cover all areas of decision making. Many organisations have waited a long time for it, and I am pleased that it is as comprehensive as it can be at this stage of the process.

In health-care terms, the Bill sets out how treatment decisions should be approached and, if necessary, taken on behalf of those who lack the capacity to take the decision themselves. Some people believe—wrongly, in my view—that the Bill is about euthanasia. A constituent, Mr. Michael Hill, has lobbied me on numerous occasions about the subject, but I do not accept his argument that the Bill introduces euthanasia and that I should vote against it. I shall be in the Lobby with the Government later this evening.

The Making Decisions Alliance, which comprises more than 30 charities that work daily with people with differing levels of incapacity, also disagrees with the view that the Bill is about euthanasia.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman is correct, but it is worth noting for the record that the I Decide coalition, another group representing disabled people, is opposed to the Bill.

Mr. Barron: I do not doubt that many people oppose the Bill for various reasons. I intend to quote what some groups have told Members of Parliament. I hope that, if the hon. Gentleman wishes to put another case, he will have time to do so.

The Making Decisions Alliance wrote to MPs stating that it does not believe that euthanasia is > "either the intention or a consequence of the proposed legislation. The Government has made clear that euthanasia and physician assisted suicide are both illegal in the UK and will remain so."

I am satisfied with that. The alliance continues:

> "This was confirmed by the Joint Parliamentary Committee which examined the Bill".

No doubt, hon. Members on both sides of the House who were members of that Committee will speak in the debate. I wish that I had been able to hear their speeches before making my own, although it is nice to get a speech out of the way early. The alliance says that that view was also

> "confirmed . . . by Lord Filkin, the Minister responsible for the Bill. The Government has also introduced a clause in the Bill that states 'nothing in this Act is to be taken to affect the law relating to murder or manslaughter or the operation of section 2 of the Suicide Act 1961 (which prohibits assisting suicide).'"

Miss Widdecombe: May I put to the right hon. Gentleman a very simple case? If food is refused to a person, that person starves; if fluid is refused, that person dies of thirst; but if treatment is refused, that person may or may not die. If the Bill permits under the term "treatment" the withdrawal of food and fluid, death will result. That is why some of us claim that a consequence of the Bill, intended or not, is the introduction of euthanasia.

Mr. Barron: I do not agree with the right hon. Lady's analysis. The matter is better decided far closer to the individual in question than through the rhetoric of debate in this place.

Ann Winterton rose—

Mr. Barron: I see the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) rising to intervene. She intervened with a not entirely dissimilar question during a debate in Westminster Hall in 2002. I replied:

> "In some rare cancers, nutrition and hydration speed up the patient's metabolism, hastening death and increasing suffering. It is best that clinicians make the decision in those cases, not us sitting here"—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 22 May 2002; Vol. 386, c. 81WH.]

in Parliament. I still believe that firmly. It is important to talk to clinicians who work in this area. There are occasions when doing what has been suggested is not in the patient's interest and there are other occasions when it is very much in the patient's interest. It is not a decision that I should take, and I do not think that Parliament can do so. We should recognise that.

Mrs. Humble: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the Joint Committee's report, which differentiated carefully and explicitly between food and drink as part of basic care, to which every patient has an entitlement when in hospital? Artificial nutrition and hydration, through case law, has been determined as being treatment. We must be extremely careful not to confuse the two.

Mr. Barron: My hon. Friend is right. I read the Joint Committee's report quite a few months ago. The distinction must be made. Perhaps the Chamber is not the best place in which to draw the distinction.

As I have said, I am a member of the General Medical Council. It welcomes the Bill. It believes that it can enhance the right of patients who lack the capacity to decide issues for themselves. It believes also that it will clarify the role and responsibility of doctors and others who care for those people. Of course, the council recognises that this is a complex and sensitive area that overlaps with other legislation and common law. Further issues are being raised by the judgment concerning the GMC's guidance called "Withholding and Withdrawing Life-Prolonging Treatments: Good Practice in Decision-Making" as a result of the case that was brought against it by the state on the application of Oliver Leslie Burke versus the GMC. I shall speak about that judicial review and the potential implications that it may have for this legislation.

We should examine how the Bill will interface with other pieces of legislation. The GMC has some questions, as will hon. Members, about some of the issues that will arise. There is a need to clarify the protection for patients who lack capacity and are compliant with the treatment that is offered. The draft Mental Health Bill provides for formal reviews and inspection of services that are provided without consent. There is no parallel in the Bill that is before us. There is a concern that patients who are treated under the Bill will have fewer safeguards and protections. We must ensure that proper mechanisms are in place for taking and reviewing decisions and auditing services, which have been highlighted in the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights involving the patient detained by the Bournemouth community and mental health NHS trust. I know that the Minister said in an intervention that that took place last week. I have not seen a report of the full judgment but that is an issue that will have to be addressed by the Government while the Bill is considered in Committee.

There needs to be clearer provision for people aged 16 and under 18 years of age. Those in that group will have rights under the Bill, which I hope will be enacted, and under the Children Act 1989. There needs to be greater clarity when it comes to which legislative framework will take precedence in a certain range of circumstances. Clarity is also needed in relation to some powers and rights—for example, the power to appoint a person with lasting power of attorney, or to make an advance decision statement, being accorded only to people aged 18. There are issues involving interaction with other legislation and they will have to be clarified.

I move on to the impact of the judicial review in terms of the legislation that was brought forward in 2000, or the potential impact of the judicial review on the GMC guidance, to which I have referred. The GMC has welcomed much of Justice Munby's judgment, but has decided to appeal as it is concerned that certain key issues remain unclear. It has a duty to provide doctors with clear guidance to assist them in their decision making, but with the outcome of the judicial review uncertain, it is particularly difficult to judge the effect of the case on the Bill. However, the following matters raised in the judgment are also covered in the Bill. The first is the issue of best interest, which has been raised on numerous occasions, and the second is that of intolerability.

Mr. Justice Munby states that intolerability should be the touchstone for best interests, in deciding whether to provide an incapacitated patient with life-prolonging treatment. One of the principles on which the Bill is based is that decisions should be taken in the best interests of the incapacitated person, as set out in clause 1(5):

> "An act done, or decision made, under this Act for or on behalf of a person who lacks capacity must be done, or made, in his best interests."

The Bill also defines the issue that is to be considered and the people who must be consulted in determining what would be in that person's best interests. These are set out in clause 4(5) and—importantly, in the context of medical decisions—they include:

> "the person's past and present wishes and feelings,
> the beliefs and values that would be likely to influence his decision if he had capacity, and > the other factors that he would be likely to consider if he were able to do so."

These provisions do not include the test of whether an option would be intolerable. I assume that the Bill would need to be amended to accommodate a test of intolerability as a measure of best interest in the context of life-prolonging treatment. This issue is quite fresh; the judicial review was granted only a few months ago, and it will now be appealed in the courts. This will have an impact on the interpretation of best interests in this particular case.

Mr. Hammond: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain his understanding of what the Minister said earlier in relation to decisions expressed by an individual lacking capacity before the event? In response to an intervention about suicidal intent, I think that the Minister said that it was inconceivable that an intent expressed earlier would be binding on a clinician in such circumstances. Is it the right hon. Gentleman's understanding that the Bill proposes that, in every case following a suicide attempt, any earlier decision that purported to refuse treatment would automatically be invalid as a result of that suicide attempt?

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman asks me a specific question, and the simple answer is that I do not know. Perhaps the Minister will be able to clarify the matter, or perhaps the Standing Committee might be a better place in which to explore it. I am more concerned about the guidelines for clinicians operating out in the field. As I understand it, the situation that the hon. Gentleman has described would be a matter for them.

Mr. Lammy: I should like to clarify this point for my right hon. Friend. The advance decision in such a case would have to be specific and clear to make it valid and applicable. The effect of clause 26 would be that the doctor concerned would have to be satisfied in that regard, and this highly subjective test would mean that there would be a presumption of the preservation of life. On that basis, a suicide note could simply not be valid or applicable.

Mr. Barron: I thank the Minister for that. I understand that the guidance that has been issued to doctors by the GMC is not too descriptive about what the doctor would have to do. The doctor would have to take a decision on each individual case, along with the other people who were involved in it.

Mr. Duncan Smith: We seem to be having this debate by proxy, but as we are into it, perhaps I can use the right hon. Gentleman's time. Other issues are not answered in the Bill. In particular, the doctor concerned will have to make such a decision in a very compressed time scale. If there is a doubt, do we honestly think that the doctor will have time to consider the document, to consider the person who has power of attorney, and to have discussions and consultations? Of course he will not. He will be worried about acting and getting it wrong: about what will happen if he resuscitates and is promptly proceeded against in a court of law. Some serious issues are not answered at all in the Bill.

Mr. Barron: It may be that the progress of the Bill will decide that. The right hon. Gentleman should know better than most in the Chamber that we are here to pass laws, and that the laws we pass are not always accepted out there. Any legislation that we pass will be tested at some stage, and in such areas, it is more likely to be tested than not. Most people would accept that. When we consider the amount of time spent on examining such areas, and on bringing forward the General Medical Council's guidance in 2002, it was inevitable that it would be challenged. It has been challenged, and it is now up for appeal. The General Medical Council is appealing against the Munby judgment, including the view that best interests should be determined on wider grounds than intolerability. It believes that that is quite narrow. I have not consulted the Oxford dictionary for its definition of intolerability, to see how wide it goes, but the GMC believes that it is narrow. Wider issues will come into play.

The judicial review judgment indicates that, within certain constraints, patients have a right to require treatment to be provided for them, either at the time that the treatment is needed or wanted, or in an advance directive. Clearly, that will have a wide impact on the provision of care, including for patients whose capacity fluctuates or who need help to make decisions. Its chief impact on the Bill relates to the use of advance statements. The Bill envisages only circumstances in which a person may make advance refusals of treatment, although a statement of their preferences would be used in determining their best interests. The right to require treatment goes further than that, and the result has been challenged in appeal. The GMC's view is that a judgment as to what medical treatments are appropriate to offer is for a doctor to make. That must take into account not only what the doctor considers clinically to be in the best interests of the patient, which will of course involve taking into account the patient's concerns, values and preferences, but, inter alia, the over-arching duty of care to offer only treatments which are Bolam-compliant, and most importantly, the patient's assessment of his or her own best interests.

Mr. Hammond: The right hon. Gentleman said that a doctor would be required to consider what was in the patient's best clinical interests. My understanding of one of the objections to the Bill is that it is not narrowly defined in relation to what is in the patient's clinical best interests, and that it asks doctors to make a much wider judgment about what is in the patient's general best interests.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman has latched on to two words from a sentence. Given that we have no time constraints this afternoon, let me repeat what I said: the judgment must take into account not only what the doctor considers clinically to be in the best interests of the patient, but the patient's concerns, values and preferences. That is a lot wider than clinical interests. Perhaps he should listen a little.

[Mr. Barron]

Another part of the appeal will be the issue of seeking decisions from the courts. The implications of Mr. Justice Munby's judgment are not wholly clear. It is probable that, as the judgment stands, all decisions to withdraw life-prolonging treatment would be referred to court, unless the decision was taken in accordance with a patient's valid advance directive about the circumstances in which they would refuse treatment. That would be the case at least until the uncertainties about court referral were clarified in the case law. That matter is also included in the GMC's grounds of appeal. It is relevant to the Bill and the code of practice, which suggest that the Court of Protection would provide > "a judicial forum of last resort to deal with particularly complex decisions or difficult disputes which cannot be resolved in any other way."

Decisions to withdraw treatment are always of the utmost gravity but not always complex or difficult.

I hope that the Bill will be passed, and stress that nobody can legislate to cover every eventuality in the circumstances that we are considering and in future months and years. People who need the Bill, and to have their capacity judged as best as it can be in all circumstances, whose voices have not been heard not only for decades but for centuries, who were once locked away and felt that they had little or nothing to give society, need as much support as the House can give them today.

We should support the measure, with all the question marks. I do not believe that it represents euthanasia by stealth. The organisations in the Making Decisions Alliance would not support such a Bill for one minute. Given that we have waited 15 years and that the Joint Committee has scrutinised the measure, it is time to get on with giving it a Second Reading, considering it further in Committee, sending it out there and leaving it to others. I have no doubt that lawyers will queue up to examine it in future, but we have travelled a long road to get such a measure, which empowers people who have little or no power in our society. Although we may not believe that it is perfect in every way, we have a duty to pass the Bill.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I speak in favour of Second Reading and I want to give some of the reasons for that. Although there are undoubtedly legitimate and honourable concerns, which have been expressed in interventions, many should properly be explored and tackled in Standing Committee and later on Report.

If I were to base my contribution on my mailbag or my e-mails in the past month, my speech would be about euthanasia and the right to life. I do not take those issues lightly; they are crucial moral questions, which undoubtedly and rightly stir strong emotions and feelings in the House and among our constituents. However, like the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), I do not believe that the Bill promotes euthanasia. I would not support it if it did. I also agree with him that it is legitimate and right for this place to debate the common law position that was reached in respect of the Bland judgment. We should explore it, its meaning and whether it is the right position for the law to reach. However, I do not believe that that is a ground for rejecting the Bill out of hand today.

It would be a grave mistake to view the Bill as being about only end-of-life decisions. It is about much more: the quality of a person's whole life. Medical advances may add years to life but only when we put the individual's needs and wishes at the heart of decision making can we be sure that we add life to those extra years.

To view the Bill as dealing with only the end of life would also do a grave disservice to the millions of people in this country who, from birth, after an accident or through an illness, find their capacity to make or communicate decisions impaired, fluctuating or lost.

It would be a grave injustice to those people if the Bill were lost and the inadequate status quo retained. Why do I say that? Earlier, the Minister paraphrased the 1995 Law Commission report, which concluded:

> "The law as it now stands is unsystematic and full of glaring gaps. It does not rest on clear or modern foundations of principle. It has failed to keep up with social and demographic changes. It has also failed to keep up with developments in our understanding of rights and needs of those with mental disability."

As matters stand, the people whom we are considering do not count even as second-class citizens. People who lack capacity are deemed by others to have no legal rights. They become non-people. That leaves the most vulnerable, often elderly people, open to abuse.

The need for reform of the system of proxy decision making for people who lack capacity has been well argued and, as we have heard, explored in detail over the past 15 years. It is one of the most sensitive and contentious areas of social policy, involving fundamental personal rights, issues of personal welfare and life or death decisions. It concerns what many regard as the first duty of any Government—to protect and to enshrine in law the rights of the most vulnerable in our society.

At present, the law is clear about the rights and protections afforded to a person who has the capacity to make decisions for themselves. However, the law is far less clear about the status and rights of people who lack capacity to make decisions for themselves. The Bill would give all those who lack capacity new rights to maximise their preferences on how to lead their day-to-day lives. It has the potential to redefine radically the way in which incapacity is treated in law and in wider society. When the Bill goes into Committee, and I hope that it does, I hope that we will explore how it may be further improved to reinforce the paramount importance of placing the individual at the heart of decision making.

Until now, there has been no legal framework for the type of sensitive advocacy necessary to ensure the delicate balance between individual autonomy and protecting vulnerable adults. While the Bill represents a significant improvement on the present position, it still falls well short when it comes to rights of advocacy support. Instead, it offers a new role—the independent consultee—which at best is a halfway measure. It is not adequate and we could not support it as it stands. I hope that the Minister's willingness to continue consulting and listening will produce changes to the Bill that will extend a right of advocacy to those who are protected by the Bill.

Because of the scope for misunderstanding within this area of public policy and the opportunities that can therefore arise to misrepresent the purpose behind such legislation, the Government were right to publish a draft Bill, which was scrutinised by a Committee of peers and MPs last year. I had the privilege of serving on that Joint Committee with a number of hon. Members who are in the Chamber for the debate and I look forward to serving on the Standing Committee that will examine the Bill.

The Joint Committee expressed strong support for the legislation in its report that was published last November but it made a number of important recommendations to strengthen the safeguards in the Bill. Some of those recommendations have been accepted and I hope that, as the Bill progresses through the House, yet more of the Committee's ideas and recommendations will be accepted.

Some have written to me to urge that I vote against the Bill on the ground that it promotes euthanasia. That is a travesty of the truth. The Bill is not without its flaws but it can and should be improved, not rejected out of hand. I do not believe that organisations such as Age Concern, the Alzheimer's Society, the Down's Syndrome Association, Headway, Help the Aged, Mencap, Mind, the National Autistic Society, Rethink and the many others that support the Making Decisions Alliance would support the Bill unless they saw it as a means of extending the rights and protections of vulnerable people.

There are legitimate concerns—we have heard them already—about the precise effect of the clauses on the powers of deputies and appointees and on advance decisions to refuse treatment. The courts have already recognised a person's right to specify in advance both what treatments they would want and those that they would not want. As we have heard, the recent decision by Mr. Justice Munby in the case of Mr. Oliver Burke has emphasised the importance of doctors following the individual's known wishes. Paragraph 77 of the explanatory notes to the Bill states:

> "Many general forms of advance statement or 'living will' will be important and relevant as 'past wishes' of the person for the purposes of the best interests checklist in clause 4."

Given that the explanatory notes say that such general, non-binding statements should be taken into account, why is it not possible for the Government to accept amendments to the Bill that would give express recognition of such statements? They would be an important further safeguard and reinforce the well established legal right of the individual to give and to withhold their consent to treatment.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the problems that people have with the Bill is the interplay between an individual and someone who has power of attorney on their behalf and who interprets what are considered to be a person's wishes prior to their present condition? That exposes a problem at the heart of the Bill. Legally it is possible that someone may say that they wish not to have treatment, but it has never been possible legally for them to prescribe treatment for themselves. That is the issue. It is the withdrawal of treatment, as decided by the attorney, that causes the problem.

Mr. Burstow: That is undoubtedly an issue that we need to give careful attention to, and to explore in some detail in Committee. Indeed, I was very struck by an earlier intervention by the right hon. Gentleman concerning the courts' role in appointing someone to act in that regard. We must consider carefully whether courts should be able to nominate someone to make such decisions away from the courts. So he has made some important points that need to be considered in Committee, and which should lead to further amendments to the Bill.

On advance refusals and advance directions concerning the form of treatment that a person would like to receive, the Disability Rights Commission points out in its briefing to Members that there is a challenge in providing individuals with impartial advice when making decisions about conditions of which they have no experience when they choose to refuse treatment, or, indeed, when they decide what sort of treatment they might want. Advocacy to explain the reality of living with impairments and health conditions, and of life opportunities, is essential. There is substantial evidence showing that medical professionals are not best placed to provide this advice, due to biased assumptions and discriminatory attitudes towards disabled people and their quality of life, expectancies and chances. I share the DRC's concern, and it is important that we ensure that the Bill addresses the question of sensitive advocacy, independent of those who are closely involved in the decision-making process, not least the commission.

It is said by some who have contacted me that the Bill fails to provide an adequate definition of "best interest" and that it is too vague, particularly in respect of end-of-life decisions. There is of course the perfectly honourable view that there are no circumstances in which death can be in a person's best interest; however, translating that view into practical legislation is another matter. For example, how would such a view affect the delivery of palliative care? When is the line crossed between relieving pain and shortening a person's life? I do not believe it possible or desirable to set such matters out in statute—to second-guess every possible scenario that should be considered when determining what is in a person's best interest. Ultimately, that is a role for the courts in looking at the individual's circumstances at the time and their wishes, feelings and preferences.

The Bill does offer the courts and others important signposts in the statement of principles in clause 1, and in the checklist in clause 4. It is simply not true to say that it does not advance and clarify the nature of best interest; in fact, it provides a framework that hitherto existed only in piecemeal common law. The principles promote a real shift in the attitude toward empowering vulnerable people to make as many of their own decisions as possible. They make explicit the legal presumption of capacity and the need to take all practical steps to support a person in making a decision. They also make it explicit that the decisions taken must be the least restrictive of basic rights and freedoms.

However, there is one further principle that would guard against others making assumptions about the quality of life of a person who lacks capacity. As drafted, the Bill does not address the way in which decisions on behalf of, or actions for, a person who lacks capacity can be affected by the proxy decision maker's biased assumptions about, and discriminatory attitudes towards, disabled and older people. For example, research has pointed to ageist assumptions in the care and treatment of older people, and to the reliance on chronological age as a proxy for a person's recuperative capacity. We should also note the poor practice that has been allowed to develop in respect of "do not resuscitate" orders, which are being used without prior consultation, for example. There is a need for age discrimination legislation that goes beyond dealing simply with employment issues, and which deals with goods and services, not least in respect of health and social care.

Mr. Boswell: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with interest and a good deal of sympathy. There is a clear corpus of legislation against discrimination on the ground of disability. In the hon. Gentleman's view, would someone making decisions with an inbuilt bias—conscious or unconscious—on behalf of a person without capacity already be at risk under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995? Is it necessary to legislate further on this matter?

Mr. Burstow: That, in a way, will be the purpose of the amendments: to get Ministers to clarify whether the law currently provides such protection for people with disabilities. If it does not, I propose an amendment that would ensure that people are not treated less favourably as a result of such discriminatory attitudes and beliefs.

Throughout the scrutiny of the draft Bill it was put to the Joint Committee that a "general authority to act", as it was called in that draft legislation, should be separated from the more formal arrangements needed for authorising major decision making about a person's health, welfare or financial affairs. The Committee recommended "a redrafting of the clauses concerning the general authority in order to clarify that its use is intended to be limited to day-to-day decision-making and emergency situations".

The Government have redrafted the provisions and renamed the clause, but considerable concern remains that its terms are still unclear and too widely drawn. For example, would a paid or family carer be taking an action under section 5—if the Bill becomes an Act—when a person without capacity is being moved from a family home to a residential care home? The Joint Committee recommended that there was a need for a sustained and comprehensive training programme for professionals and a public information campaign for informal carers to be implemented in order to provide the relevant groups with an accurate understanding of what the general authority was all about.

I believe that such a programme of publicity will be essential if the rights enshrined in the Bill are to be realised in practice, but such a programme is not of itself sufficient. There is also a need for independent advocacy and if there are concerns that a person may not have capacity in relation to a particular decision taken at a particular time, the presumption of capacity must mean an assessment of mental capacity. Let me provide an example of what I mean.

A whole host of assessments are made under statutory provision—for example, community care legislation, delayed discharge legislation and mental health legislation—that should be prefaced by an assessment of a person's capacity. We should not treat people who lack capacity as passive recipients of care. It is essential that the Bill plays a part in ensuring that they are not treated in that way in future. I hope that the Standing Committee will have the opportunity to examine how the Bill fits in with existing and future mental health statutes and case law.

Reference has already been made to last week's judgment in the European Court of Human Rights and the Under-Secretary's response was a matter of some concern to me. He suggested that the Department was in a process of consideration, but he did not convey any sense that that consideration would be speedy. It would be useful if, when she replies to the debate, the Health Minister, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), could tell us whether it is the Government's intention to report back to the Standing Committee on the Government's intentions in respect of the Bournewood judgment.

Mrs. Browning: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The Scrutiny Committee made it clear in its report that the Bill should meet the Bournewood gap. Having heard the European Court's judgment in the last week, it is now incumbent on the Government to table amendments to deal with that before the Standing Committee sits.

Mr. Burstow: I could not agree more with the hon. Lady. It is essential that such amendments be tabled. My understanding, on the basis of what others have said, is that the judgment has further widened the gap, not narrowed it. The challenge that the Government face is now even greater and I hope that the Minister will give us some comfort on that matter when she winds up the debate.

The aim of the Bill is clear in seeking to maximise a person's opportunity to make their own decisions. That should also apply to the whole system of lasting powers of attorney, which I want to touch on briefly. The Bill states in clause 4 that donees are required to sign only that they understand the duty imposed on them to act in a person's best interest, but the Bill does not extend the duty to include the principles that are set out in clause 1. Surely it should be an overriding duty to help the person to make their own decisions if they can. The LPAs should apply only when the person cannot make their own decisions. I hope that the Government will entertain amendments in that respect.

The principles should apply not only to LPAs but to enduring powers of attorney—the EPAs that currently operate. There are up to 80,000 of them in place at the moment and many more are drafted and waiting to be registered at some later date. Managing the transition from the EPA to the LPA system will take time, but it must be right for vulnerable people to enjoy the increased protection that the Bill will afford them at the earliest possible moment. That is why it is hard to understand why the Government intend to exclude the workings of EPAs from clause 1 and schedule 4 provisions. Surely, the new higher standards set in the Bill should apply. Particularly where an EPA has not yet been registered, there should be scope for upgrading it quickly to the status of an LPA. The new system must, and does, have more safeguards than the old one. In the evidence given to the Joint Committee, we were told that 20 per cent. of financial transactions under the present system of enduring powers of attorney reveal some abuse. We need a robust and publicised system for monitoring and spot-checking both EPAs and LPAs. Many people would find it hard to understand why the Bill would not allow an individual who is bankrupt to be appointed as a financial attorney but would not provide for a check on whether he or she is on the protection of vulnerable adults list. People on the POVA list have abused, neglected or otherwise harmed vulnerable adults or put them at risk of harm. It must make sense that before signing off an LPA the donor has the right to check the POVA list. Furthermore, it should be a requirement that the Public Guardianship Office check the POVA list. In all cases where the donee is on the POVA list that should alert the office to place the LPA in a high-risk category for monitoring purposes.

I hope that the Minister will be able to respond to my final concern when she winds up. Why is it that the system of appointeeship for looking after benefits will remain outside the principles, protections and safeguards of the Bill? Is that the product of silo thinking, with the Department for Work and Pensions unwilling to engage with this person-centred law reform? It must make sense to have one set of rules and safeguards. How can it be right that benefit appointees will have more powers than court-appointed deputies and attorneys, without any of the safeguards? As well as not having to adhere to the general principles, appointees are not monitored and an appointeeship is revoked only if and when concerns are raised by third parties. If there is no budging the DWP, the lack of clarity about how the two systems will work alongside each other should at least be sorted out. I hope that that can be done.

The Bill has been 15 years in the making. Legislation is needed now to clarify who can and cannot make decisions regarding the personal welfare, health and financial interests of someone who lacks capacity, and to enable people to plan ahead in such situations. The Bill is not perfect, but it provides long-overdue legal rights and protections for some of the most vulnerable people in our society. The Bill has the potential to strengthen the decision-making rights of disabled people. To realise that potential, the Bill should receive a Second Reading so that it can be subject to detailed debate and amendment in Committee. The Bill is about real people, their right to life and their right to a good quality of life. I hope that the House will support it so that we can make it an even better Bill.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I am chairman of the all-party pro-life group, so I speak personally and in that capacity. It is evident from the interventions that we have heard so far in the debate that interest in the Bill is high and that people are taking it extremely seriously. Some of the points that I intend to make mirror some of the interventions and may be the basis of some of the amendments to be tabled in Committee.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) that we need legislation to protect people who lack capacity, but any such legislation needs to be safely and tightly drafted to ensure that they are properly protected. I support the principle of creating a statutory framework to protect those individuals who lack mental capacity. However, I am strongly opposed to those clauses in the Bill that could—I use that word advisedly—introduce euthanasia by omission, and I listened very carefully to my hon. Friend the Minister on that issue when it was raised in interventions. There are many individuals and organisations with legitimate concerns about that issue. When my hon. Friend the Minister responds, I hope that she will clarify the situation as regards the case of Bland. I would like it put on record whether the Bill will enshrine the decision in Bland in legislation.

During the past 12 months, I have met Ministers on several occasions to try to set out my serious concerns and those of others about the Bill. I am grateful to the Government for their willingness to engage with concerned parliamentarians and especially grateful to Lord Filkin and my hon. Friend the Minister. We welcome the important changes that the Government have made to the Bill, especially clauses 58 and 26(2) on advance decisions. Those are not cosmetic changes, as has been suggested in some quarters.

I am disappointed, however, that the Government have so far failed to amend the Bill to meet our concerns about the suffering that will be caused to many incapacitated adults if certain provisions are enacted. I was particularly struck by the powerful representations that I received from organisations representing disabled people. I am not convinced that we are listening to their concerns about the way that the Bill would create an imbalance in legal power between the appointed decision maker and the person deemed to be without capacity.

I accept the tremendous job done by carers. I have two grandsons who have a physical disability so I am well aware of the contributions made by carers, but who are we trying to protect in the Bill—carers or mentally incapacitated adults? Surely, it must be the latter, and I fear that organisations promoting the Bill, in particular the Making Decisions Alliance, may be paying too much attention to the needs of carers and too little to the needs of those who lack capacity.

Last week, I was struck by the fact that Mencap—a key member of the Making Decisions Alliance—criticised the High Court judgment in the case of baby Charlotte on the ground that doctors should not make assumptions about the quality of life of disabled children. The long-term ramifications of that case pale into insignificance beside those of the Bill, and I am surprised that Mencap has not been more critical of the provisions that would allow attorneys and medical professionals to make quality of life judgments about mentally incapacitated adults.

It would be disastrous if the Bill, which has the laudable aim of transforming the lives of mentally incapacitated individuals and their carers, were to become a vehicle for the introduction of euthanasia and assisted suicide. Vulnerable adults who are supposed to be protected by the Bill would be placed at grave risk.

There are three main ways in which the Bill could weaken our legal prohibitions against euthanasia and assisted suicide. First, the Bill introduces legally binding advance decisions to refuse treatment, or living wills, as they are more commonly known. In principle, I accept that an individual can give an advance refusal to treatment and I have no objection to medical professionals upholding a refusal that is recent, well informed and not motivated towards suicide. However, medical professionals should not be legally obliged to respect a refusal that is made on the basis of inadequate information and/or has the aim of ending life.

Legally binding advance refusals of treatment will make it difficult for practitioners faced with the need to make rapid decisions in acute medical emergencies to decide when an advance directive is valid and applicable. Fear of litigation may result in medical professionals withholding appropriate care, with resultant harm to the patient—a comment made in an intervention earlier. That is not about looking after the interests of medical professionals; if doctors and nurses are legally obliged to respect ill-advised, vague but apparently binding advance refusals, it is the incapacitated patient who will suffer.

I ask the House to consider the following scenario. A suicidal patient may prepare an advance directive that clearly specifies that they have taken a particular drug and that they refuse to have their stomach washed out or to receive an antidote. The circumstances and the refusal of life-sustaining treatment have been specifically addressed so the advance directive would appear to be legally binding. Medical professionals would be legally barred from attempting to resuscitate that patient and if the overdose was not fatal the patient could be left with significant permanent and disabling organ damage. It is because of such scenarios that I oppose making advance decisions legally binding.

Mr. Duncan Smith: May I take the hon. Gentleman back to the point that he was making about suicide? I agree very much with what he says, but is he not making the point that the Government have not faced up to the problem that in the case of a suicide those decisions are taken very, very speedily? They talk about provision to challenge the view of the patient who is incapacitated, but that challenge must be a legal one, so it cannot happen at the time. A doctor's judgment to make such a challenge, which turns out to be wrong, may end up with the doctor suffering. That key point is nowhere addressed in the Bill.

Jim Dobbin: I have just been making that point in my contribution, so I agree with the right hon. Gentleman.

When giving evidence to the Joint Committee, Baroness Finlay of Llandaff—an expert in palliative medicine—said:

> "Advance refusals are very helpful for communicating with patients. It is terribly helpful as an idea of what patients want. My concern is that they are legally binding and then you have to sit back and watch something happen that you just feel terribly uncomfortable with."

I agree with that.

According to an independent survey of doctors conducted by Opinion Research Business for Right to Life in May last year, 76 per cent. of doctors indicated that they shared the concern of the House of Lords Select Committee on Medical Ethics that patients could deprive themselves of medical treatment developed after they had signed their directives. Almost half the doctors polled—49 per cent.—would seek advice from a colleague if they had an advance directive saying "no tube feeding" and were unable to confirm the directive at the time of treatment. Most doctors—71 per cent.—claimed that they would disregard an advance directive in circumstances where they felt it would cause harm to the patient or did not seem to apply.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman is making a very important point. He may agree that, in Committee, we need to look carefully at the definition of advance directives and what they can allow. It is one thing to have an advance directive that indicates a person's preference in the period leading up to death; it is quite another thing for someone to express a preference that will result in death when it would not otherwise happen.

Jim Dobbin: Yes, that is why I hope that all these issues will be clarified in Committee.

The Bill's proposals on advance decisions could force medical professionals to remove life-sustaining nursing care, including food and fluids, and medical treatment from mentally incapacitated individuals, thereby causing death. That can hardly be said to enhance the interests of those who lack capacity.

The second way in which the Bill could weaken our legal prohibition on euthanasia and assisted suicide is through its provisions on lasting powers of attorney. Those provisions will cover health care as well as financial matters and allow third-party or proxy decision makers to direct medical professionals not to treat a patient. Those proxy decision makers will also be able to direct medical professionals not to provide life-sustaining treatment when they have been granted such authority by the patient when competent. Under clause 6(5), medical professionals may be acting unlawfully if they do anything that conflicts with what the attorney has decided.

There will certainly be circumstances where the mentally incapacitated patient's family will benefit financially from his death. Under the Bill, the proxy decision maker will have the power to refuse treatment, so hastening that patient's death. That possible conflict of interest is not addressed in the Bill. The attorney's decision must be respected even though it is the patient, not the attorney, who stands to suffer from the decision. We are all well aware of the pressure under which doctors and nurses work in the NHS. I fear that, when they would like to challenge an attorney's decision, hospital staff will simply not have the time and resources to do so. I am afraid that the Government have yet to address the problems associated with lasting powers of attorney.

The third way in which the Bill could weaken our legal prohibition on euthanasia and assisted suicide is in its definition of best interests. It is argued that decisions made for, or on behalf of, those who lack capacity must be in their "best interests", thereby providing an important safeguard against abuse and the practice of euthanasia or assisted suicide. Best interests constitute the over-arching concept in the Bill. The Government regard the best-interests test as objective, but I disagree. At present, the Bill's definition of best interests is dangerously subjective, with too much emphasis on an incapacitated patient's wishes or what somebody else imagines will be his or her wishes.

Consider the following scenario: medical professionals wish to treat a patient who lacks mental capacity, but they come up against a relative or friend waving a piece of paper appointing him or her as attorney with authority to refuse medical treatment. The attorney instructs the medical team to stop treating the patient, telling the team that that is what the patient would have wanted; it is in his or her best interests. Unless the definition of best interests in clause 4 makes it clear that the consideration of best interests must take into account the person's life and health in so far as they could properly be the object of health care, I cannot understand how the medical team could overrule the attorney's instructions in my scenario. Decisions that are clearly contrary to the patient's medical or clinical best interests but reflect other people's wishes and feelings will be made. The Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000 is much stronger on this point and refers to the patient's "benefit". I hope that we can take that on board in Committee.

If our aim is the protection of vulnerable adults who lack mental capacity, we are not going the right way about it in the Bill. Let me give another example. Clause 31(5) authorises non-therapeutic medical research on the mentally incapacitated. Allowing research to be conducted on mentally incapacitated individuals that does not actually benefit them does not fit well with the underlying principle in the Bill that acts done for or on behalf of a person who lacks capacity must be done in his or her best interests. Perhaps the Minister could elucidate that further.

If the Government want to strengthen protection for vulnerable adults and prove their frequently expressed opposition to euthanasia—I accept the sincerity of that—I urge them, as a minimum, to insert a clause making it clear that the Bill gives no statutory authority to any decision made with the purpose of causing the death of the person about whose personal welfare the decision is made. Such a clause would make it crystal clear that the Bill does not permit euthanasia and would build on the welcome declaratory provision in clause 58.

An amendment to clause 60 is needed to ensure that the definition of treatment excludes food and fluid, howsoever delivered, in order to prevent patients from being deliberately killed by dehydration and starvation. The recent High Court judgment in the Leslie Burke case declared that current General Medical Council guidance on the withdrawal or withholding of food and fluid delivered by artificial means is unlawful in some cases. As the Bill reflects that current GMC guidance, it must now be amended.

We must not forget that the pro-euthanasia lobby sees the withdrawal and withholding of treatment and care from non-dying incapacitated patients as the first step towards the legalisation of euthanasia. Helga Kuhse, past president of the World Federation of Right to Die Societies, and a leading contemporary ethicist, has said:

> "If we can get people to accept the removal of all treatment and care—especially the removal of food and fluids—they will see what a painful way this is to die and then, in the patients best interests they will accept the lethal injection."

The Government's assurances about the Bill's practical implications do not in my view go far enough. The risks of abuse are real. Unless and until I receive further assurances from them, I will be unable to support the Bill today. I intend to abstain and reserve my position until Third Reading, when I will be able to judge whether they have responded to my concerns in Committee or on Report. The legislation will need a fair period for debate, and I hope that they will allow it that.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin). I listened carefully to what he said and agreed with all of it, and in particular with his concluding comments. It was an excellent speech and I hope that he will seal it in an envelope and pass it down the Bench to the Minister for his immediate attention—I certainly would.

This time last week, I did not intend to speak in this debate. Like, I suspect, many right hon. and hon. Members, I had taken the Government's assurances at face value. I was busy drafting letters to constituents with bland assurances that the Bill did not in any way lead to an extension of euthanasia or any consideration of that for those who have to take the decisions. Only when I read my constituents' letters more carefully, before finalising my reply, did I decide to go back and have a long look at the Bill. I did that before, on Maastricht, and look where that got me. I promise my party that I will not make too much of a habit of this, or become more rebellious—well, we will see.

Having studied the Bill, I began to have serious concerns and doubts. I do not usually speak in such debates, so I come with a genuine concern about what I have read. Today, my concerns have grown rather than shrunk as a result of what I have heard both from the Minister and from others on both sides of the House. The key point is that the elephant in the room in this debate is the Bland followed by the Byrne judgment, which the Bill makes no attempt to deal with. I give the Government credit—as I know that the previous Conservative Government tried this and found it too complex—for trying to meet genuine concerns among people who care for those who are incapacitated either temporarily or, arguably, permanently. We need to establish how such people's rights are to be measured and dealt with, and I do not doubt for a moment the Government's good intent. I do not believe that they set out to make euthanasia more applicable or expand its remit, but that does not mean that it may not happen.

The problem is that the Government are creating legislation that will overlay a serious problem, in that the issue of euthanasia is already out of the bag. By omission, we already have the position whereby people can be denied food and liquids as part of their medical treatment, so defined. That issue underlies every single comment that I will make today and that Government Members with similar concerns have made.

The Government have set up a scheme under which a lasting attorney can be appointed to make medical and other wide decisions about the well-being of a patient when that patient becomes incapacitated, as defined in the Bill. I understand that the intention is to enhance the patient's autonomy, but the problem is that patients might have changed their minds, and in many aspects of the legislation it is impossible to take account of that. No matter what has been said, such attorneys have, legally, the power to make decisions on behalf of patients, and one such decision can be to withdraw treatment if they believe it to be the expressed and implicit wish of the patient before they became incapacitated, and that withdrawal of medical treatment can include the withdrawal of fluids and food. In essence, the attorney has the power to send the patient to his death. Nothing in the Bill prevents that.

It is not feasible to say that the doctor will be able to challenge that, because the doctor or other medical staff would have to make such a challenge legally, and in many cases time is of the essence. In an overstretched health service, with NHS staff busy with the next case even as they deal with the current one, no one will want to go down that road. Medical staff will not want to refuse to abide by such a decision, knowing that later they could be charged with assault simply because they applied treatment that the attorney had decided against.

Mr. Lammy: Clause 26 specifically says that the doctor does not incur liability unless he is satisfied that the advance decision is valid and applicable. That is a very high standard in law and, indeed, means that there is a presumption in favour of life. I understand what the right hon. Gentleman said about the Bland decision, and that he would like it overturned, but I wanted to put that on the record, and the fact that the Bill does not alter the current common law position.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I understand what the Minister says but, with respect, the Bill also legislates powerfully for the attorney. It says categorically:

> "A lasting power of attorney is a power of attorney under which the donor . . . confers on the donee . . . authority to make decisions about all or any of the following"—

including their well-being in terms of their medical treatment. The Minister is saying—I suspect that he genuinely believes it—that there is the possibility that medical staff will be prepared to stand by their decisions and take the challenge to the necessary court. Even if that might happen in exceptional circumstances, I suspect that the reality is that it will not because the decision may be marginal, and given the Bland judgment the doctor will not deem it necessary to make that challenge and will not do so. The greatest injustice involving the power of attorney lies in those cases. Although I am not saying that the Minister does not believe his assurances, they do not stack up given the legalities in the Bill.

I am worried about where the measure will lead because examples from the other side of the Atlantic seem to show where we are positioning ourselves. There was a case involving Marjorie Nighbert of Florida, who had given power of attorney to her brother. She later had an accident and was taken to hospital. She was clearly incapacitated and thus unable to make decisions that could change any of her previous views. There was a debate on whether treatment should be withdrawn. The court decided that she was not capacitated although the nursing staff at the time believed that she had given sufficient indication that she wanted to receive fluids and food. Her brother, however, believed that treatment should be withheld because he thought that she would never recover. He said that he believed that because he recalled that while she was watching a programme on the specific issue, she said that if she were ever in such a condition, she would not want medical treatment to continue to be administered. The court upheld that on the basis that it completed the process in which she had been originally engaged and indicated her true intent. Fluids and food were thus withdrawn, and she has subsequently died of either starvation or dehydration, or perhaps a combination of both.

No doubt all hon. Members will say that such a situation could not happen here. However, the Bill opens the door to that process. I was struck by a comment made by Lord Filkin, I suspect in response to Lord Alton and the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton in June. It was conceded that under the Bill, if a person, for example, told his flatmate that he would not want to be resuscitated, that could be considered to be an advance decision to refuse treatment. The Government accepted that such a decision did not have to be written, but could be oral, and that a previous written statement could be elaborated on by an oral opinion, despite the fact that the only person who knew that might be the flatmate or the attorney at the time. There would be no way of checking whether the statement was true.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I was pleased that my right hon. Friend brought the case of Marjorie Nighbert to the House's attention. I understood that she was restrained in her bed to prevent her from raiding other patients' food trays. Unless the Bill makes it absolutely impossible that such a situation could happen in this country, we must vote against it.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My hon. Friend makes his point powerfully. I did not want to take the case any further because I only wanted to illustrate the problem that such protections are not in the Bill. Although we say that such a situation could not happen here, the Bill does not make that clear, so the problem is that we may well find ourselves in that position.

There are also cases in which there are question marks over the motivation of those with power of attorney. The Bill does not deal with the possibility of people obtaining general benefit from an individual's demise after the withdrawal of fluid or foods due to their decision to withdraw medical treatment.

Mrs. Humble: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Joint Committee examined advance directives in great detail and considered how they could be up to date and well informed, rather than being statements made years previously, perhaps before new medical advances were made. He says that he is dissatisfied with the detail in the Bill, but I am not sure whether he has had the opportunity to examine the draft code of practice, which addresses many such issues. I am sure that it would reassure him.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I have looked at the code of practice. I want to return to the question of these wills—as it were—in a moment because the situation has not been sufficiently dealt with or tightened up in the Bill. The code of practice is all very well and good, but I am considering the power that a doctor will have to challenge such decisions given the circumstances in which they operate at the time.

Miss Widdecombe: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the concept of futile treatment appears in the code of practice, which includes assisted food and fluids?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I agree with my right hon. Friend—I always make a point of doing so. That is the reality of the situation.

I return to the original point that I made: the elephant in the room is the position on the withdrawal of fluid and foods. Much of the Bill ignores that single fact, and until it is dealt with in the Bill, as it should be, many of its measures will be dangerous rather than helpful. I simply refer the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) to my earlier comments.

Let me take the question of attorneys slightly further and consider deputies. I am worried about the appointment of deputies who might have no specific knowledge or understanding of the circumstances of the individuals whom they are appointed to oversee if those people have no family or have not appointed attorneys at the time—I think that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) raised this point. It is likely that a deputy will be a social worker of a district. That person is not likely to be medically qualified, but will have the power to make decisions as an attorney, as it clearly says in the Bill.

It is worth referring to clause 4 because we must consider whether someone who does not know a patient's background will be able to reach decisions serving his or her best interests. I remind the Minister that clause 4 lists elements that such a person would need to know. How would a deputy be able to > "consider, so far as is reasonable ascertainable . . . the person's past and present wishes and feelings"?

The present wishes and feelings would not be known because the individual would be incapacitated, and if deputies did not know the individual in the past, they could not take a view on past wishes. However, deputies will nonetheless retain the power to do that. That situation illustrates an additional problem with the Bill—and once again the question of whether food and fluids represent medical treatment is key. The fact that a person who does not know an individual may interpret his or her wishes in the way in which the Bill anticipates is a strange concept.

Mr. Lammy: I hesitate to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but he is confusing the roles of attorneys and deputies. It is important to emphasise that an attorney will be appointed by a person who has capacity yet worries about lacking it in the future. It will most often be the case that the attorney will have been married for many years to the person who comes to lack capacity. A deputy is a person appointed, and consistently scrutinised, by the court who will be given more restricted powers under the Bill to ensure that several of the problems that the right hon. Gentleman envisages will not arise. An attorney must be given powers by a person when he or she has capacity if decisions such as those that the right hon. Gentleman raises are to be made. It is important that we have clarity on these points.

Mr. Duncan Smith: There is no question of clarity about what the attorney will do, but I simply say to the Minister that that does not change anything. The individual will make legally binding decisions, which is the problem that lies at the heart of the Bill. It would not be a difficulty if we did not face the problem of omission, as the Minister knows, and until that is dealt with straight up in the Bill, he will face the challenge time and time again. All hon. Members will be worried and anxious until the issue is dealt with.

I told the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood that I would address advance directives. I have my reservations about such documents. We said that they should be up to date and deal with the concerns of those who worry about being incapacitated, but they are also incredibly inflexible. Many people worry about being a burden. They may have watched a television programme or heard a radio programme on the subject or know something about someone who has become a burden. They often think of medical treatment in terms of unnecessary intervention, such as resuscitation, which they rightly do not want to happen to them.

Where does it say in the documents that the individual concerned has a positive wish to die by starvation or dehydration? I doubt that that will ever be written into such a document, yet it will be subject to interpretation. Until it is clarified that that option is not available, the individuals concerned will have no understanding that the decision not to have what they consider to be intrusive medical treatment, such as being resuscitated unnecessarily many times or being subject to an intervention that they do not want because it would lead to them being a burden, will cause their demise—their death—as a result of withdrawing the very essentials of life. No one will write that in. Again, if the Government want to deal with that, they should ensure that their view is clear to all concerned.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton for mentioning suicide. It is a huge grey area. The Minister said that it would be clear because doctors would not necessarily accept the decision made in the case of a suicide even if a living will had been made prior to the suicide attempt. I am in no way as confident. It is a matter of dispute whether a doctor in that pressured moment will make the sort of decision that may lead to them facing a court for whatever reason, perhaps because they have carried out medical treatment that the person later says was intrusive and wrong and that they had specifically said should not happen.

The second consideration is what happens in the case of an individual who knows of the living will, who is present at the time of the suicide and who does not call the ambulance because it is their understanding that that is the wish of the person committing suicide. We know from doctors that the vast majority of suicide cases are not about wanting to die, but are cries for help. Most want to live. That is the reality. Very few head off in a suicide attempt deliberately to die. They do it because they need help. If they made a living will earlier and someone interprets it incorrectly, does that not give that person a reason not to follow through because they think that that is the expressed belief? There are concerns about advance directions—the living wills—that may lead to the wrong decision being made in a number of cases.

The Government have also not dealt with the problem of research. The Bill changes accepted practice. In almost every case, intrusive research takes place if it is of benefit to the patient. We are going to allow an individual who is not able to express his views or opinions, and who is subject to other people's views and opinions, to have research carried out on him—albeit reasonable and likely to be negligible and not unduly invasive or restrictive—that is not necessarily undertaken as a benefit to that patient.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. Friend raises a difficult issue. I hope that he will forgive me, but I do not entirely agree with him. The question of whether research should be carried out has been resolved between the doctors and the relatives, and research has taken place in circumstances in which it was of no direct benefit to the patient. The Government are trying to codify that while providing safeguards. In the process, they have highlighted the stark reality that we have tolerated an ethical system that may be highly questionable.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I accept my hon. Friend's view, but the Bill codifies something that is fundamentally wrong. Such action could have been challenged previously, but it will be impossible to do that in future. Whether the Government set out with good intent is not the issue. The problem is that they are locking into legislation bad practice that is not in the best interests of an individual who is incapacitated and unable to make the decision. Whether we are dealing with the withdrawal of fluids and food or research on an individual, the simple test is whether we, as people who are conscious and able to make such decisions, would allow those procedures to be carried out on us. I guess that the answer to that would be no in most cases. Why should it be any more the case that the wish of an incapacitated individual should be overridden in such a way? That is where the Bill falls down.

There is another point to consider, which the Government may not have picked up. It is clear that there is a contradiction between road traffic legislation and the Bill. There may be problems with where the truth lies. Listening to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and other hon. Friends, it appears that there are serious contradictions, which I hope the Government pick up before the Bill makes it to law, if it ever does.

As I said, I did not come to the Bill with existing deep or profound views. I simply read it and discussed it with others over the past four or five days. I reason that there are so many fundamental flaws at its heart that we cannot allow it to go through as it stands. To do so would make the problems that we face worse, not better. I understand that the Government are trying to sort out the problems and that for 15 years, as others have said, we have needed to find a way to protect those who are incapacitated across a range of issues and problems, but until we deal with the single fact that euthanasia is not just by commission, but is also by omission—until the Government wrestle with that problem and put it down once and for all—we will have a deeply flawed Bill that could lead to serious hurt to those who need our help and not our condemnation.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I declare a number of interests. I am a member of the all-party pro-life group. I served as a Samaritan for 18 years. I have also for five years been the carer of somebody who is severely disabled.

I support legislation that will safeguard the interests of adults who lack mental capacity. Those organisations that have been campaigning for the Bill are rightly concerned with the deficiencies in the law that have left people open to abuse and exploitation. I hope that the Bill eventually remedies those deficiencies.

As for the day-to-day care of those who lack mental capacity, the Bill seeks to provide legal safeguards that they do not currently enjoy. Tightening up the oversight of financial affairs of those lacking mental capacity is long overdue. Giving carers greater confidence in their legal standing when looking after those who lack capacity—perhaps by dressing them, washing them and providing medication—is also welcome.

There are positive elements in the Bill. However, I shall not focus on those. Instead, I want to consider how it deals with end-of-life decision making. That is incredibly fraught and complex. If vulnerable adults are not to be placed at risk, it is imperative that we get the parts of the Bill that deal with end-of-life care right. We have some way to go. Like many colleagues on both sides of the House, I fear that unless the Bill is amended, it will leave the door open to the legalisation of euthanasia and assisted suicide. That would be disastrous.

Like many colleagues in the House, I wish that I could talk in the abstract about measures in the Bill. I wish that I could make a speech like that of the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), which was quite eloquent and adequately described everything that I wanted to say. But I cannot. I want to talk about the experiences of my mother, who lived for five years in total paralysis.

In 1990, my mother had a massive bipolar stroke. For those who do not know what that means, she was completely paralysed from the roots of her hair down to her very toes. She could not drink; she could not speak; she could not eat; she was doubly incontinent. It sounds pretty horrific, and it is. It is horrific for the individual who is in that condition and it is awful for the carers and people in the family who have to look on. Who would want to see their relative in such an appalling state? It is frightful. All one wishes is that the doctor's hypothesis is correct and that the person quickly succumbs to some bronchial condition. People in such a condition lose the facility to swallow and so fluid eventually enters their lungs and they drown in it. As a relative of someone in that condition, one hopes that that will happen sooner or later.

My mother is an incredibly obstinate woman, and despite all medical pronouncements she survived that appalling stroke and gradually recovered her capabilities and capacity. Once she was better, she came to me and said, "I never, ever want to be put in that position again. If that happens to me again, I want you to do everything you can to make sure that I leave this world as quickly as possible." She produced a legally binding advance directive, with which I was very happy and I signed up to it.

We lived with my mother in a marvellous condition for five years until she succumbed to another massive stroke. It was exactly the same as the first one, only there has been no recovery from it. She was admitted to hospital in a state of semi-coma and I went to see her. Like the previous time, she had lost all capacity to speak, and she was put on a drip. I am an engineer, not a medical person, and I am just a daughter. I thought that the drip was some magic fluid that delivered everything. If one speaks to normal people, one finds that they are not sure about it. I thought that the drip delivered everything including food—a little like an aqueous Complan, as it were. I was told that it was keeping my mother hydrated and comfortable.

I went to the doctor and said, "My mother doesn't want to be kept comfortable, actually. She has a legally binding advance directive and her wishes are that she be taken off the drip." This man—God bless him—said, "No, we won't be doing that for some days. We expect your mother to succumb very quickly and we want to make sure she is comfortable until she does so"—recognising that hydrating a body is absolutely essential to keeping somebody comfortable. I cannot and never will sanction or support any measure that results in the dehydration of an individual. It is absolutely inhumane to allow somebody to die of thirst. We collect money to stop that happening in Africa, yet we sit here about to agree that it is perfectly acceptable for people of diminished responsibility. That is unacceptable to me.

Although my mother was in a semi-coma, I felt sure when I was able to look at her as the days passed that, just as before, she was fully conscious and fully aware of what was going on. It was immensely difficult to convince any of the medical staff that, although my mother was totally paralysed, I felt that in her heart of hearts she was still with us. I described her condition as "just like us, only she can't eat, she's totally paralysed and she can't talk." We should look not at the body but at what lies beyond it.

I spent weeks going backwards and forwards trying to get the doctors to agree with the legally binding directive and to get people to see that my mother was not in a permanently vegetative state. I had been told that it was impossible for her to be in any other state given her condition. As the weeks went by, my mother survived, despite all the protestations, and she was moved. I became convinced that she was fully aware of what was going on, but because she could not speak it was very difficult for me to secure concrete proof of that. Total paralysis means that one cannot even move an eyebrow or blink when one wants to. As the weeks went by, my mother remained on a hydration drip, and I slowly but surely became convinced that she could blink to order. As time passed, I realised that she was certainly doing so and was able to prove that, in fact, she was fine. Inside the body that had deserted her, she was fine.

As that was happening, doctors came to me once again and told me that I needed to think about food for my mother. I said, "What do you mean food? She has that hydration drip." They said that she had not had any food for the previous 15 weeks. My mother had been very overweight and had lost a lot of weight, but I thought that that was because of her condition. I did not think that she was being starved to death.

Doctors asked me to think very seriously about the matter, because they thought that if they gave her food she might survive for quite a long time, and that not doing so might hasten her death. I went to my mother that evening to talk to her about whether she wanted to live. I sat down next to her bed and said, "We have choices to make, Mum. Tomorrow, they want to operate on you, insert a peg and you'll receive food. If you say yes to that, there is a likelihood that you will live for quite some time. If you say no, you will die of starvation. You'll be quite comfortable, though, because I'll make sure that you're hydrated and you won't have this terrible thirst." People who cannot drink have unimaginably dry mouths. It is horrific. Hydration is desperately needed. I used to swab my mother's mouth with damp cotton just to keep her comfortable.

I made sure that my mother understood what I was saying. I had a nurse with me—a lovely woman who sat next to me and who was present for the conversation. In the morning, I went back to my mother and she blinked out, "I want to live." I had to go to the doctor and say, "My mother has now given permission; get on with the operation, please." There was a legally binding directive, which was made following the most appalling stroke, and five years later an individual who had been struck down with the exact same condition was saying, "I have changed my mind."

If my mother had not had me, all I believe would have happened is that she would have starved to death. I do not think that anybody would have taken the time or known her well enough to realise that she was actually present and capable of making decisions. We make so many judgments on behalf of people who are incapable of making them themselves. That is disastrous. It would have been disastrous in the case of my mother; she would have died. She did not want to die; she wanted to live. She exercised the choice of changing her mind. It is almost impossible for us to know what we would be like under any given circumstance until that circumstance has arisen. It is absolutely wrong of us—the able-bodied and the able-minded—to take that right away from an individual.

My mother was put on an automatic feed. The Bill describes that as medical treatment. My mother did not need any medical treatment to stay alive—she needed water and food. Her body did not need anything else. She lived for five years in that condition. She was a grandmother for five years; she was my mother for five years. I would argue that in many ways they were the best five years of her life.

I fear the effect of some of the omissions from the Bill. I fear what they mean for people like my mother—wrecks of bodies, voiceless bodies. I do not want us to do anything that takes those rights away—nothing. I could not possibly agree to that. Nobody sitting in this Chamber today could agree to it if they had been with me on this journey. It is right that we have discussions and pass Bills to enhance the rights of people such as my mother and the thousands of people in this country who find themselves in a similar position, but we have to be very careful when we do that. We must not take liberties.

[Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas]

We must not take decisions away from people who cannot speak and presume that, because they cannot speak, we know better. We do not know better.

I will not support the Bill today; I will abstain. I want to see whether some of the amendments that the pro-life group are eager to promote will be accepted. If they are, and if I can read them knowing that people like my mother are protected and have the quality of life that they have a right to, I will be able to support the Bill on Third Reading. If not, I do not intend to let down my mother or the thousands of people in this country who are in the position that she was.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): It is a great privilege to follow the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas). The House listened in absolute silence to what she had to say. It was very personal, very emotional and true.

I have always considered the Bill to be a mixed bag. It is like the curate's egg—good in parts. However, in listening to the debate, especially the Minister's contribution, I have come to the conclusion that it is far more dangerous than I first thought. I am grateful for the fact that the hon. Member for Crosby spoke before me because I was privileged to have her support when I introduced my private Member's Bill, the Medical Treatment (Prevention of Euthanasia) Bill, in 2000. These issues were fully debated at the time, and the hon. Lady played a major part in debates both in the Chamber and in Committee.

At the time, I was accused of scaremongering because I referred to the suffering caused to patients by the withdrawal of food and fluids, however delivered. I was also ridiculed when I said that I was of the opinion that the withdrawal of assisted food and fluid, thus ending the life of a patient, is in breach of article 2 of the European convention on human rights. I am therefore deliberately beginning my speech by quoting the case of Mr. Leslie Burke. I know that he has been mentioned before. Mr. Burke challenged the legality of the General Medical Council guidelines that permit doctors to withdraw treatment, including assisted food and fluid, from mentally incapacitated patients. The guidelines are reflected in the Mental Capacity Bill, and I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Disability Rights Commission supported Mr. Burke in his legal challenge.

When Mr. Justice Munby of the High Court family division ruled in favour of Mr. Burke, he stated that the guidelines are in breach of articles 2, 3 and 8 of the European convention on human rights. The all-party parliamentary pro-life group has consistently maintained that the GMC guidelines are in breach of article 2, which states:

> "No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally".

That was one of the main points that we made in our submission to the GMC when it was receiving evidence on the issue. Moreover, among the points raised by Mr. Justice Munby was the fact that the withdrawal of assisted food and fluid from patients can cause pain, discomfort and extreme distress that results from malnutrition and dehydration. That is another crucial point that I and others have made persistently over the years.

There is no purpose in pretending that the withdrawal from a non-dying patient of assisted food and fluid, which is defined as treatment in clause 60, is not euthanasia. Professor Sheila McLean, a leading euthanasia lawyer, has made it clear that it is. In her paper published in the Voluntary Euthanasia Society of Scotland newspaper in April 1996 she described the Bland judgment that allowed the withdrawal of treatment, including food and fluid, to end the lives of those in a persistent vegetative state, as a form of involuntary euthanasia. Perhaps not so curiously, Professor McLean was a member of the drafting committee of the British Medical Association guidelines on withholding and withdrawing life-prolonging medical treatment that advocated the withdrawal of treatment along the lines adopted in the Bill.

Let us be clear about this: in justifying such treatment we have seen any number of words and phrases being given new meanings. One, which has already been mentioned, is the term "futile treatment". I would not want to see any patient, and certainly no patient that I loved, having futile treatment inflicted on them. To me, that means giving people treatment that can no longer help them, such as pumping a patient full of antibiotics when they are drawing close to death or operating on a cancer patient when there is no hope of curing or relieving the disease, but food and fluid, however delivered, have never been thought of as a treatment to cure a stroke, Alzheimer's disease, Hodgkin's disease or anything else. Such an idea is patent utter nonsense.

Food and fluid are, as the hon. Lady said, basic care that relieves hunger and thirst. What she did not say is that they prevent a patient from dying from starvation and dehydration. However, in some cases, such as advanced cases of Alzheimer's disease, assisted food and fluid are being described as futile treatment which can be withdrawn, when in fact what is meant is that the patients are considered to be futile—in other words, people who are not worth feeding. If Members of the House checked with the Disability Rights Commission they would find that an increasing number of disabled people are becoming more and more frightened of being admitted to hospital. With the growing ethos that some patients are not worth treating—that they are futile—that is hardly surprising, and it should be brought to a halt by ensuring that the definition of treatment in the Bill excludes food and fluid, however delivered.

Another aspect of the Bill that I find frightening is that relating to the definition of "best interests". According to the Bill, this refers to the patient's wishes or, even worse, what somebody else considers would be the patient's wishes. Nowhere does the Bill refer to health or life, and it would allow decisions to be made that are clearly contrary to the patient's medical or clinical best interests. It is interesting that Scotland's Act, which is not without flaws, is a vast improvement on the Bill before us. The Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000 refers to the patient's benefit. Why, I ask the Minister, can we not have the same simple and straightforward definition in the Bill?

The Scottish Act also differs greatly from the Bill in the matter of legally binding advance directives. The Act makes no reference whatever to such directives. As far as Scotland is concerned, they simply do not exist—yet for some unknown reason they are to be foisted on the English and Welsh public. That is even more surprising in view of the fact that in 1994 the House of Lords Select Committee on Medical Ethics, which considered euthanasia, also examined in depth the whole issue of advance directives—or living wills, as they are popularly called. The Committee took into account not only the right of patients to indicate what they would like to happen in given circumstances, but the very real dangers of making living wills legally binding in statute law. In its report, it welcomed the concept of advance directives, but advised against their being made legally binding in statute law.

Apart from the fact that old and mentally incapacitated people could well be manipulated into signing a document, because no one wants to be a burden, there is the real danger, no matter how carefully the law is framed, of people not really having a clear understanding of what they are declaring. For example, most people imagine that patients who have suffered severe strokes will simply die if not treated, but that is not so. Some years ago, Professor Peter Millard, then professor of geriatrics at St. George's hospital in London and president of the British Geriatrics Society, explained to a meeting of MPs and peers that a high proportion of people survive; those affected, if they are not given vigorous treatment after the stroke through which they often regain the capacity to move and walk, simply become very crippled and will, in all probability, lead extremely painful and limited lives, which could be avoided through early treatment following the stroke. That type of problem is recognised by many doctors. In the biggest and most recent survey of doctors on the issue of euthanasia, more than 71 per cent. said that there were circumstances in which they would refuse to follow an advance directive. Their concerns mirror those of MPs who oppose some aspects of the Bill.

In the Scottish legislation, all reference to legally binding advance directives has been omitted. Whatever reason is given for that, I can tell the House that the Scottish National party has an official policy of opposing the concept of legally binding advance directives because of the dangers, and it was pretty obvious that the party was prepared to do battle if such a clause were included in the Scottish Bill. I return to the thorny questions of why in Scotland is the definition of "best interests" so much stronger, and why we are being saddled with legally binding advance directives, which for so long have been an objective of the euthanasia lobby in this country.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Does my hon. Friend not think that the problem is that the Government are refusing to face the implications of the Bland judgment and of what is now happening in hospitals up and down the country? The difference between "benefit" and "best interests" is dramatic: use of "best interests" leaves the provision wide open to be defined by those who have power, rather than actually in the best interests of the patient in question.

Ann Winterton: My right hon. Friend made a strong speech earlier and he makes a pertinent point now. I am sure that those who read the debate in Hansard will agree with that point, as do I.

With hon. Members on both sides of the House I have been involved in the pro-life fight in Parliament for many years. One of the most common tactics that we have encountered has been the fight to make changes to the law because of complaints about differences between England and Scotland. For example, in 1991 the BMA claimed that in Scotland it was able to apply to the procurator fiscal to obtain permission to withdraw treatment from patients in a persistent vegetative state, and that it was ridiculous to have such a difference in law between the two countries. However, when inquiries were made with the Lord Advocate's Department in Scotland, we learned that no such process existed and that, in any case, the procurator fiscal would not be allowed to make such a decision. The story does not end there. Shortly after the Bland judgment was given, a campaign began in Scotland claiming that in England applications could be made to the court to have treatment, including food and fluid, withdrawn from PVS patients—and, yes, it was ridiculous to have one law for England and Wales and another for Scotland. Not long after, the Law hospital case in Scotland resulted in a verdict similar to the one in the Bland case. I can envisage precisely the same scenario being played out around the definition of "best interests", with the Scots being told that patients' wishes are being denied and that they are being denied an opportunity to choose because advance directives are not to be made legally binding.

I warn the House that we are dealing with an ultra-cynical lobby, which will not stop with the Mental Capacity Bill. It will see the Bill as an opening of the door to legalised euthanasia by commission. If we are to retain the smallest vestige of respect for human life, we must not allow the Bill to pass without radical amendments to prevent the introduction through the back door of euthanasia by omission. Let me make it clear that I support certain sections of the Bill. Throughout, the all-party pro-life group has supported the principle of creating a statutory framework to protect those who lack mental capacity. Earlier, I had thought to abstain in any vote this evening, but having heard some of the speeches, I have concluded that parts of the Bill are inherently wicked and I have no path to take other than that of opposing it. I trust that in Committee, those radical amendments to which I referred are made. If they are, no one will be more pleased than I will.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I am concerned. I am following four measured contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House, all of whom spoke coherently and cogently, whose interpretations of the Bill are not the same as mine. My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) recounted her heart-rending personal story—heart-rending, but in many ways uplifting, when she spoke of the positive impact of her mother's illness. I am deeply concerned that the legislation can be interpreted in such different ways, and I say to my hon. Friend the Minister that he must examine that problem.

I asked the Minister at the start of his speech to confirm that the Bill will not introduce euthanasia. I accept what he said, as do the Front-Bench spokesmen for the main Opposition parties, but, like many hon. Members, I have been receiving correspondence from constituents who do not accept that, and this evening I have listened to speeches from MPs who do not accept it. The Bill has been amended. Clause 58 has been inserted to make it clear that the Bill will not introduce euthanasia—and it does make it clear to me, yet still we have heard about individuals who do not accept that. The message for the Government has to be that the issue must be taken away and examined. All legislation must be clear in its purpose and intent, but this Bill more than any other has to be very clear indeed.

Having had the privilege of serving on the Joint Committee that scrutinised the draft Bill, I fully support the aims of the legislation. I see it as helping the 2 million people about whom the Making Decisions Alliance talks. There are many people who have been campaigning for many years to get legislation in the form of the Bill on the statute book. We should use our best endeavours to protect those people who lack capacity to make decisions. We also need to give reassurances to those who have genuine concerns.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the clarity with which she sets out the position. Does she agree with me that all doctors take the Hippocratic oath, which is an important oath, and all doctors have a duty of care? Any doctor seeking to end life would be in breach of that duty of care and would have carefully to consider the risk of charges of manslaughter and gross negligence. My hon. Friend will have heard hon. Members who take a strong position on the Bland decision. She will have heard me saying that the Bill does not seek to alter common law. In the Bland case—I was involved in many cases following Bland in my early legal career—and in others, extremely difficult decisions are made around personal autonomy, quality of life and dignity of life in the end stages. Hon. Members will have strong opinions on that. That, however, is the issue that remains between us.

Mrs. Humble: I thank the Minister for his intervention. I agree with his statements about the role of the doctor. Members of the Joint Committee have received assurances that we are not changing the law. Common law has already been set in respect of advance statements and so-called living wills with regard to treatment through artificial nutrition and hydration.

I still receive letters on these matters. I am speaking against euthanasia. I would not vote for a Bill that brought in euthanasia. Yet my constituents are still writing to me and they become increasingly angry when I say that the Bill is not about euthanasia. They say to me, "Yes, it is." The Minister has a difficult job to do.

Andrew Selous: Has not the hon. Lady touched on the entire problem? Given that there is such widely differing interpretation of the Bill, to which she has quite rightly referred, surely we need to ensure that the Bill is so clear that there cannot be differing interpretations. That is clearly not where we are at at present.

Mrs. Humble: I shall make some suggestions later. During the passage of the Bill, the Government will have to consider some amendments, especially in the light of the more recent court cases. When the Joint Committee was sitting a year ago the situation was different, and hon. Members have referred to the Burke case. We have also had the case of the little baby. Although the Bill does not affect children there is the interface with the Children Act 1989. Hon. Members have talked about 16 and 17-year-olds, but we know that a piece of legislation that deals with people who lack capacity may also have an impact on other pieces of legislation. That being so, it is important that the Bill is clarified during its passage through the House.

The Bill refers to the individual being protected by the letter P. P does not stand for patient; it stands for person. The Bill is about real people living real lives in the community, few of whom will be patients in hospital. I remember that in the course of our deliberations as members of the Joint Committee, we took oral evidence from Catholic bishops and Catholic doctors. A lawyer represented Catholic doctors. In his evidence he was constantly referring to patients, and I interrupted him. I asked whether he would recognise that this draft legislation, as it was then, was about people, most of whom are living their lives in the community in their own homes, care homes or nursing homes, but not in hospital. He said that I had identified a lacuna in existing legislation. That is why we are talking about these matters. That gap in legislation to protect vulnerable people in the community has been there for many years. That is why so many representatives of the disability groups want us to consider the Bill, protect people who lack capacity and consider the best interests of those who have varying capacity.

Hon. Members have talked about the proposed legislation opening the way to many judicial challenges. I see the Bill as opening the way for a change of attitude towards people who lack capacity, so that instead of assuming that somebody, because of their illness, mental state or disability, cannot make decisions, we will assume that they can. It will have to be proved that they lack capacity before someone else can make a decision on their behalf. That will be a major job for government. The Bill is about changing attitudes as much as about changing the law.

In a previous incarnation, prior to 1997, I chaired Lancashire's social services committee, and I met many people with a range of disabilities. The one thing that they said to me was, "Listen to us. Listen to our voice." Interestingly, they would sometimes say, "Don't listen to our parents or to our professional carers, listen to us." That will be a key to the proposed legislation.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that fundamental to the whole process is the need to ensure that where people have capacity, although they may lack capacity for certain decisions, they are empowered to make decisions and to have that capacity recognised?

Mrs. Humble: I agree entirely. My hon. Friend's question brings me on to an issue that I want to explore in a little more detail, and that is advocacy services. I am the president of Blackpool Advocacy. When I was a Lancashire county councillor and chaired the social services committee, I set up the Lancashire advocacy development service. I believe passionately that individuals, who for whatever reason cannot express themselves, need to be heard. When the Joint Committee sat, we explored in great detail the issue of advocacy.

Advocacy can help at so many different levels, and not just when there is a serious dispute. If advocacy is introduced in a preventive way at the beginning, it can sort out many problems. When we were debating independent advocacy as members of the Joint Committee it was clear that people had different ideas about what advocacy meant. Some members had a legal interpretation of it. Others saw existing advocacy services as being there only to represent the interests of the local social services department, and queried their independence.

As someone who has been deeply involved with Blackpool advocacy services, I recognise their independence and professionalism and see how they have given a voice to so many people who cannot speak for themselves. They have encouraged those people to speak for themselves. They have engaged with professionals who have cared for individuals and have ensured that the right decision is made on their behalf.

There will be an annual general meeting in a couple of weeks' time, and I have been swotting up on the work that has been done during the past year. Those involved have even facilitated the marriage of two couples who have learning disability. Their parents did not want them to get married, their carers did not want them to get married and social services did not want them to get married. The advocacy service came in and listened to these people. It was convinced that marriage was what they wanted. They needed a package of support to help them to do that. Advocacy services can be vital.

I am concerned about the appointment of independent consultees, which is set out in clause 34. I am not convinced that the independent consultees, as outlined in the Bill, will fulfil the role that independent advocacy services provide. I am not sure whether the Bill should specify in such detail the times at which the independent consultees should intervene. I know from personal experience that there needs to be flexibility in the system.

Will the Minister look again at the role of the independent consultees? Will they be rivals to the existing advocacy services? Who will fund them? Who will train them? Where will they be recruited from? Why are they to be consultees and not advocates? I hope that the Minister will forgive me for pointing out that he said that an independent consultee would be brought in if the person without capacity did not have family or friends to represent them. Advocacy services get involved even when people do have family and friends, because the family and friends do not always agree with the person being represented. I must make it clear that I am not undermining the huge role that informal carers play in our society. They take on enormous responsibilities, but sometimes what they want for their adult son or daughter is not what that adult son or daughter wants. A properly trained, independent advocate can be of enormous help in such circumstances. I therefore ask my hon. Friend to look again at the role of independent advocacy.

Ms Munn: Is it not the case that an independent consultee would act in the person's best interests, whereas an advocate helps the person to express their own wishes and feelings, which might not be what some people would deem to be in their best interests? They therefore play a completely different role.

Mrs. Humble: My hon. Friend makes a fascinating point, which takes us back to a point made by the Minister earlier. My hon. Friend and I could make an unwise decision, and people could say, "Why did they do that? I don't agree with them." We have to recognise that the individuals covered by the Bill will also sometimes make unwise decisions. The independent advocacy service might well simply say that, although it might seem unwise to everyone else in the room, Mr. X—or P, in the terminology of the Bill—actually wants to make that decision. We have to allow them to make unwise decisions.

My hon. Friend has highlighted the difference between advocates and independent consultees, whose role seems to be to say what is in the best interests of the individual. Such details should be explored at a later stage, but I worry that clause 34(6)(a) says that an independent consultee > "may interview in private the person in relation to whom he has been asked for advice".

I would definitely want them to interview the person in private. I remain convinced that independent advocacy services have a vital role to play, and I hope that the Minister will re-examine the Joint Committee's recommendation that provisions similar to those in section 2 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001 be considered for inclusion in the Bill.

Ninety per cent. of the Bill is excellent. It provides support and safeguards for vulnerable people in the community, but there are one or two areas that the Government need to look at. I have mentioned euthanasia, and we need to consider how the Burke ruling affects the legislation, and whether there are more ways in which the Government can tighten up the wording to ensure that there is no confusion as to their intentions.

I am pleased that the Government have tightened up the provisions on advance directives in the way that the Joint Committee suggested. I have corresponded with Lord Filkin on this matter, and I was reassured by his reply, which stated:

> "The Code of Practice will recommend that advance decisions should be made in writing and witnessed by someone independent, discussed with the health care professional and regularly reviewed and updated."

When a person with a degenerating condition is first told of their illness, they could be so horrified by the prospect of approaching the end of their life that they might make an advance directive without properly thinking through the consequences. They need to seek professional advice on health care in such circumstances, and to review it from time to time. Amazing medical advances are being made, which individuals cannot anticipate, but which they might need to take into account.

[Mrs. Humble]

Research has been mentioned in the debate, and it is an issue that the Joint Committee looked at very carefully. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) talked about individuals being offered up for research. That conjures up nightmarish images for me; I have to say that, when the Joint Committee was considering this matter, I was reminded of Frankenstein images. We received compelling evidence from a variety of people, however, and it was suggested that research into certain conditions can simply involve observing an individual. It does not have to involve anything invasive. We also received assurances about the role of the medical ethics committee. However, the Government will have to look very carefully at the implications of the clauses dealing with this issue.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way, not least because I fear that I did not pay her the same courtesy during my remarks. Will she accept from me, in good faith, that my concern here is about the principle of how these things are to be done and, above all, the basis on which it is to be determined whether they are in the best interests of the individual? The Minister might want to look carefully at the distinction between an activity that is broadly neutral in terms of a patient's welfare—as observation would be—and an invasive action, which would be quite unacceptable unless it could be linked to a specific benefit to the patient concerned.

Mrs. Humble: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, which will need to be explored in the context of remarks made by some of his colleagues about certain existing practices. We have been debating this issue as though it were in a vacuum, but it is not. Doctors are doing certain things now. The courts are making decisions on them now. It is about time that we, as legislators and parliamentarians, discussed the issue. All sorts of things are happening that many hon. Members are entirely unaware of.

I have already mentioned the interaction of the Bill with the provisions of the Children Act 1989, and we need to look at those issues. My final point concerns resources. The Bill will deal mainly with people in the community, and it will concern not only their informal carers but professional carers. There will therefore be resource implications for social services departments and for people in the independent sector who provide social care. An extensive range of training programmes will therefore need to be set up. A general awareness of the issues dealt with in the Bill will also need to be raised, and I hope that that will be one of the positive outcomes of the Bill.

This is an important piece of legislation, and we really must get it right. A lot of people will be affected by it, and we cannot afford to get it wrong. I look forward to having detailed debates on the issues in Committee, so that we can reassure the people who are worried about them, and say to those who have campaigned for the Bill for years that we are at last listening to them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The time available for this debate is not infinite, so perhaps hon. Members will have regard to the interests of their colleagues when making their contributions.

7.9 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I was pleased to serve on the Scrutiny Committee for this Bill, the thrust of which I broadly support. I support particularly the principles outlined at the beginning of the Bill and the assumption of capacity. Like others, however, I have concerns about the Bill, to which I hope Ministers will listen, and I hope that they will be prepared to amend it in Committee.

The Committee recommended that the Government consider the implications of independent advocacy, which the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), a fellow Committee member, has just raised. I support her concerns because I do not share the Government's view that there is already adequate independent advocacy to meet the challenge of the Bill. If the Bill is to work, it must mean more opportunity for more people to access independent advocacy, which must be of the best quality, from people in sufficient numbers, to deal with casework in a timely fashion. All the logistical implications of the Bill, in terms of the demand for independent advocacy, can only be met if the Government clearly identify that more resources will be directed throughout the country to provide advocacy services for people who need them.

I declare an interest: the Making Decisions Alliance has been mentioned many times in this debate, and I am a vice-president of two charities that are part of the MDA—the Alzheimer's Society and the National Autistic Society. In the Scrutiny Committee, I was particularly concerned about autism—the House will be aware of my interest in that area—and the elderly, especially those who develop appalling degenerative conditions in old age.

Today's debate has highlighted legitimate concerns, especially in relation to euthanasia and so-called living wills. In the Scrutiny Committee, it was our understanding that the Government had made a commitment that this legislation in no way opened the gate to any practices that are not covered by existing UK law, which makes euthanasia and assisted dying illegal. For that reason, when the Government responded to the Committee's report, they added clause 58 to the Bill, which is different from the draft Bill, to make that crystal clear. Like the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood, however, I have concerns, because while there may be a moral dilemma in relation to the more high-profile cases that have gone to court—of people who have had severe accidents and been struck down in mid-life, but who have been kept alive in a so-called vegetative state—in some ways, identifying whether those might be outwith the Bill's scope is easier than identifying whether the many thousands of cases of people who simply reach the end of their natural life would be caught within its scope.

We heard of a moving case from the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), and although I shall not give a first-hand account, I had the experience, during the course of the Scrutiny Committee, of my mother dying over a period of four months in hospital. I was therefore dealing with a not dissimilar case. I am concerned about some of the conditions in our general hospitals in relation to the way in which the elderly are treated. I am not suggesting that they do not provide the treatment—if I may use that word—that is necessary; I am talking about general nursing care, which really comes into play when people end their natural lives.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree, for example, that there is real concern, and some evidence of significant problems, in relation to nutrition and feeding? I am not talking about feeding by artificial means, but about ensuring that the food made available is palatable to and consumed by elderly patients, and not merely taken away when they have not consumed it?

Mrs. Browning: Yes. My precise concern is that this Bill does not lead to further such cases.

It is not always a question of the nursing staff. I have had experience of five elderly patients in the past 10 years who reached the end of their lives but spent considerable time in hospital before the end came. I will not regale the House with the individual cases, but they are a matter of concern. I remember visiting a 91-year-old aunt, who was a spinster so she had no children, and asking the nurse whether she had had anything to eat. The nurse said to me, "Oh, no, she's given up eating. She waved me away when I tried to feed her." I asked her what she was trying to feed her, and the food was obviously inappropriate. In the case of my mother, however, although I was critical of the way in which she was treated in the general hospital, she spent the last two months of her life in the Wokingham hospital—I name it because the nursing standards there were superb—where her food went from mashed, to pureed, to liquid.

I add as a caveat—the trouble with legislation is that it catches all—that when people reach the end of their lives, we must recognise that. I would not wish legislation to be changed in such a way that doctors suddenly felt that they had to intervene artificially, merely to preserve life that was clearly coming to a natural and, one would hope, peaceful end. People who die at home usually die without having taken either nutrition or fluids in the last 24 hours of their life, because the swallowing mechanism disappears. We need to make sure that whatever changes the Minister might make in Committee to deal with some real concerns, she does not go too far the other way so that people do not die peacefully and quietly at home.

I had an opportunity to spend a lot of time on the draft Bill in the Scrutiny Committee, and I have put in a bid to the whips to be amenable to me serving on the Standing Committee, as I want to pursue some of those matters in more detail. In the brief time allowed to me, however, I want to raise the question of the Bournewood judgment in the European Court of Human Rights on 5 October, which applied to an autism case. I bored the Scrutiny Committee rigid on autism cases, but it is an important judgment.

To summarise, the case was of an adult man living with paid carers. He was taken to a psychiatric hospital, which he was not allowed to leave, and remained there for five months. He was autistic and deemed to be mentally incapable of consenting to treatment. The medical profession, in treating or dealing with him, did not regard the paid carers as necessarily the people who could be helpful in deciding how his case should proceed, when of course they were the very people who knew more about him than anyone else. They could have advised the doctors, and the doctors should have listened to them. That was not the case, however, and having exhausted the courts in this country, they eventually took the case to the European Court of Human Rights.

One of the difficulties with the Bournewood case is that it should not be possible for a hospital to detain somebody who is compliant but incapacitated, and then ignore and ostracise the people in that person's life who could have not only given advice to the professionals dealing with him, but been of support to the gentleman while he was in hospital. There were long delays before he was allowed access to them. When the Committee took evidence, the Minister of State, who is in her place, while talking about the safeguards of nominated persons, said that she expected that carers would be the nominated persons. The carers in this case immediately wrote to me and quoted what she had said during that evidence-taking session, saying that they were not so safeguarded.

There is, therefore, genuine concern—especially now that we have heard the Bournewood judgment from the European Court of Human Rights—that, as the Bill stands, the Bournewood gap would not be closed but would be wider than ever. It is one of the Committee's recommendations to the Government that they should ensure that the Bill closes the Bournewood gap.

I realise that we are considering someone who was admitted to a mental health hospital and that a Mental Health Bill exists as well as the measure that we are discussing. I am a member of the Scrutiny Committee for the Mental Health Bill, and there is a genuine read-across between the measures. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) mentioned the Law Society's suggestion that the two Bills should run in tandem. However, when we read the draft Mental Health Bill, the Institute of Psychiatry said that the Mental Capacity Bill should be on the statute book before we dealt with the Mental Health Bill.

I therefore hope that the Minister understands, especially in the context of the Bournewood judgment, that we have to get the matter right in the Mental Capacity Bill because there is another Bill that will increase the medical profession's powers to detain people for an unlimited period. Getting it right in the Bill that we are considering is important not only for the people that it will affect, but for getting the next measure right.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the concerns is that the Mental Capacity Bill will not have the same safeguards as those that normally exist in mental health legislation, and that people in the Bournewood situation might therefore be at a disadvantage compared with those who are compulsorily detained?

Mrs. Browning: Yes, indeed. That is why we want to ensure that the Bill is right, and it is the reason for my asking the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs whether he would examine the matter before the Bill reached Standing Committee, and whether the Committee would consider carefully the amendments that need to be made in the light of the Bournewood judgment. That is important to me. I would not dream of supporting a Bill that did not close the Bournewood gap because it would affect far too many people—not only those on the autistic spectrum, but others.

I want to make only one more point. I hope that I shall have more opportunity to contribute in Standing Committee if I am successful in getting on to it. I want to consider medical research. The Joint Committee's report to the Government supported, with some caveats, the opportunity for research to be conducted on people who lack capacity. As the Bill is currently worded, it would be for third parties to authorise such research. It was not the unanimous decision of the Committee; we were not all content with that. Many reservations were expressed, including by me. Lord Rix expressed reservations in another place. As hon. Members know, he wears his Mencap hat on such occasions. It is not for me to speak for him, but I would not like hon. Members to believe that every member of the Committee was content with the provision on medical research.

I am open to some persuasion about non-invasive measures. For example, if research is simply a matter of keeping a database of patient histories, I perceive some advantage in it. However, invasive research, including brain scans, perhaps goes too far. I should like the Minister to consider reverting to the subject in some detail in Committee. Despite what the Government have done in the Bill, provisions need to be tightened much more if they are not to give an open sesame to specific types of research.

People say that such research goes on all the time and that we do not know about it, but my goodness, let us consider what happens when we find out about it. One has only to remember the pathology cases that have been discovered in various hospitals in recent years, unbeknown to even the next of kin. Perhaps it is laudable for us to decide, while we have capacity, which we may lose later, that we are happy to be part of some form of experimentation, but that is as far as I would want to go without much tighter provision than that currently in the Bill.

I support the Bill's broad principles but, like other hon. Members, I believe that if we do not get some matters right, my view of it will be overturned. I want it to work and I am willing to work with the Government to make it work on those issues about which I am genuinely concerned. I shall abstain tonight on Second Reading. I hope that once the Bill has been through its other stages, I shall feel comfortable about supporting it on Third Reading.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): As always, I was impressed by the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), but I was a little surprised by her final sentence. Given the questions that she raised in the light of her experience and commitment, which is beyond question, I was surprised that she feels that the House should not give the Bill a Second Reading thus allowing us to move on to deal with the issues that she and other hon. Members raised. For example, the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) asked several pertinent questions—there is no reason why they should not be asked. However, given that we have waited 15 years to deal with such issues, is not now the time to tackle them?

Today's debate has impressed me on the whole, but I am disappointed that we have not focused all that much on disability, which this important measure addresses. I declare an interest. With Lord Rix, I am the joint chair of the all-party group on learning disability. I acknowledge that the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) mentioned learning disabilities, and that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) spoke about them especially effectively. His speech focused on learning disabilities, carers and issues that are profoundly relevant. Indeed, they are the very issues that led me to develop an interest in the Bill.

I hope that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam will forgive me for repeating his point, but he was right when he said that, were the Bill about assisted suicide and were some of the claims about its main intentions true, he could not support it. That is my view. I do not believe that the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, who made an eloquent and well-informed opening speech, is so Machiavellian as to think, "I shall introduce a measure called the Mental Capacity or Incapacity Bill to con people into supporting euthanasia." It is right to make that point at an early stage in my comments.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I support much of what the right hon. Gentleman says, which ties in with the comments of the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble). However, because the Bill contains much that is good and that many hon. Members of all parties support, it is that much more important for the Under-Secretary to approach the Committee with an open mind, thus reassuring those who are deeply worried about several aspects of the Bill, especially definition, that have not been resolved, so that, on Third Reading, the House is united around an excellent measure.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the hon. Gentleman and I hope that he realises, as I develop my points, that I support the main thrust of his remarks.

It would be a tragedy if a good Bill, which I believe the measure to be, based on 15 years of discussion and the appointment of a scrutiny Committee of all parties and both Houses, were simply to be dismissed because of fears which, I am convinced, are unfounded. That does not mean that the fears have not been expressed; I will come to that in a moment. What we are dealing with, and what I hope to promote, is a Bill that has important principles and that is long overdue. The Minister—I am sure that colleagues on the Front Bench are listening—knows that, if the Bill is given a Second Reading, that represents a very early stage in the parliamentary process. I believe—I do not think that I need to plead for this response—that, in Committee, the points that have been made tonight, as well as other points that will be made in due course by hon. Members, the various voluntary organisations, carers, advocates and others, will be taken on board.

I will continue to argue for things that the House should recognise. I hope that the ministerial team responsible for the Bill will accept that, because of the perception of some members of the public, which has been clearly articulated by hon. Members, we may need to look at some aspects of the drafting of the Bill, not to alter the main thrust, but, for example, to clarify the point that the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green made about deputies and power of attorney. However, vital though the issue of euthanasia is, we should still deal with other crucial issues in the Bill. Later, I hope to turn to many of the equally genuine concerns in that respect. For example, I welcome what has been said about advocacy, not least by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble).

If we are going to focus almost exclusively on euthanasia, and my views on that are clear—I could not ever possibly support such a measure and I do not believe that the House would—we are entitled to recall the strong views of the disability organisations and of the churches. I do not believe that Archbishop Peter Smith, for example, would have said that, in his view, euthanasia is not embraced in the Bill—I am not quoting him precisely but that was certainly his view—if he did not feel, as I do, that society has a responsibility, in order to avoid people being tempted with euthanasia or self-assisted suicide, to ensure that the quality of life of our most vulnerable people, especially those who need mental health services and who have learning disabilities, is improved. Otherwise, the temptation for euthanasia and the rest may become all the greater.

Reference has been made to the Scottish Act. I repeat the point that I made earlier. I take the view that, thus far, that Act is perhaps better than the Bill but it developed by way of evolution, the kind of evolution that the House has already committed itself to undertaking. It improved as it went on. The Scottish Executive and the Scottish Parliament listened to people and an important consensus emerged, the like of which I hope will be possible with this Bill.

I have listened to the debate carefully and, like other right hon. and hon. Members, I have listened to my constituents. It is widely known that in my constituency a large number of people are Catholics. Of those who have written to me, and I will not claim that it is a large number, most are Catholics or people from Christian traditions who have strong views on these matters. They know that I respect those views.

One constituent sent me two letters. She happens to be a carer and is held in enormous esteem by my constituents. I refer to her as an indication of how opinions are changing not only outside the House but I hope, in due course, when we have that vital continual scrutiny, here.

My constituent is a young woman whose mother experiences Alzheimer's. In the first letter, she said:

> "I have supported"

> "campaign, not because I am a Catholic but because of my own worm's eye view of what is going on in health care. I have now heard four separate accounts of people being left to die from friends of mine; they include a nurse, a social worker and a volunteer in a nursing home. Three of them were by removing food and water in hospital. None of them were authorised by relatives or the patient."

We discussed that issue at length. I do not think that I was alone in assuring her that, far from the Bill ignoring those vital points, it takes them on board. It encourages people to spot abuses and to remove them, particularly in cases such as those to which she referred. We had a long discussion on Saturday—incidentally, it was not a one-way discussion; her views and criticisms of care in the community and how the health service is administered were clearly expressed and I would do an injustice to her if I did not make that plain—but on Saturday evening she put the second letter through my letter box. I remind the House what I said about public opinion and where I hope we are going in this matter. In it, she said:

> "I think I should come clean and tell you that I was the initiator of the postcard campaign that you were on the receiving end of at this time last year. I'm sorry for any hassle it caused you; this I pursued on the advice" that a pro-life organisation

> "put on its website . . . I feel doubly awful about it because you have been so willing to listen to my views on this and other matters. It won't happen again."

There was no need whatever for her to apologise. As I have said, her views have been reflected in the debate, but what is clear is that I do not expect criticism from that constituent and many others when I explain that I voted for Second Reading, as I intend to do for the reasons that I have given: further scrutiny, a commitment to the rights of people with disabilities, especially learning disabilities, and an improvement in their standard of living. That means that I, too, in common with my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood, will want to say something about advocacy.

The issue of independent advocacy is one on which I hope the Government are still very much in listening mode. As the Minister will know, the draft Bill was not popular with many people with a learning disability. Some learning disability groups said that it was so bad that it should be scrapped completely. Other groups said that there was still an opportunity to revise and to improve it. All learning disability groups agreed that the final Bill had to put much greater emphasis on independent advocacy.

Although I warmly welcome the inroads that the Government have made on that issue in terms of independent consultees, there is still concern among learning disability groups and others that the provisions on independent consultees have been brought forward principally to plug the Bournewood gap as cheaply as possible, rather than being a genuine attempt to provide an independent advocate for as many vulnerable people as possible who want one. I hope, and I have every reason to feel, that there will be a response and that Ministers will feel that the Bill is an opportunity to move advocacy forward. Some say, as the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green seemed to do, that such decisions ought not to be left to one person. That is probably right, but it is in the nature of things that a large number of people—medical professionals, advocates, families and carers—are very much involved in trying to reach the right decision for those with mental incapacity and, above all, in trying to respect their rights as the people and individuals whom they of course continue to be.

We were asked to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall conclude on this point. As the Bill makes its way through this House and, hopefully, through another place, it is important that we listen not just to Members of both Houses, but to the individuals outside them. I end by referring not to the important organisations that support the Bill, and which are not persuaded by the argument that it represents euthanasia, but by mentioning those who regard it as real progress for people who have suffered far too much for far too long. One man with experience of schizophrenia, and who was in the early stages of dementia, was reported to me as saying that this is a Bill of rights for him and for people like him. He feels that he will be at the heart of every decision made, and that the Bill is an indication of the care and treatment that society seeks to provide. If we end up with an Act that reflects the aspirations of that man and of the hundreds of thousands more like him, we will indeed have achieved a great deal, and the effort made in this House and in the other place will have been worth it.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): As these debates go into their fourth or fifth hour, one sometimes wonders whether there is anything new worth saying and whether such discussion is achieving anything. However, the defining moment of this debate was when the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) spoke. Hers was an emotional speech, but it was powerful precisely because it was delivered from the heart and dealt with her personal experience. It made the fundamental point that needs to be made in this debate.

The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) is right to say that the Minister is acting entirely in good faith, and of course I believe that he is. He doubtless does not want to introduce a Bill that countenances euthanasia, but one only had to listen to the hon. Member for Crosby to realise that if this were a genuine free vote and if every Member of Parliament had been present while she was speaking, the Bill would have died at that very moment, and no amount of artificial respiration could have brought it back to life. She made a very simple point. She talked about her mother, who had suffered a massive stroke and did not want to go through that agony again. She made an advance directive, but when the point came, she blinked the message that she wanted to live. That is what concerns us, and it is why so many of us are determined that there should be a substantial debate on this Bill, so that we can deal with the issues.

What matters is not what is in the mind of the Minister, or the fact that this issue has been debated for 15 years; what matters is that the Bill does not spell out what is in the best interests of the patient. It states that its purpose is indeed to serve the patient's "best interests", but the definition given is woefully deficient. It does not include the relief of pain and, most importantly in terms of practical consequences, it fails to define, or to require, the provision of basic care. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) said, the elephant in this debate is the Bland judgment. We cannot ignore it—it is there. If the Bill is to become a worthwhile Act and to carry out the stated will of Parliament, which is that we are opposed to euthanasia, it has to address the fundamental point of the Bland case. Following that case, basic care—the feeding and watering of a patient, albeit by tube—was redefined as medical treatment, thereby enabling the said medical treatment to be withheld or withdrawn, quite legally, without consulting the patient.

In fact, the Bill goes much further than the Bland judgment. Such a definition can now be achieved for any treatment without a court order, but according to a decision laid down in the past, in a document known as a living will, although I would call it a "dying" will. There is no point in denying that if the Bill is passed in its current form, it will be perfectly legal—as the hon. Member for Crosby pointed out in simple and powerful terms—for someone to instruct a doctor to starve or to dehydrate their semi-conscious mother to death, provided that she has previously given written consent to the withdrawal or withholding of medical treatment, or provided that she has appointed them as her attorney. That is undeniable. If that person assaults her, they will be arrested. If they get her doctor to pull out her feeding tubes, that will be lawful, if they have this new lasting power of attorney.

Nobody knows what was going on in the mind of Dr. Shipman. Everybody assumes that he was evil, but perhaps he felt that he was assisting elderly people out of their misery. We do not know. But the point remains that it will be legal to do such things.

We are told that the Bill is about enhancing patient autonomy. Really? Can we be sure of that? The underlying principle is the assumption made so often in the modern world: that the hastening of death is almost always in the best interests of a patient, once their quality of life has deteriorated to a certain level. My basic premise is that I do not accept that. Even the Bill's supporters must accept that the contention that we as a society have a right to take such decisions about a human being is debatable. We have to address that issue.

Mention has been made of the Burke judgment and I need not repeat the arguments, but that judgment is there. The High Court judge, Mr. Justice Munby, challenged the guidance of the General Medical Council, which appeared to permit doctors to withdraw treatment—including food and fluid—from mentally incapacitated patients, regardless of their consent. He reminded us that the withdrawal of food and fluid from patients causes

We know from the personal experiences related to us today that that is entirely true. He also said that the guidance is unlawful under the European convention on human rights. I do not believe that the Minister has told us the whole story. Civil servants and others who assisted him in the Bill's drafting are seriously concerned about that judgment. Indeed, I am told that they are furiously working on a re-hash of the Bill as we speak. Yet we are told that proceedings in Committee must finish by the end of this month. We have to address these arguments.

Revealingly, for supporters of the Bill such as the Voluntary Euthanasia Society, which claims to have a neutral and impartial view and wishes only to give the "choice" of death or life to certain patients, the Bill in its current form does not appear to recognise the validity of "positive" advance directives, as I would want to do. Such directives require the giving of food and fluid with medical assistance. In the words of Shakespeare's "Measure For Measure", this, then, is "absolute for death". I believe sincerely that this Bill is part of a culture of death, and that we are on a slippery slope. People are prepared to play God because they believe that it is no longer in the best interests of a particular patient to survive. I passionately believe that that is a hugely dangerous contention. Once we start down that route, where will it stop?

I shall now say something that will be considered very controversial, and people will doubtless disagree with me. There may well have been people working in Germany before the second world war who believed that there were certain mental patients whose quality of life had deteriorated to such an extent that it was humane to put them out of their misery. Everyone in Europe now utterly deplores that programme. In fact, the German people brought that particular programme—though not, unfortunately, others—to a close. Some people sincerely believed that they were entitled to make such moral judgments, but I believe that once we go down the route of creating people—whether we call them attorneys or deputies, which are legal names, meaning nothing to the general public—who are able to make such judgments, we are creating a class of citizen with the power of life and death over us. That is not a path down which we should tread.

Ms Munn rose—

Mr. Leigh: I am about to finish.

It is right to say that a fundamental duty should be placed on doctors. There may come a point where it is right and proper not to go piling on more and more medical treatment, but that should never extend to withholding the basic right to life, which is food and fluid. If we pass the Bill in its present form, I believe—despite the assurances of the Minister—that that will become increasingly common. I sincerely hope that we will vote on the Bill and I will personally vote against it.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): In following the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), I want to say that the Bill is enormously important because it seeks to address the issue of capacity. It deals with how we should deal as a society with circumstances where people lack capacity and it is designed to do so better than we have so far.

I welcome the change in name from the Mental Incapacity to the Mental Capacity Bill, which stresses the positive side. The Bill must ensure that where people have capacity, they can make certain decisions, even though they lack the capacity to make other decisions. It is right to address concerns about issues of capacity. Anyone who has ever worked with or looked after people for whom capacity is a concern—either as a permanent feature of the person's abilities in life or where the person's faculties are deteriorating—knows that current legislation is complex and that there are considerable legal uncertainties. It is difficult to ensure that people are acting in the best interests of a person or indeed in a way that conforms to the person's view of how decisions should be made.

The Bill sets out some very important principles that recognise the need to support people who have difficulties relating to their capacity in order to make their own decisions whenever they can. One principle is that there must be an assumption of capacity. So often where we have worked with elderly people and those with learning or speech and communication difficulties, the assumption seems to be that they do not have capacity. We see that in our dealing with children and with adults—and we must stop making such assumptions. The Bill begins to pave the way for what my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) described as a change in attitude and a change in the way we work.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I agree with what my hon. Friend has said so far—that the Bill makes some important advances in the area of mental capacity—but does she agree that more work needs to be done to define exactly what "the best interests" are? Should there not be greater focus on the physical well-being of the patient defined in clinical terms rather than too much reliance on the wishes and beliefs of third parties who cannot possibly understand what physical well-being might be?

Ms Munn: My hon. Friend invites me to discuss the issue that has predominated in the debate, but I do not really want to do so. I want to talk more specifically about people with learning disabilities who face ongoing issues about capacity in their day-to-day lives. I am not talking specifically about patients in hospital or circumstances where someone faces a life or death decision, because I believe that the Bill goes wider than that and poses important issues for us all to address.

I chair the all-party group "Voice", which works closely with the all-party group on learning disabilities. It looks particularly into how people with learning disabilities can have a voice and be protected from abuse or other negative aspects in their lives. It seeks to help them to exercise decision-making powers wherever possible. Issues of capacity may well be lifelong issues. It is good to see that the Bill focuses on support and how to empower people to make decisions.

However, in common with other hon. Members, I want to express my concern that the Bill makes no provision for advocacy. Without advocacy, people with learning disabilities are likely to have their feelings and views ignored by those who take decisions about their lives. The Bill rightly accepts that people may have some capacity to make some decisions, but not others. It also rightly acknowledges that some people may be able to indicate a preference, even if they cannot make a decision. Without an advocate, though, there are no safeguards in circumstances where there is a difference of opinion between the person who is said to lack capacity and the decision maker.

I am concerned that the Government are in danger of creating confusion by using the term "independent consultee". The Bill says that the function of the independent consultee is to give advice to the body making the decision about the person's best interests. Their view could well be different from that of the person concerned. Advocacy means something different; it means putting forward the person's views and wishes, whatever they are. The person who is advocate stands aside from their own view and their own expression of what they deem to be someone's best interests. That is not their role. They help the person to express their views and wishes and, crucially, they are there to ensure that those views and wishes are heard.

That view may be "unwise": it may not be what a group of other individuals—whether they be professionals, family members or other supporters—might collectively sit around and agree to be in the best interests of the person. Nevertheless, it is that person's view. An adult is surely entitled to their view, whether or not they have or lack capacity. At the very least, that view should be heard.

Clause 4 sets out the criteria for determining what is in someone's best interests, which includes permitting and encouraging

> "the person to participate . . . as fully as possible".

Without advocacy, however, a person may be wrongly assessed as not being capable of making a decision or communicating in the decision-making process. Moving straight to consultation without advocacy is, in my view, missing out something enormously important.

Finally, I want to raise issues about the concept of reasonableness in clause 5 because that notion also creates problems. As long as someone reasonably believes that a person lacks capacity and as long as they reasonably believe their decision is in the best interests of the person, they can make whatever decision they like. If a person is said not to have capacity, how can the decision be challenged? Who will challenge the decision on the person's behalf? We are not talking only about major issues—the specific treatment and life or death issues that we have debated in detail today—but about day-to-day happenings that determine lifestyle. For example, medication or other treatment may need to be ongoing for the person to live a full life.

For too long in our society, adults with learning difficulties have been judged by what they cannot do rather than what they can do. Empowering them to do more is important. In my view, advocates are essential to ensure that those people's voices are heard and properly considered along with the voices of others such as professionals and carers. I therefore ask the Government to give more serious consideration to the issue of independent consultees and independent advocates. Without advocacy, the voices of people with learning difficulties will not be properly heard.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The Bill has three inextricably linked qualities: it is important and wanted, it is conceptually complex and it is capable of misrepresentation and possible misuse. In consequence, it is a Bill on which we must have a degree of surety. The mind of Parliament needs to be clear, or as clear as it can be in print. That may not, at the end of the day, be clear enough. I shall argue that we are not there yet. Critics of the Bill clearly still abound, despite much pre-legislative scrutiny. Supporters of the Bill have reservations about issues such as advocacy and the living will, and what actually goes into testaments that people make in advance. It is has also been mentioned that there are legislative opportunists who would subvert some of the purposes of the Bill.

Mature criticism of the Bill must begin with an understanding of the task that the Government have set about. To be fair, it is a monumental and enormously difficult task. We can appreciate that intellectually and see how fraught any attempt would be to wrap the law around the myriad complex and highly emotional situations that involve the issue of mental capacity.

I speak with some limited experience. Many decades ago, I worked in an old-fashioned mental hospital. I must surely be the only parliamentarian to have guided—I use the word advisedly—somebody into a padded cell; to have seen a straitjacket being used; and to have helped to administer electroconvulsive therapy. I can therefore say that I have some feeling for the issues.

No one disagrees with the Government about the need for statute law on the issue of mental capacity. No one is happy with the common law as it stands and, worse still, no one is happy with the common practice. People are also unhappy to leave the issue to the vagaries of judges.

The mentally incapacitated are, according to the Government, those of impaired mind. They form a spectrum from the comatose to the uncomprehending. Puzzlingly, according to the Bill, they also appear to include those incapable of communicating a decision. Such cases can theoretically fall outside both categories and I am not sure why they are mentioned specifically. However, assuming—it is a big assumption—that we can fairly and uncontentiously define what mental capacity amounts to, the big question is how we must then treat the mentally incapacitated.

There are two decent-looking ethical answers to that question. Both are given in the Bill and, indeed, by most benevolent and reflective people. One answer is that we should consult people's best interests and the other is that we should do as they would wish. Unhappily, they are not the same. Our view of a person's best interests can conflict with our view of their personal wishes. That is not true only for people with mental incapacity: it is true for all of us at all times. What is certainly and absolutely true is that if we have no knowledge of someone's wishes, we should act in their best interests. However, the Bill appears to say that expressed wishes can trump views about best interests, in the interests of personal autonomy, provided that those wishes are well grounded and well established and require nothing that an unimpaired individual could not fairly expect.

My problem is that although it is a moral truism to say that we must act in somebody's best interests, it is not intuitively obvious that we must always act on past wishes, especially if they conflict with views of current best interests. In fact, the legislation itself allows living wills and advance testaments to be overridden in certain circumstances, such as when a person's best interests are established to be otherwise. I suggest that a remedy to that would be to make advance directives and living wills of persuasive force rather than authoritative force. In that way, they could include richer content and positive instructions about care, treatment and feeding.

The crux of the matter is that the best interests of the mentally incapacitated—be they the dying or the mentally impaired—is not universally a matter of common agreement. I have yet to be satisfied that there is an objective test. By that, I mean a test that if applied by every judge and every authority would produce the same conclusions. We do not have such a test. We have some rules that might help everyone arrive at the same conclusions, but we have no guarantee that they would do so. That is why the legislation includes a device known as a lasting power of attorney. Uncertainty that people might not judge one's best interests right leads to a desire to express a preference for someone who is most likely to safeguard one's interests. However, that provokes the further objection that the situation could change and the position of the person with an LPA could be subject to challenge.

The Bill's solution to those nightmare conundrums is to allow all major decisions to be subject to review and challenge or to be hedged around with guidance and guarded by various kinds of regulation. It is felt that the courts will therefore be able to arrive effortlessly at a truly objective decision. However, I do not know how a court can come to a clear, uncontentious decision in case after case without clear uncontentious principles to follow.

Mr. Boswell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that an important subsidiary motive in the Bill is to protect the position of carers, family members or professionals who are doing their best in difficult circumstances? They should not be dragged up before the beak on charges of assault, battery or other intrusion into the interests of the person if they have taken reasonable steps. That objective is a fair one, although it may conflict with some of the other priorities.

Dr. Pugh: That is a fair point. It is not easy for anybody to make a decision when someone is near death and the doctors say that some intervention—even the provision of food—is not helpful. I do not know how such a decision can be made simply and effortlessly. I do not know how if an LPA is challenged because it is felt that the attorney has lost the plot. That cannot always be easily decided.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): That is why we have proposed the court of protection, which will be a new jurisdiction set up to deal with such disputes.

Dr. Pugh: I accept the Minister's point, but the decisions by the court of protection may depend on the judge and his or her values. In some cases, the evidence will be overwhelming and the judgment simple and straightforward. In other cases, much may depend on the individual values of judges. It is not the Bill's interests to allow much of the latter.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): Like other hon. Members, I was greatly moved and—as someone else said—uplifted by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas). It reminded us that we are talking not only about the law, but about deep, agonising moral dilemmas. It reminded me that I have been asked in the past to take a decision about the resuscitation of my father. On another occasion, I was asked whether I wanted one of my children to be taken off a life-support system. All of us, in different ways, have had to take dreadful decisions in circumstances for which we had had no preparation. We sought to work through them as best we could with the people who brought something to bear to that situation. We have to be humble in the way in which we talk about such things and take some care in doing so.

It is often said that the House of Commons legislates too hastily and repents at leisure. Whatever is said about this measure it cannot be said that Parliament has moved too hastily. I shall not run through the whole chronology, but we have had everything, starting in 1989 with an inquiry by the Law Commission. We have had seemingly endless consultation documents, Green Papers, White Papers, consultative forums and draft Bills—the whole bag of tricks. It is probably true to say that never in the history of this House has any measure been so exhaustively scrutinised before being finally dealt with.

On the whole, that is a good thing because the measure is important. Certainly, we could compare it with the Human Tissue Bill, which is a cognate matter, where the fact that it was not properly consulted on and did not have a draft Bill stage caused all kinds of problems, so that it had to go into cold storage for months and the Government had to rewrite parts of it. Whatever else the passage of this Bill does, it will vindicate a process of deliberative decision making that builds in consultation throughout.

I can see why both this Government and the previous Government were nervous about the issue. That is why the process has taken so long. The previous Government, having dipped their toe in the water, quickly took it out again. It took only a typically well-informed, balanced and temperate campaign by the Daily Mail, with cries of euthanasia, to lead the Government into thinking that it was not a good idea to proceed with their measure. It is to the credit of this Government that they have persevered, against all that. The cries are going up again, but the Government are persevering because they think the measure is worth delivering.

I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), speaking for the Opposition, had a slight loss of nerve at the end of his speech when he told us what he intended to do about the Bill. However, I quite understand that the issues are complex and that there are people sitting behind him who cause him some difficulty.

After a process of so much time and intensity, one would have thought that the Bill would be universally welcomed. As we have heard today, the welcome has been almost but not entirely universal. Some people will not accept the inclusion of clauses relating to advance decisions on treatment. We are all receiving letters about that and they have been referred to frequently. I received a fairly representative one this morning. It states:

> "As a practising Catholic and Christian citizen of this country I am greatly troubled by the prospect of the implications of this Bill. I would like to request that you consider these implications seriously and vote against the introduction of a law which would legalise the painful death of innocent people and also make it a legal requirement for doctors and nurses to comply with it . . . Millions of innocent babies have been slaughtered by abortion since the introduction of the Abortion Bill in 1967. That was a backward step for our country and for civilisation. Please don't let this further degeneration, of legally killing people at the other end of life, take hold."

[Tony Wright]

That is one of the more temperate letters that I have received about the issue and it is from a good person. Indeed, all my constituents are good persons; they differ only in the degree of their goodness, but someone—some organisation—has told my constituent that that is what the Bill will do.

As gently as I can, I want to ask such organisations to think of their responsibility when telling elderly, vulnerable and infirm people, "This is what the state is going to do to you. This is what doctors and nurses are going to do to you." However much we may disagree about parts of the Bill, all of us have a huge responsibility to have the argument. On the whole, the House has done that today and it reflects the complexity and difficulty of taking any decisions on these matters.

David Taylor: Is it not possible that the cessation of nutrition and hydration could cause the pain, distress and extreme discomfort that my hon. Friend's constituent fears?

Tony Wright: I am not suggesting for a second that the issues are not deeply important and complex. I have listened to all the exchanges today; they have been important. I simply object to an approach to such questions that produces the consequences to which I referred. That is not helpful to the argument and it is massively unhelpful to the people who are likely to be affected by some of our decisions.

If I can put the point in a rather indelicate way: God save us from the fundamentalists and the absolutists. They are the people whom we do not require in the argument, because they can help us least. People who think these matters are simple and that they can merely read the answers from a rulebook will not help us to get through a minefield of deeply complex issues. If anything comes out of our proceedings today, I hope that it will be in our understanding that these are complicated balancing judgments and that we do not need declamatory moral polemics.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) is not in the Chamber. She talked about people who disagreed with her as cynical and wicked. In her absence, I have to say to her that that is precisely the language we do not need to use about a measure such as the Bill. Such language is massively unhelpful and deeply damaging.

In some ways, the Bill is a rather modest proposal. Its ambition in the aspect that is causing the most difficulty is to codify existing case law provisions. That is what it does. Many Opposition Members who have taken exception to certain provisions are taking exception not to the codification so much as to the case law. They do not like the current position and the fact that we are codifying that position makes it worse for them. Their argument is with what we are doing already—in particular, in trying to extend rights to people with capacity with regard to the care and treatment that they will be entitled to ask for and to expect in conditions of incapacity. Indeed, I would ask that not only for them but also for myself. It is a balancing act. It is always a balancing act.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman is making a powerful contribution, all the more so because we have not had a huge opportunity to hear from Members who broadly support the Bill. Apart from the hon. Gentleman and one or two of his colleagues, they have not been present. Does he agree that criticising the current state of the law and the consequences of the Bland judgment is a perfectly legitimate standpoint for individuals to take? There are consequences of the Bland judgment that give people considerable concern, including the way in which it may have affected the care in hospital of the very elderly and terminally ill.

Tony Wright: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I hope that I have not suggested for a second that such matters are not of concern. Indeed, part of my argument is that because they are of such concern, and such difficult concern, we must handle them appropriately. I am suggesting that certain ways of handling them are not appropriate. Happily, we have not seen a great deal of evidence of that today, but we have seen it in the way that people approach us.

As always on such occasions, our old friend the slippery slope has been cited. We are told that if we take one inch in a certain direction—even if it is the inch that codifies the existing position—dangerous doors will open on an abyss. Indeed, we have just heard from the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) that the abyss—the slippery slope—is Nazi Germany. That is not a helpful way to approach a matter that requires complex balancing judgments.

In conclusion, the measure is a codifying one. It provides a framework for decision making on those matters. No doubt, there are issues that the Committee will have to explore further in detail but, as I think my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) pointed out, we should not assume that such decisions are not being taken already. Of course, they are. Doctors and judges are already taking them. What Parliament has to do after 15 years is to get in on the act. What Parliament has to do now is to set the framework, growing from the case law and consolidating the case law, because that is what Parliament is expected to do. Indeed, that is Parliament's role.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is not necessarily Parliament's role to enshrine the existing case law if it believes that to be fundamentally wrong? It is our right to challenge that. It is good of him to mention the slippery slope. Let us forget the slippery slope for a second and stand where we are. Does he believe that it is right that the people whom he talks about are making decisions to withdraw fluid and food from someone? Is that a right decision to take? Does he think that Parliament should enshrine that or deal with it and end it?

Tony Wright: As I have said, I believe that Parliament now rightly wants to consolidate a position that has developed through some desperately difficult case law. The time has come for Parliament to bring that together and to provide a secure framework. Not to do that would, frankly, be an abdication on the part of Parliament. So the idea that there is a default option—a do-nothing option—is a "Parliament leave the picture" option.

David Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Tony Wright: I will not give way again because I want to end.

Instead of slippery slopes, I would offer the alternative of gradual gradients. Gradual gradients say that we have to try carefully, intelligently and constructively to put a framework around some extremely complex decision-making issues. That is what Parliament has to do. As the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) said, in a sense, it will always be a kind of muddle through a minefield, but at least we ought to muddle through as intelligently, rationally and sensitively as we possibly can, and I believe that that is what the Bill tries to do.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): This has been a wonderful and remarkable debate. That is certainly not how I would describe every debate that I have listened to in the House. What a shame that many of those hon. Members who will come in at 10 o'clock tonight to vote Aye in the Division did not have the privilege of listening to the speech by the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas). As my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) said, she articulated from her personal experience why many of us are deeply troubled by the Bill and unable to support it.

The Minister who opened the debate, is a splendid person. I had intended to abstain, but I am afraid that, having listened to his arguments, I have become increasingly worried and I shall now vote against the Bill because I am deeply troubled by it. He mentioned that the Department has been working very closely with the Catholic Church on the issue. Those involved might have thought that they had been working closely with the Catholic Church, but they have not produced the sort of Bill that the Catholics bishops would have wanted.

In the view of the Health Committee, mental health is the Cinderella service in the country. None of us knows when we will be struck down with a mental health problem, and none of us knows when one of our loved ones might be struck down with such a problem. When that happens and we become interested and we cry out for help, the help, sadly, simply is not there. It certainly is not there for many of our young people who, for various reasons, are disturbed and need help. We have poor services in the United Kingdom, and we have inadequate services in Southend. We are short of psychiatrists, and we are desperately short of consultant psychiatrists. For that reason, I had the privilege to chair a conference called "On the Edge", and we have set up a voluntary organisation, Trustlinks, which has produced a mental health directory. A number of hon. Members on both sides of the House touched on advocacy, and it is such a shame and a missed opportunity that the Bill does not address that point.

The Bill will totally destroy protection for mentally incapacitated people by enabling euthanasia by omission through the backdoor, with the withdrawal of food and fluid from non-dying patients. It certainly does not take an Einstein to recognise that, if people do not eat and take no fluid, they die, but all of a sudden, that totally necessary activity is described as a treatment. So those hon. Members who have raised their concern about that issue are entirely right.

I believe that we, as a legislature, have a responsibility to protect the most vulnerable members of our society, whether they are permanently or temporarily incapable of making decisions for themselves. We have a duty to protect those individuals' rights. The Bill, however, will not protect their rights. Indeed, it will take away some of their rights.

Following the publication of the draft Mental Incapacity Bill, I had hoped that, given the time spent on it, the final Bill would fully protect the welfare and interests of the most vulnerable people in our society. That is not the case. I admit that there are some improvements, but they certainly do not go far enough. In fact, some of the so-called improvements are misleading.

We have already heard about the case of Tony Bland—a victim of the Hillsborough disaster—in which doctors were allowed to withdraw treatment, including assistance with food and fluid, which he was given through a tube. What is enshrined in the Bill is the principle underlying the Bland judgment. The judgment allowed Tony Bland to be left to die from dehydration and starvation, which is hardly the impression given by the euthanasia lobby's claims about the case. It changed the definition of treatment; until then, providing food and fluid was defined as basic care—which is, of course, what it is.

The situation was so controversial that the Law Lords decided in their final judgment that those involved with any further persistent vegetative state cases would have to apply to the High Court before treatment could be withdrawn, so bringing about death. Since that time in 1992, there have, in fact, been very few cases—I am advised that there have been about 25 in total—and that indicates the feelings of most families in such situations, given that there are about 1,500 such cases in the country at any one time.

Shortly after the Bland case, Lady Thatcher set up the House of Lords Select Committee on Medical Ethics to consider the whole matter of euthanasia. In its report, it not only came down against euthanasia by commission but opposed the Bland judgment being enshrined in statute law. Like most of us, it saw that that could lead to wide-scale euthanasia by omission.

Both Conservative and Labour parties stated repeatedly that they fully supported the recommendations of the Lords Select Committee and would not support the Bland judgment being enshrined in statute law. Since the Bill was published this summer, the Department for Constitutional Affairs has made a great fanfare of assuring us that the Government have honoured their pledge—the Bill does not enshrine the Bland judgment.

Certainly, in any case in which the family or doctors consider it better to withdraw treatment from a post-vegetative-state patient, an application must be made to the High Court. I agree that that is the case, but that does not apply in cases of Alzheimer's, strokes or many other conditions in which patients become mentally incapacitated, for there are two somewhat tricky clauses that together mean that a doctor may withdraw assisted food and fluid from a non-dying patient, and there is only one end for any of us who are deprived of food and fluid, and that is death.

Clause 60 defines treatment as "a diagnostic or other procedure"

and follows the Bland judgment by including assisted food and fluid, so they are considered to be treatment rather than basic care, to which we are all entitled, and could be withdrawn from non-dying patients. The Bland judgment is not enshrined in the Bill, but the whole principle underlying that judgment is absolutely basic to those clauses relating to health care.

Here we come to the next loophole, which is that all decisions must be made, as many hon. Members have said, in a patient's "best interests"—but what are those best interests? The Bill gives us yet another catch-all, saying that "best interests" refers to a patient's wishes or, even more dangerously, to what someone else considers those wishes might be. It completely omits any reference to health or life, and neither does it contain any defence to allow for those cases where the person declaring that pulling the plug would be in the patient's best interests might be a beneficiary or have some other self-interest.

The equivalent provision in Scotland is far more sensible in a number of ways, one of which is the definition of a patient's best interests. The Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000 is simple and straightforward, defining best interests as the patient's benefit. It is vital that the clause including assisted food and fluid as treatment be amended so that nutrition and hydration continue to be regarded as basic care. I also want a clearer definition of best interests, as in Scotland. That is the only way of safeguarding the interests of patients.

I am seriously disturbed about the dangers of making advance directives legally binding, as they can be ambiguous, quite apart from the danger of the elderly and incapacitated being manipulated into signing away their life. I question the motivation of those so determined on this course, especially as the euthanasia lobby has always regarded such legislation as the first step to gaining euthanasia by commission.

I would like to be able to tell the House that I will support the Bill, but I cannot. Unamended, it would simply be another piece of anti-life legislation and another step down the treacherous path of cheapening life. All of us came into politics because we believe that life is everything. I hope that, although hon. Members voting at 10 o'clock may not have heard the speech of the hon. Member for Crosby, there will be enough colleagues to tell them what she said and try to persuade them not to enter the Aye Lobby.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I commend the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on his speech. He and I are two of the very few people who have debated euthanasia in the Palace of Westminster in the past few years.

It would be hard to find anybody who would deny the basic premise underpinning the Bill—that all people have the right to make decisions for themselves, and that if they find that difficult they should be supported in the process. The Bill affects up to 2 million people, and 70 per cent. of them are being cared for at home. I had better make my position clear, as others have today. I am not a member of any pro-life group and I do not come from any religious grouping, but the subject has interested me for a long time—certainly since I came to Parliament in 1997—and I agree that the legal eagles and the medical specialists have been leading the debate in this area. I agree with the statement made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) that it is about time that Parliament debated this important issue and came to conclusions.

I have several concerns about the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) made it clear how difficult it can be to communicate with some people—in her case, her mother. I am somewhat worried that busy medical staff and social workers—and, indeed, busy relatives and friends—will find it extremely difficult to spend the amount of time with patients that she obviously spent with her mother to try to get a decision out of her. Communication techniques are available, but some require specialist machinery and instruments. They are not available in all hospitals and certainly would not be readily available to the 70 per cent. of people without capacity who are cared for at home. If the Bill is enacted, I hope that we will recognise that fact and encourage people who are involved in health care and welfare to make more equipment available for communication with those with whom communication is most difficult.

I want to mention the very elderly in that respect. Such people are not always found in hospitals because many are cared for in residential and nursing homes. Many are unnecessarily heavily sedated—I stress the word "unnecessarily". It is impossible for an elderly and heavily sedated patient to make a sensible decision, so I want assurances that the Government will ensure that such people are safely and painlessly brought out of heavy sedation so that they can take the decisions that the Bill encourages them to make.

I am also worried about people who have capacity one minute yet lack it the next—of course I refer to the mentally ill. That is why I asked the Minister earlier why the draft Mental Health Bill and the Mental Capacity Bill are not going forward in parallel, despite the fact that there is clearly an important relationship between the two. It is important for us to consider that group of people because unfortunately it is not a small one.

I come now to the two dominant subjects of the debate: living wills and independent advocacy. I have been passionately against enshrining living wills in statute law for a long time—certainly since I was elected to Parliament—and have campaigned against them over the years inside and outside Parliament. Why do the Government want to enshrine living wills or advance directives in statute law for the first time, especially given that they took the opposite point of view only a few months ago? They appear to have done a U-turn, so I wonder why they have changed their opinion on living wills.

The problem with living wills or advance directives is that whether we like it or not, they are closely associated with the Voluntary Euthanasia Society, which has frightened people for a long time about terminal conditions—at one time it was cancer, but now it is motor neurone disease. Although the Government say that they are against involuntary and voluntary euthanasia, and of course assisted suicide, the inclusion of clauses on advance directives or living wills in the Bill sends a strong signal to people who are campaigning to make voluntary euthanasia and assisted suicide legal in this country, as has happened in the Netherlands and Belgium, both of which are close to us. That is a reason why, despite the fact that the Bill has many good aspects, people are nervous about it. If the Government had stuck to their guns and stood by their statement of a few months ago that they would not enshrine living wills in statute law, the Bill would have been much better. I do not want the Bill to become the Trojan horse by which assisted suicide and voluntary euthanasia are legalised in this country. Mark my words: once it is on the statute book, there will be calls to amend it from people like the noble Lord Joffe in the other place.

Following the Bland case, which has been adequately covered, the British Medical Association and then, of course, the General Medical Council unfortunately defined artificial feeding and hydration as medical treatment. That was the single factor that set me on fire when considering the whole remit of people without capacity and in the debate on euthanasia. I thought that it was a grossly wrong decision. I still think that, and so do many other hon. Members who have spoken. I plead with the Government to reconsider that. It is not the medical professionals who should be defining terms of life and death, but this place and the other place—the two Houses of Parliament. I agree with those hon. Members who find it difficult to accept that withdrawing treatment such as artificial feeding and hydration, thereby starving and dehydrating someone to death, is not euthanasia. I know that the Government do not like to accept this, but starving and dehydrating a person to death by preventing them from having access to food and hydration is euthanasia by omission. I think that a court of law would agree.

I do not know whether any hon. Member saw The Observer on 19 September. The front-page headline was "Revealed: full scale of euthanasia in Britain". The sub-heading was "Fury as number of assisted deaths claimed to be 18,000". That is in the United Kingdom. It is what is frightening people and causing them to write to us about the debate.

Mr. Grieve: I agree that that is a concern. The hon. Gentleman may also share the concern, as suggested in my mailbag, that people complain about the quality of care accorded to the elderly terminally ill in hospital, although that is difficult to ascertain. Those complaints arise with great frequency and are increasing with the attitude that hastening the departure of those people is acceptable.

Dr. Iddon: I accept that.

In the Bland case, Lord Justice Mustill noted:

> "It is a striking fact that in 20 of the 39 American States which have legislated in favour of 'Living Wills', the legislation specifically excludes termination of life by the" wilful "withdrawal of nourishment or hydration."

That is a pretty significant statement. He went on to declare the practices of euthanasia by commission or omission as indistinguishable, something that the Government are unable to accept, at least at the moment. I hope that they will change their mind.

Another problem with advance directives is that people change their opinions as they age and as their circumstances change. They should be time-limited so that they cannot get out of date. The VES supports that, which is one thing in its favour. It is perhaps worrying that advance directives do not have to be in writing. They can be made orally by, for example, a patient who is being wheeled into the operating theatre. As long as the patient's wishes are recorded in the notes, the doctors will listen to an oral advance directive. So advance directives can be made either in writing or orally at almost the last minute. They reflect the wishes of the patient.

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the notion of permitting people to die a horrible death by starvation and dehydration is difficult to accept, as is the concept of the legalisation of living wills? Does he agree that although there is some good in the Bill, it is difficult to see how it can be amended piecemeal without root and branch changes?

Dr. Iddon: I believe that the Bill can emerge at the end of the legislative process in a much better state than it is now and that that point can be covered. I do not want to go back 15 years. We must go forward with the Bill and make it work.

Let me say something about independent advocacy. I have been meeting representatives of I Decide, the alliance that represents seriously disabled people. It has some serious difficulties with the Bill. One of the things that it has asked me to flag up is independent advocacy. I will be arguing to the end of the legislative process that seriously disabled people must have the right to an independent advocate. Their parents, social workers or those in residential homes who may be caring for them may give them advice that they are not prepared to accept, and they have the right to be heard by an independent advocate who would push the case for them.

I will not vote against this Bill. I will vote for its Second Reading because I am extremely pleased that we are having this debate and I want to continue it in Committee. I have heard that the Government are to extend the time for consideration in Committee. I hope that they will repeat that in the winding-up speech, because we must have adequate time to debate all the difficult decisions. During my discussions with my noble Friend Lord Filkin, the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy) and the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), I believe that they have listened. I am convinced that they are operating from the best of intentions, but I hope that they take on board the criticisms that Members have made today as constructive, and that they are prepared to amend the Bill to make it acceptable to the vast majority in this country.

[Dr. Iddon]

I end with a quotation from Jacqueline Laing, who is a solicitor, a barrister and senior lecturer in law at London Metropolitan university. She said:

> "By allowing a new category of agent power to withhold and withdraw treatment—which includes nutrition and hydration after the controversial decision in Airedale NHS trust v Bland (1993)—as well as power to authorise both non-therapeutic research on the mentally incapacitated and controversial procedures like non-voluntary sterilisation and abortion—now permitted by the Courts—the Bill endangers rather than empowers. Its overall aims are accordingly irreconcilable with the intrinsic dignity of every patient, however disabled or impaired."

The question is whether she is right. I hope that we can debate such concepts in Committee.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I am very pleased to be able to speak on this important Bill. I take note of your suggestion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall be brief.

I welcome the general presumption in the Bill, as everyone has. Changing "incapacity" to "capacity" was significant. I have a particular concern about communication issues that I do not think has been aired during the debate. I address these comments to the House, but particularly to the Minister as I will not be applying to serve in Committee. These are particular issues that the Committee might want to consider.

I welcome parts of the Bill, especially the commitment to take every measure necessary to meet communication requirements. I am glad that the Government were able to publish the draft code of practice at a very early stage; I congratulate them on that. I have been able to look at it closely. I am glad that it is very much a draft. Looking at it from a Welsh point of view—this Bill applies both to England and to Wales—there are glaring omissions in respect of a country that is officially and practically bilingual.

Hon. Members have referred to personal experiences, and I will refer briefly to the experience of my brother, who had a serious road traffic accident in 1972 and was in hospital for three years. Eventually he made a partial recovery, and he has subsequently had a very full life. The recovery of language after a head injury is a subtle and mysterious business. When my brother, who is trilingual, first recovered he spoke French, which was something of a problem in the emergency department of the Caernarfon and Anglesey hospital, as hon. Members can imagine. He moved on to speak English, which was no problem, and then Welsh, and essentially only Welsh, which was again something of a problem. My brother was communicating in the way that suited him, and it took a great deal of effort on the part of our parents, the five of his brothers and sisters and our cousins to talk to him continually, even when he was unconscious, to try to prompt him to start speaking. Initially, our communication with him was very slight, and as I said, it was in French.

Because of that experience, and having looked at the code of practice, I want to draw the Government's attention to some of its deficiencies and ask them to think again about the situation in Wales, at least, and possibly England, too, bearing in mind the ethnic minority population in both countries, many of whom are either bilingual or monoglot speakers of languages other than English. The situation in Wales is quite clear. There are 600,000 people who speak Welsh, and most of them also speak English. The Government's own figures show that there are 12,000 people who have learning difficulties. As 25 per cent. of the population speak Welsh, that means that there are 3,000 people with learning difficulties who speak Welsh, and because of their learning difficulties they are most likely to be monoglot Welsh speakers. Particular attention needs to be paid to their communication needs if they are to be able to express their wishes.

The Minister said that 7 per cent. of the population will at some point suffer manic depression, schizophrenia or severe clinical depression. If one applies that figure to the number of Welsh speakers, one finds that there are another 50,000 people who speak Welsh and, in most cases, English, who might need attention to be paid to their communication needs under the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman may know that I have an interest in that I am married to a Welsh lady, although she is not Welsh speaking. Does he agree that it is important that consideration is given to the particular needs of those in black and ethnic minority communities along exactly the lines that he is developing in relation to Welsh speakers?

Hywel Williams: There is certainly a congruence of requirements, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. The only difference is that we have the Welsh Language Act 1993, which makes Welsh an official language, placing requirements on health and social services bodies when they are considering the provision of services in Wales.

To be fair, clause 3 notes that it must be ascertained whether the person understands the information relevant to the decision. There are points about communicating decisions, and clause 4(4) refers to encouraging the person to participate in any act or decision as fully as possible. All those points are well made and well taken, but what worries me is the presumption in the Bill that this is essentially an English speaking world with exceptions of people who cannot speak English, rather than the actual situation, which in Wales is that as well as people who cannot speak English, there are people who can speak English but would choose to speak Welsh.

I am worried that the model of language in the Bill is essentially a deficit model: it assumes an ability in English and then looks at special cases. That is why there is a reference to sign language and to the use of specialised skills in verbal and non-verbal communication. I do not think that Welsh speakers need specialised skills in verbal and non-verbal communication; what they need is practitioners who speak Welsh. The legislation must regard that as the norm; it must not make exceptions of people who have such communication needs. The deficit model is not what we need.

Language is referred to at various points in the Bill, but I want the Government to make more explicit references to Wales and the Welsh legislative context. We have the Welsh Language Act, which speaks of using Welsh and English on the basis of equality. Even the previous Welsh Language Act, the 1967 Act, spoke of anything done in Welsh being of the "like effect" as if it had been done in English. That is the normal situation that confronts my constituents. It is also the normal situation that confronts stroke patients and people who have temporary or permanent difficulty communicating. For example, stroke patients can recover language, and some people who were bilingual and perfectly capable of expressing their wishes in both Welsh and English suddenly find that they can communicate only in Welsh. A professional body of physiotherapists recently conducted a survey of people with restricted capacity: when the people were assessed in English, many were found to be incapable of expressing their wishes, but when they were assessed in Welsh, many of those were found to be perfectly capable of doing so, but only through the medium of the Welsh language.

I want assurances from the Government, either when the Minister winds up the debate or in writing, that the issues that I have raised will be examined in detail. Under clause 41(1), the Lord Chancellor is required to consult the National Assembly for Wales in respect of the code of practice. I ask that he be required also to consult the Welsh Language Board in respect not only of the code of practice, but of the entire Bill. Thus far, unfortunately, there has not been sufficient consultation of that sort. I hope that the Government will assure me that it will take place in future.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): It is a huge privilege to take part in this debate, which I think has shown the House in the best light. It has been a most sincere debate, with no hint of division along party lines, and we have heard heartfelt speeches, including from the hon. Members for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright).

Like all other hon. Members, I have received a few letters of support for the Bill and many letters expressing concern about issues including euthanasia, the validity of living wills, the definition of mental capacity, and the risks of conflict of interest. I promise not to go on too long, but I intend to discuss each of those issues.

The subject of euthanasia has been aired frequently. Most doctors vehemently oppose euthanasia, but they must continue to have protection in respect of giving pain relief to a terminally ill patient when such pain relief will almost inevitably shorten the patient's life and accelerate its ending. If that is not allowed, patient suffering will increase, even though the situation will become less common as the availability of specialist palliative care consultants and specialists in pain relief increases.

Turning to withdrawal of food and drink, 10 to 15 years ago that was a real problem, because it was incredibly difficult to keep people alive using intravenous and nasogastric drips. Now, with the ready availability of percutaneous intra-gastric feeding, which is so easy for the patient and can support life so easily, the major problem of providing food and drink has gone.

So we have to consider now just the underlying diagnosis of the patient. I am not altogether convinced by the many who have spoken so vehemently against the withdrawal of food and fluid that they are considering even any occasions when that is probably justified. Of course it is not justified in the case of someone who has a stroke, from which we have seen the most miraculous recoveries. It is not justified also in recovery from severe head injury. Again, we have all seen the most tremendous and dramatic recoveries from head injury.

I always think back to a patient who was riddled with cancer, bone secondaries, broken bones and pain. In those days it was impossible to control the pain without hefty doses of opiates, so that the patient was not really conscious of what was going on. In those circumstances it would not have been right to prolong life by keeping food and drink going. There are some rare circumstances when that is not justified.

I do not think that the Bill can provide guidance and legislation in all cases. The right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) said that there had to be a certain amount of freedom for making individual decisions.

As for the validity of living wills, the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) said that there would be no objection if such wills were made recently, were relevant to the current circumstances and there was no doubt about the person's mental capacity at the time. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) suggested that such advance directives should be time-limited. That is an extremely sensible suggestion.

There is a strong argument that living wills should be advisory rather than mandatory. There are so many circumstances where things could have changed. Hon. Members have referred to the emergency situation when it will be incredibly difficult for doctors to ascertain whether there has been an advance directive. Perhaps when the electronic patient record comes in, things will be easier. For the moment, the process will be difficult and time-consuming.

It is usually obvious when someone is incapable of making decisions. I always remember having to speak to a court about a solicitor when the court was trying to imply that when he had driven all the way down the M1 in his Jaguar with no tyres and had all his breakfast down the front of his jacket he was capable of acting as a solicitor. The situation is usually obvious but it can be incredibly difficult.

In the journal of the Royal Society of Medicine, just this month, there is a comparison of assessment of mental capacity by medical teams and psychiatric teams. It is only a small comparison, but given 23 patients where there had been full assessments by both teams, in 19 they agreed, but in four they disagreed. That involved physicians and psychiatrists. As I have said, the assessment of mental capacity can be incredibly difficult.

Lastly, there are risks of conflicts of interest. The lasting power of attorney, as I think that it is written at the moment, appears at least to give rise to a potential conflict of interest from relatives. Research, too, provides the potential for a conflict of interest. The Royal College of Physicians' briefing paper states:

> "A significant omission in the Bill, however, is a statement that the interests of the patient always prevail over those of science and society, such as can be found in the European Clinical Trials Directive or the World Medical Association Declaration of Helsinki."

[Dr. Richard Taylor]

I agree with the many people who have written to me and the many hon. Members on both sides of the House who have said that the Bill must make it clearer that it is not in any circumstances about euthanasia. Several hon. Members have implied that today's debate has made them change their mind. That is exactly what a debate should be about, yet it is incredibly rare for hon. Members to admit that that has happened. I have changed my mind. I was going to vote in favour of the Bill, because the idea behind it is absolutely right; it is the detail that is not. However, I am going to abstain because I regret to say that I was not convinced by the Minister's earlier comments that he was really going to take the concerns of hon. Members on board. I fear, having sat on a few Standing Committees, that changes made in Committee are usually very small and are usually dictated by the Government. I therefore appeal to the Minister to let the Standing Committee really debate the issues on non-party lines as the House has done this afternoon, so that we end up with a Bill that will tackle this extremely difficult issue without alienating a large proportion of the population.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) has been extremely sensitive to the mood of the debate, and to the atmosphere of gathering concern that some of us feel. I am going to be brief, as I want to allow my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) time to speak, but I begin by saying that much of the discussion that we have had has rightly focused on the concept of autonomy, and on the apparent ideal of the autonomous individual controlling his or her own destiny in general, and his or her medical treatment in particular.

I want to stand back and to think about the concept of autonomy in the context of the Bill. In a perfect world, autonomy would be unimpaired. A man or woman would be in control of their autonomy, and would be able to anticipate every circumstance. Their mind would always be clear, and the information on which they acted would always be complete. They would therefore be able to anticipate the future. In that perfect world, the motives of third parties would also be benign. However, we do not live in that perfect world. Circumstances cannot always be anticipated, minds are not always clear, information is not always complete, the future cannot always be anticipated and, unfortunately, the motives of third parties are not invariably benign. This is a tribute to the complexity of human things.

All this is true of those of us who have capacity. My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. [illegible]) was quite right to stress that the Bill deals with real people in the real world, and that those of us who have capacity should bear it in mind that we know people who lack capacity, and that we ourselves will almost certainly be incapacitated one day. If all this is true of people with capacity and of those who are incapacitated, it must also be true when the autonomy of people who are to some degree incapacitated is transferred to an attorney or deputy in the way that the Bill sets out. It is to that aspect of the Bill that I want briefly to refer.

I am not a medical expert, but I have listened to some very moving speeches today by hon. Members who know a great deal about medicine or who have seen their own relatives suffer. I have to refer in passing to what I think we would all agree was the speech of the debate, that of the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas). It must be possible, as the hon. Lady said—and as the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) reminded us in his speech—for an attorney or deputy with authority over life-sustaining treatment to be confronted by a medical dilemma that the patient had not anticipated or that he or she was uncertain how to deal with. In those circumstances, it is possible that the attorney or deputy may not understand what the patient wants or would want, for a hundred or a thousand different reasons. He may have misunderstood the wishes of the patient, and it is possible that he may have had some sort of disagreement with the patient since being given an advance directive or being given power of attorney. He may not know, as was illustrated by the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), that the patient or person does not want food or water withheld. If that person is not an attorney but a deputy appointed by the court who has no particular knowledge of the person in question, and who is sensitive to the demands and requirements of the state, and realises that state resources are limited, there are particular sensitivities and dangers for disabled people.

I speak with some wariness, wearing my hat for a minute as shadow Minister for Disabled People, as I know that, on issues affecting disability, there are nearly as many opinions about any one measure from disabled people as there are disabled people. A number of contributors to the debate, including my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), reminded us that the treatment of disabled people in hospitals and other places is not always all that it might be. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) was right to remind us of the concerns of the I Decide coalition, particularly, as I understand it, with regard to the issue of authority being transferred to deputies. Those concerns are serious, because of the rather loose definition of best interests in the Bill, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) explored at length. It is clear that best interests will not be medical best interests, and that attorneys will have the statutory right to refuse treatment on behalf of patients.

The Government have a reasonable riposte: the Minister could point out that under the Bill, doctors can change the decision of an attorney or deputy if they feel that it is being taken for the wrong reasons. I share the concern of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green that in practice that may not happen. It may not happen because doctors may not have the time or inclination, or because they may be wary of a long court battle.

Some of us therefore fear that we are standing on our old enemy: the slippery slope. In those circumstances, Ministers always like to assure us, using another cliché—now that I have used that of the slippery slope—that we are not crossing the rubicon. That phrase is often heard in such circumstances. The Minister made that point in a general way when introducing the Bill. That response does not quite convince me, however, that the Bill will not allow the practice of euthanasia by omission, which already takes place—many speakers have referred to the long-rolling effects of the Bland judgment—and that we would not be crossing a rubicon were we to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. Some of us have been assured by Ministers previously in relation to abortion and genetic experimentation, for example, that we are not crossing a rubicon, only for us to be told later, often by the same Minister, that we have already silently crossed that rubicon, and it is now too late to do anything about it.

I am in a slight dilemma about what to do tonight, given that there is a clear danger of euthanasia by omission under the Bill. Part of me would like to send a strong signal to the Government that they ought to introduce amendments to deal with that point, and to deal with the concerns about advance directives. Those considerations should lead me to vote against the measure but I am mindful that there are good things in the Bill and I do not want to delay them. I shall therefore follow the lead of the hon. Member for Crosby and abstain. Unless the Government table amendments in Committee to deal with the serious concerns that have been outlined, I fear that I may have to vote against Third Reading.

It is not up to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, other hon. Members or me to prove that our fears are reasonable but up to the Government to prove to us that they will not be realised. They have much work to do on the Bill and I hope that it can be presented in a greatly improved form on Third Reading.

9.15 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): It is tremendously important for us to recognise the good motives and intentions of everyone who has spoken in the debate. Although I have serious reservations about the measure, I acknowledge the Government's good motives and intentions on such a contentious subject. As many hon. Members have said, we all salute the Government for trying to grapple with it so that statute law catches up with case law and practice.

I also agree that we should speak about the issue with humility and care, as the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) said in his opening remarks. Although many of us approach the subject with great passion and strong feelings, we should remember the hon. Gentleman's words. Like many hon. Members who have spoken, I have some experience. Some 24 hours before my mother died, my sister and I had to make difficult decisions. They are never easy and any of us could face them. Care and humility are therefore important.

At the outset of my remarks, I want to say that there are circumstances in which we should not strive officiously to keep alive—I believe that that is the phrase—and artificially prolong life for a day or two, causing huge discomfort to someone who would die in a short space of time. The Bill should not be about that.

My fundamental problem with the measure is that there are too many unanswered questions. Sadly, a great lack of clarity remains. This afternoon's debate has shown that through the widely differing interpretations of the Bill's effects. That genuinely worries me. When I came to the House today, I believed that I would probably abstain, but my worries are so great—as a result of partly what I have heard and partly my experience as a veteran of one or two Standing Committees, when the Government did not listen to the arguments with as much good will as they might—that I shall vote against Second Reading. I want to send a slightly stronger warning shot than a mere abstention would convey.

I share the worry, which many people expressed, that case law as reflected in the Bland judgment will be partially enshrined or upheld in the Bill. The measure also appears to uphold in statute law the provisions of the General Medical Council to which Mr. Justice Munby objected in the Leslie Burke case.

Like all other hon. Members, I was moved by the speech of the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and I make no apology for referring to it again. It was incredibly powerful. It highlighted the great danger of legally binding advanced directives. We learned from her contribution that, in some cases, people will make a legally binding advanced directive when of sound mind, definitely believing that that is their settled will on their future treatment, but when they are in a hospital bed on a ward, they wish to choose a different course of action. We heard how the hon. Member for Crosby's mother was fortunately just able to communicate her will by blinking to say that she wanted to live, but we have to think of cases where people perhaps will not be able to communicate that.

That was the first thing I learned from the hon. Lady's contribution. The second was—she described it more clearly perhaps than others have in the debate— what a painful and distressing way to die the withholding of food and fluid is. We need to think hard about the dryness of the mouth, the desperate need for the mouth to be wet and not being able to remedy that situation.

I worry too about the time constraints that will be placed on the nurses, doctors, medical professionals and clinicians who will have to take these decisions. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) spoke of the pressures that many of our health service professionals work under. I worry that, with the advance directives, the attorneys, the deputies, the concern about what the courts will say about what they do and do not do, the true patient benefit will not always come to the fore because of the time constraints. It is important that the withholding of food and fluid be excluded from "treatment" in the Bill.

I go back briefly to the case of the 83-year-old lady in Florida. It is a distressing incident but it is important to focus on it to ensure that such incidents could not happen here. She suffered a stroke and was left with a severe physical disability, which included difficulty in swallowing. A feeding tube was inserted so that she could receive nourishment. Some three years earlier, she gave her brother power of attorney in respect of her health. He directed that the feeding tube was to be removed and that is what happened. She became hungry and repeatedly asked those caring for her in the nursing home for food but the ethics committee of the hospital decided that the order was clear. As a result, to quote the

Washington Post of 5 January 1997:

> "Until her death more than 10 days later, Nighbert was restrained in her bed to prevent her from raiding other patients' food trays."

That is a deeply distressing case. During the debate, I have listened hard to try to find some guarantee that there will be absolutely no way that anything like that could happen in this country, should the Bill become law. I have not been reassured during the debate or by what the Minister said.

As many hon. Members have said, there is a worry that this is euthanasia by omission. I do not speak as a Catholic but it is worth noting that the Pope recently defined euthanasia as > "an action or omission which of itself and by intention causes death".

It is significant that the past president of the World Federation of Right to Die Societies, Dr. Helgha Kuhse, has said:

> "If we can get people to accept the removal of all treatment and care—especially the removal of food and fluids—they will see what a painful way this is to die and then, in the patient's best interests, they will accept the lethal injection."

That resonates with many points that have been made today.

On medical research, where such research is purely a question of assembling a database history or of observing the patient concerned, I see no legitimate objection, but if such research is invasive or in any way intrusive, it is a step too far. On behalf of the people whom we are discussing, we must look very warily indeed at granting this or any future Government such powers.

The Bill's use of the phrase "best interests" has been criticised frequently today. I would like it to be replaced by a reference to the "life" of the person concerned, along with a reference to their health and "clinical" best interests. I hope that we can do at least as well as the Scottish Bill; it uses the term "benefit", which is much more direct.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Lord Brandon's 1990 definition could be adopted or adapted? The Bill could state that an operation or other treatment is in the "best interests" of a patient only if it saves their life, ensures improvement, or prevents deterioration in their physical or mental health. Surely that would be a reasonable start. Could not such a definition be of use?

Andrew Selous: I certainly like the sound of that a lot more than the Bill's current definition, and it would make a welcome starting point. I hope that the Government Front Benchers have heard what the hon. Gentleman said, and that they will incorporate it into our deliberations in Committee. It is worrying that in certain circumstances, "best interests" could be deemed to be other than the currently expressed wishes of the patient or person concerned.

I want to finish by touching on the position of attorneys and deputies, to which reference has been made. Perhaps the Minister will comment in her reply on another case from the other side of the Atlantic—the worrying one of Mrs. Schiavo. Her attorney was her former husband, who seemed not to have her best interests at heart when she came to rely on his taking decisions on her behalf. Her case went to the Florida court, although I am not entirely clear as to what then happened. However, I would be very grateful if the Minister gave me some assurance concerning attorneys and deputies whose position appears to have been compromised.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): This has indeed been a remarkable debate. Every contribution was measured and, in a sense, without side. In a way, Members were not arguing for or against the Bill; rather, they were simply saying what they felt was important in relation to it, and indicating at the end of their speeches their feelings about it. Indeed, there have been powerful speeches not only from many of my hon. Friends but from all parts of the House. I hope that I will be forgiven if, in the time available, I do not succeed in mentioning them all, but each one made a powerful contribution to the issues under consideration.

I should say to the Minister at the outset that I shall abstain when the time comes to vote at 10 o'clock. I shall do so not because I want to duck out, but because I have taken at face value the Minister's assurance that there will be ample opportunity in Committee—I hope and believe that I will be able to participate in those proceedings—to look in detail at the issues that we have touched on today, and hopefully to do so in a consensual environment, with a Minister and a Government who are willing genuinely to listen to the points being made, so that the Bill can be treated as non-party legislation. If the Minister will do that, I am sure that the Bill will go forward. I am quite convinced of the need for a Mental Capacity Bill and I am quite sure that there are matters in the Bill on which legislation is very badly needed.

Andrew Selous: My hon. Friend says that he hopes that the Government will take the Bill forward in a non-party-political way. Does he agree that one way to achieve that would be to withdraw any Government whipping in Committee?

Mr. Grieve: That is a pertinent point to raise. I appreciate that the Government must have a view about the business that they wish to take through, but they might well wish to consider taking that course of action. I cannot believe that, if they did adopt that approach, the Bill would be damaged in any irreparable fashion during the course of its passage. The Minister might well want to discuss that issue; it is a matter of sufficient importance that we might try for once to make such an extraordinary exception.

I was explaining why I thought that the Bill was desirable. Although I am a barrister, I am not particularly familiar with the inner workings of the Court of Protection. It has long been a matter of common knowledge that the systems in place for the legal supervision of those without mental capacity are woefully inadequate, very costly and very slow. The Government's intentions to set up a new structure are therefore greatly to be commended. They are doing something that it has been necessary to grapple with for years and years.

I include in that the system of attorneys and deputies, without which the streamlining procedure, requiring constant referral back to court for quite mundane decisions, cannot be brought into being without the catastrophic consequences that I mentioned—in respect of time, lawyers' fees and costs to estates that are diminishing daily through administrative costs. Indeed, it has almost approached the point of scandal, as some Members will have been made aware by the correspondence that they receive from their constituents.

The Government are greatly to be commended, as I said, but the problem—we cannot get away from it—is that the Bill also seeks to engage with a series of definitions of areas of the utmost greyness, which pose huge issues of conscience, ethics and morality. It has been said that the Bill is not about euthanasia, but we have touched on it. The Minister is quite right that the Bill is about many more things than that, but we cannot get away from the fact that among the central issues in the legislation are the definition of the circumstances in which people should be allowed to die and in which we should take action to prolong life. It is inescapable that hon. Members should wish to pay great attention to those issues.

If I have one regret about the course of this evening's debate, it is that we did not hear enough from those who are broadly happy with the Bill as it stands. They will all turn up at 10 o'clock to support the Bill on Second Reading. That is their entitlement but, with the notable exceptions of the hon. Members for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn) and for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright), we have not had from Back Benchers the sort of input that I would have liked to have had to provide some degree of reassurance about their views and why they believe that the Bill's present framework is satisfactory. We were rather left with those who have understandable objections, which, I have to say, I share in substantial measure.

These matters are not, of course, easy. The hon. Member for Cannock Chase made a particularly powerful speech. If I share nothing else with him—in fact, I probably share many things with him—it is that I had to take a decision about ending the life of a child, my child. That is very difficult, and I recall that I did not think at the time that I was practising euthanasia. However, I have to accept that, with the help of doctors, I was making a series of judgments that were not easy. In reality, these are daily decisions that have to be taken by many people. Sometimes they are very difficult; at other times they appear to be crystal clear. We must be very careful not to be too prescriptive.

What I found so interesting about Mr. Justice Mumby's decision in Burke was that for the first time it was acknowledged that the argument has gone only one way in the past few years. It has been about people describing the circumstances in which their lives might be terminated. But what about the people who say, quite aggressively, "I want my life to be prolonged, at all costs."? The judgment suggested that they had an equal right to say that and their wishes were determinative. Those are Mr. Justice Mumby's words. That is a challenge, because some people might argue that in some circumstances one could go over the top in attempts to prolong life. When General Franco died, there was a strange and macabre pantomime in which efforts were made to keep him alive over several days by bringing in various doctors, although it was clear that the end of his life had arrived. We must consider that such circumstances may arise.

What troubles me about the Bill is, first, that it seems to start with the supposition that the right to shorten one's life through directives and living wills is one that should be challenged only in certain discrete circumstances. Secondly, we cannot escape the problem with the judgment in Bland, which is that to many people it seems strange and offensive that food and drink should be reclassified as treatment so that depriving someone of them should be acceptable. It is all a matter of degree. If someone is likely to die within a few hours, it is pointless, intrusive and improper to take measures to prolong their life—many would think. However, as the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) pointed out in a powerful speech, it is easy for us to make value judgments about the quality of life of others that can be unjustified or, at any rate, unjustifiable. I am not sure that the Bill as presently drafted succeeds adequately in reconciling those conflicts.

I am left with the impression that over the past few years we have seen a curious coarsening in attitudes to the value of human life within the caring environment. I think of my aunt dying in a leading London teaching hospital in the mid-1990s. I was shocked by the cavalier approach to the elderly dying of nursing staff. That seems to be reflected in many letters that I have had on the subject from constituents about standards of care of palliative medicine in hospital. It seems to range from the outstanding, often in hospices, to events the description of which make one queasy. That may be due to a mistaken interpretation of the judgment in Bland, which was made on discrete issues.

We would do well to bear in mind the consequences of our own actions. If we are to codify the law and not allow it to progress of its own accord, we should remember that it would then be much more difficult to change it. Admittedly, it is not easy to change a House of Lords judgment, but it can be done. I ask the Minister to bear that in mind, because we will have to consider the whole issue with enormous care. What are best interests and how should they be defined? Can the circumstances in which it is acceptable to withdraw care or food and drink be narrowed down more than they are at present in the Bill? Most people see a big distinction between the decisions that have to be taken in caring for the dying and a decision that gratuitously hastens death when there is otherwise a reasonable prospect of life continuing for some time.

Those are very difficult matters, but I was particularly impressed by the comments of the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) in that regard. Nor should the Under-Secretary avoid the fact that a number of Members came into the Chamber unpersuaded, but by the end of the evening they were, on the whole, disturbed by what is proposed. The force of the arguments presented shows that he must bear that in mind.

My second point is about research, on which less has been said during the debate but about which I have even more concrete anxieties than about the other clauses. Earlier, in answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), I said that I had some sympathy with the Government because they wanted to codify practices that, I fear, have been going on for a long time. Historically, testing, experiments and research on those who did not have mental capacity frequently took place simply with doctors explaining to relatives what was involved, assuring them no great harm would come to the patient and carrying out the procedures.

The Government have taken the perfectly understandable view that such a practice is unacceptable and that we must have a codification procedure. However, the result is that, in the starkest and clearest way, the House will be asked to legislate that somebody who will not themselves receive any direct benefit from an experiment should nevertheless be made subject to it for the public good. I should dearly love to skate away from that proposition, but if I were confronted with it head-on I should have to tell the Minister that I found it unacceptable. It may benefit thousands of people; it may benefit the sum of human knowledge and potentially benefit others. However, unless there was a clear-cut indication of willingness by that person, before they lost their mental capacity, that they wanted that procedure to happen in those circumstances, my conscience would come up against the buffers and nothing would induce me to support such a proposal.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that a simple test would be to ask everybody in the House whether they were prepared to have themselves experimented on, not for their own benefit but for the good of mankind? I suspect that the answer would be no.

Mr. Grieve: That may be the case, although it is worth pointing out that the forms of experiment proposed are limited to those that are not supposed to interfere with our general well-being. None the less, I agree with my right hon. Friend; it is a startling proposition.

I want to give the Minister the opportunity to wind up properly so I shall bring my remarks to a close. Heaven knows that these matters are not easy. The Minister will have every support from the Opposition in trying to achieve a piece of legislation that stands the test of time and commands widespread respect, but the Government really must take on board the fact that such matters cannot be written on tablets of stone. They must listen and they must be willing, during the passage of the Bill, to allow it to evolve naturally on the back of the participation of all Members who want to take part.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): The debate has been informed, interesting, passionate and, on occasion, very moving. Obviously, Members have strong views about the Bill and they have expressed them today. I apologise in advance as I know that I shall be unable to answer all the points that Members have raised, but I shall try to address some of the main issues.

As the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), set out so clearly in his opening speech, the Bill has the potential to improve the lives of millions of people. During the course of the debate, we have perhaps moved away from addressing some of its real benefits.

As the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) said, at some point in our lives many of us are likely to be affected by mental incapacity, whether personally or because of caring responsibilities. Up to 2 million people currently lack capacity, including more than 700,000 who suffer from dementia in the United Kingdom and 145,000 adults in England who have severe and profound learning difficulties, but the current law that affects people who lack capacity has undoubtedly developed in a piecemeal way. Many people therefore find it confusing and unclear, as was so eloquently expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) and for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn).

It can be difficult to make arrangements for the future, when a person might lose capacity, and the legal framework supporting carers in their decision making is also unclear. It is not always obvious who can do what. Some people think that they can do what they like because they have a family relationship. Others may feel that they are restricted by the law, so they will do too little. The Bill will change that; it will empower and protect not only vulnerable people, but those who have to make decisions on their behalf. That is where, in a sense, we could perhaps have concentrated a little more of the debate today.

I am glad that the hon. Members for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) and for Daventry and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) agree that the Bill will not permit euthanasia and that there was confirmation that the Bill will not change the current situation with regard to the Bland judgment—something forcefully endorsed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke).

My hon. Friends the Members for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin), for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), who made a very moving speech, and for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), and the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), and the hon. Members for Congleton (Ann Winterton), for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), for Southport (Dr. Pugh), for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) and for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) all contributed to the debate and raised the issues of euthanasia, the Bland judgment, advance directives and best interests.

Many hon. Members suggested that perhaps the Bill in some way was the thin end of the wedge in respect of euthanasia. I can assure the House that that is not the case. The Bill will not allow anyone to ask someone to kill them; rather, everything in the Bill is about ensuring that vulnerable people are respected and valued. The Bill will strengthen the protection available to vulnerable people. It will establish in statute that the person's best interests should be at the centre of every decision, and that will work together with the doctor's existing duty to preserve the patient's health and life. Clause 58 makes it clear that nothing in the Bill will affect the law relating to murder, manslaughter or the operation of section 2 of the Suicide Act 1961.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): Many hon. Members have touched on the Bland judgment today. Having heard the breadth of concern expressed in the House that the Bill's good intentions may be skewed, will my hon. Friend at least offer to go away and reflect on what more might be done to ensure that the Bill explicitly states that nothing in it will make the removal of intravenous food and fluids easier?

Ms Winterton: We could not get much clearer than what is stated in clause 58, and I will come to the Bland judgment in a minute.

The Bill will create a new court of protection as an arbiter when disputes cannot be resolved. The code of practice makes it clear that persistent vegetative state cases, like now, will still go to court. The Bill clarifies the current common law on when someone can refuse treatment in advance and provides for people to plan ahead to refuse specified treatments, but tough hurdles must be passed to ensure that the advance decision was made with capacity, and is still valid and applicable in the circumstances.

It is not convincing to argue that a statutory definition of basic care and treatment is necessary. I repeat that the Bill is silent on artificial nutrition and hydration, focusing on a person's best interests. Statutory definitions can be inflexible and certainly need to stand the test of time over many years. We all know that technology and practice in patient care develop quickly, as does our understanding of the difference between basic care and treatment. As the House of Lords made clear in the Bland judgment, ANH is provided as part of a package of medical care. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) said, the provision of ANH is not always beneficial, and certain conditions, including certain forms of cancer, can be made worse by it. Defining ANH as basic care could force doctors to provide it when it is not in the patient's best interests.

We must never lose sight of the fact that the Bill requires all those providing care for a patient to act in that patient's best interests, and if necessary that can be challenged in the courts. Non-provision of ANH, if providing it was in the patient's best interests, would be negligence.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister makes an important point, but I find it a strange proposition that reclassifying artificial nutrition and hydration as basic care would make it impossible to withdraw it in the last hours of a patient's life. I would be grateful to hear much more detail on that in Committee, because surely the point being made by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) was that to withdraw it in such circumstances would in fact be perfectly all right.

Ms Winterton: As I said, the position in the Bill is exactly the same as the current position in common law. Judges, doctors and others make these difficult decisions all the time. We cannot necessarily define in statute all the issues that are being developed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley, the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) and others raised the Bournewood and Burke judgments. I assure the House that we are considering the implications and will make decisions as quickly as possible.

The hon. Members for Sutton and Cheam and for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams), my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood and for Sheffield, Heeley, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston all raised concerns about advocacy. We all agree that advocacy can provide helpful support for vulnerable people, but we believe that a statutory right of advocacy for all would be inappropriate. More than a million assessments are made every year, many of them for straightforward issues such as mobility and whether someone needs a new zimmer frame, and it seems disproportionate to introduce a statutory duty to bring in an advocate in such a case.

Advocacy goes far wider than mental incapacity, covering older people, children and those whose first language is not English. This Bill is not the vehicle for promoting advocacy for all. It has to focus on the most vulnerable people who lack capacity. However, we listened to the concerns of the Joint Committee and other stakeholders who said that we should offer support to those who are especially vulnerable, and that is why we have introduced the independent consultee, a form of advocate for the most vulnerable when there are especially serious decisions to be made. Of course, I assure hon. Members that we will continue to consult on developing the important new system, so I hope that that reassures them.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), raised the question of research, and we included relevant provisions in the Bill in response to the Joint Committee. The Bill now says that research involving an incapacitated person may be carried out if it has the potential to benefit the person without disproportionate burden, or if it is intended to provide knowledge about the treatment, conditions or care of people with a similar condition. In such cases, there must be negligible risk to the incapacitated person and the research must not be unduly invasive.

A further safeguard in the Bill is that a researcher must find someone who is interested in the incapacitated person's welfare to consider his or her interests and advise whether the incapacitated person should participate while taking account of his or her wishes and feelings. The code of practice sets out how the independent person should operate. If that does not happen genuinely and if the research ethics committee is not satisfied on any of those points, it must not approve the research proposals. Clause 33 sets out additional safeguards that mean that research cannot take place if the incapacitated person objects or has indicated in advance that he or she does not wish to take part in such research.

Charities and many professional organisations have lobbied for the Bill for more than a decade, and it is the product of many years of consultation with a wide range of stakeholders, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase pointed out. People with personal experience and professional expertise have worked with us to draw it up and we are deeply grateful to all who contributed. The Bill has been scrutinised by the Joint Committee of both Houses and improved immensely through its work. We have taken the vast majority of the Committee's recommendations on board and I reiterate the thanks expressed by the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs to Committee members, many of whom have spoken today.

[Ms Winterton]

The Bill is empowering and ethical. It will empower people to make decisions whenever they can. It will clarify the position of those who care for people who lack capacity. It will empower them to act with the confidence that they are doing that within the law, provided that they do so in those people's best interests. It will also enable people to challenge decisions by using the best interests principle and checklist as a guide and a new and specialist court as an arbiter when necessary.

The Bill has a long history of consultation and open discussion, and it is long overdue. People who lack mental capacity have waited long enough for it. Of course it has engendered widespread discussion on difficult issues, as we have heard today. However, I hope that following today's debate and in Committee—I confirm that we will extend the time for that—we will be able to reassure hon. Members about the many issues that were raised today. It is for that reason that I commend the Bill to the House and urge hon. Members to give it their full support.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

MENTAL CAPACITY BILL [MONEY]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Mental Capacity Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure of a Minister of the Crown under that Act, and

(b) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable under any other Act out of money so provided.—[Joan Ryan.]

Question agreed to.

MENTAL CAPACITY BILL [CARRY-OVER]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Order [29 October 2002].

That if at the conclusion of this Session of Parliament, proceedings on the Mental Capacity Bill have not been completed, they shall be resumed in the next Session.—[Joan Ryan.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees).

APPROXIMATION, MUTUAL RECOGNITION AND ENFORCEMENT OF CRIMINAL SANCTIONS

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 9317/04, Green Paper on the approximation, mutual recognition and enforcement of criminal sanctions in the European Union; notes that this forms part of the wider Justice and Home Affairs agenda; and supports the Government's position that the Green Paper is a preliminary document which will need considerable further discussion.—[Joan Ryan.]

Question agreed to.

COMMITTEES

HOME AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mr David Cameron be discharged from the Home Affairs Committee and Mr Damian Green be added.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

That Mr Andrew Lansley be discharged from the Trade and Industry Committee and Miss Julie Kirkbride be added.—[Mr. John McWilliam, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

SHOP WORKERS

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): I bring to the House a petition from 325 residents of Gloucester who declare their concern about the violence and threats to and abuse of shop workers, and their support for the Freedom from Fear campaign that is being promoted nationally by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers.

The petitioners therefore request the House of Commons to urge the Government to work with the police, retail employers and shop workers to ensure that they are doing all that they can to tackle retail crime.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Sugar Beet (Norfolk)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Joan Ryan.]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I am delighted to have the chance to raise yet again the question of the future of sugar beet. Indeed, the Minister will be aware that this is far from the first time that I have done so. I make no apology for reminding the House that sugar beet ensures the employment of no fewer than 10,000 people in Norfolk and Suffolk.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): My right hon. Friend will no doubt be aware that this is also an important subject for my constituency. Indeed, there is a British Sugar factory at Cantley that employs some 200 people. Any immediate decline in the production of sugar beet would have a significant impact not only on the farming community but on many other areas of employment in my constituency.

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He will be aware that although the factory is in his constituency, many of its employees live in Great Yarmouth, which is a town singled out by the Government for special help in relation to deprivation, and it is interesting to wonder what might happen to those programmes if the numbers of unemployed are swelled by those who previously worked at Cantley.

Norfolk produces one third of the whole UK sugar beet crop, and the crop accounts for £100 million of farm income annually. In my constituency, there is the British Sugar factory at Wissington, which provides some 200 jobs locally, and is a rare example of manufacturing industry still intact after the losses suffered by that sector under this Government since 1997—a sector that is in the news this very day.

The Minister will be aware that I make those points in the context of the European Commission's communication, "Accomplishing a sustainable agricultural model for Europe through the reformed CAP—sugar sector reform", which was published on 14 July 2004. He will be aware that the communication proposes to replace the current intervention system for beet with a reference price system and a restructuring of quota arrangements. A compensation system for producers will be introduced over a period of three years, incorporated into the single payment scheme.

The Minister will also know that currently, among producers and processors, confusion and uncertainty surrounds the Government's response to that communication. My purpose in calling the debate is to enable the Minister to put an end tonight to the deep anxiety running right through the industry by giving some straight answers to the questions that I put to him.

There is another context to the debate, however, which I want to draw to the Minister's attention: the state to which farming has been reduced under his Government. This year's annual survey produced by the well-reputed accountancy firm of Larking Gowen, based in Norwich, on the state of farming in Norfolk has been entitled "Back to Square One". It says on page 2:

> "Over the last eight years East Anglian farmers have increasingly felt a sense of growing frustration. Harvest 2003 gave a brief respite but 2004 is emerging as another poor year with weather problems coupled with very low commodity prices."

It continues:

> "In 2004 we have seen prices of cereals returning to . . . below £60 per tonne and coupled with low yields, poor quality and high drying costs we anticipate a harvest which will be difficult and costly. Some farmers may even find that their cereals may . . . be worth less than the cost of production."

On that issue, the Minister may know that I sought to bring a deputation to the Department from my constituency, and from Norfolk, to ask for an advance of the November payments. I wrote to make that request at the end of August and so far I have had no definitive reply. Therefore I must assume that the problems of the harvest this year, up and down the country, do not matter too much to Ministers. But to those of us who represent rural areas—a number of my hon. Friends and Labour Members are in the Chamber this evening—the continuing erosion of the agriculture industry is of enormous concern. It affects not only the economy but broader environmental considerations and the biodiversity of our country. Given agriculture's already parlous state, small wonder that so much despair surrounds the future prospects for sugar beet, especially in areas such as Norfolk, where so many jobs depend on its presence.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): My right hon. Friend will be aware that following the closure of the King's Lynn beet factory, all the sugar beet grown in my constituency goes to Wissington to be processed, which leads to a large number of jobs in the haulage and contracting sector. Does she agree that those extra jobs, as well as those on farms, are vital?

Mrs. Shephard: I agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, the 10,000 jobs in Norfolk and Suffolk that depend on sugar beet include not only those of producers and processors but all those involved in the process, in which hauliers are extremely important.

The United Kingdom is the European Union's third most efficient sugar beet producer. In the past, even in the most difficult years for agriculture, it is interesting and heartening to note that sugar beet has been a staple, and a reliable crop. In some years, it is difficult to get it out of the ground, which is sometimes too hard or too soft. However, this year has been good for getting the crop in. It is different from cereals—weather conditions can destroy a whole cereal crop. Sugar beet has been a staple; it has also been a reliable and bankable crop and a steady source of employment.

Eighty per cent. of our sugar beet crop is produced on small family farms, which are the basis of our rural economy, with an average size of some 20 hectares. The crop is important for biodiversity, as the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has pointed out, and for soil quality because of its role in rotation. Any uncertainty surrounding its future must thus have far-reaching effects on the industry and beyond.

In preparing for the debate, I met representatives of the National Farmers Union, Norfolk beet growers, British Sugar and, most interesting, distinguished scientists at the John Innes research institute in Norwich. I want to ask the Minister about the Government's strategy for the future of agriculture. Not to put too fine a point on it, people at the John Innes institute have difficulty in discerning one, but we will, of course, allow the Minister to make his points on that matter and disabuse us all.

Growers and processors agree that reform of the common agricultural policy sugar regime is necessary to enable the continuation of a sustainable European industry and to encourage further sustainable development of sugar production in least favoured parts of the world. The first main element of the Commission's proposals is a reduction in beet price over a three-year period to achieve a 37 per cent. cut in year three. It is the unanimous view of growers and processors that such prices would threaten beet supplies—indeed, the whole industry—even in the most productive areas of the United Kingdom.

It would be helpful if the Minister told hon. Members whether the end date for the process is to be 2006, as was first proposed, or 2005, as was recently suggested. I am sure that he knows at what period of the year sugar beet is drilled and, by deduction, when decisions about the drilling must be made: namely, now. If the date is to be 2005, perhaps the Minister could explain the Government's thinking on the proposed timetable and how the industry should prepare for it. Although he may not have time to do so, it would be good if he could explain the reference price mechanism. The exact way in which it will work does not seem clear to the industry, although I accept that he may currently be working on it.

Great confusion surrounds EU and Government intentions for the second tranche of the proposals, namely quotas. The communication's objective is to take 16 per cent. of the crop out of production. The mechanism for doing that is not clear, or even visible at this stage. Will there be quota transfer between countries? If so, who will own the quota? In France, we assume that it will be the beet co-operatives, but there is a monopoly processor in this country. Will British Sugar own the quota? Will the quota be transferable between growers? How would that be achieved? How would quotas be allocated? Would allocation depend on proximity to processing plants? That worries my growers a good deal because it would put a lot of people out of business. I hope that the Minister can answer those questions this evening.

The EC communication proposes compensation for growers. Doubtless the Minister will want to make something of that in his reply. Will he first answer the question whether the compensation will be specific to beet or form part of the single payment mechanism? In other words, will it be shared between all farmers, even if they do not produce beet? There may be no such intention, but I am sure that the Minister's reply to that question and the reasoning behind it will be examined with great interest in the industry.

The Minister will rightly say that the communication stems from the need to ensure that cane sugar from the least developed countries and the African, Caribbean and Pacific group of countries should not have to compete against heavily subsidised beet sugar produced in the EU. Growers and processors agree, although the means by which a proper balance should be achieved seems to be questioned in a response to the communication dated 13 September, with which he will be familiar, from the LDC group. It says that the effect of the proposals would be to ensure that sugar produced in the west Balkans would continue to be two and a half times that proposed for the LDC. That may not be the case. It may be rooted in a misunderstanding but it would be good to have some clarification from the Minister.

The LDC group adds:

> "The rapid decline in price as proposed by the Commission will benefit neither the primary producer nor the ultimate consumer within the timeframe for the proposed changes, nor possibly for some time afterwards. The beneficiaries will continue to be EU industrialists . . . LDC sugar producers are being sacrificed for the benefit of profitable EU enterprise."

Does that reaction indicate that the Government's approach is a success?

The Minister may want to tell the House how many responses the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs received during its consultation on the future of sugar beet, and which solution was overwhelmingly supported by the industry. He will know from that consultation that all are agreed that change must come, but he must accept the implications of the decisions that his Government are to take. Like all Ministers, he will be aware of the law of unintended consequences.

Does the Minister accept that price and quota cuts of the size proposed will mean the loss of thousands of jobs in the countryside, and is that all right with him? Is he happy that the same cuts will mean yet more manufacturing losses to add to those already achieved by his Government?

One grower who farms 800 acres told me that he is currently growing peas, rape, sugar beet and wheat on very productive land in north Norfolk. He is not one of my constituents, but he is concerned about biodiversity, the environmental effects of planting decisions and so on. He is also concerned about soil quality and the useful role that sugar beet plays in that respect. If it is not going to be worth his while to grow sugar beet on those 800 acres, he will get rid of the whole rotation and produce only wheat and oil seed rape. I am sure that the Minister understands what that would do to biodiversity, soil quality and the appearance of the countryside, but I also wonder what it may do to asthma sufferers—an interesting point to ponder. Of course, that kind of farm-planning decision will be replicated throughout the country if some certainty cannot be put into the future of sugar beet.

I wonder whether the Minister is concerned about the fact that the deal under discussion, far from helping the ACP and the least developed countries most, will help sugar production in Brazil most. In that country, according to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, increased sugar production of the kind expected will completely degrade sensitive areas such as the Cerrado. Worse—the Minister will be surprised that I have used this as a source of information—the World Socialist website says that unions in Brazil claim that sugar production is being increased with the help of slave labour.

I do not think that that is too far-fetched. Those of us who represent seats in East Anglia will know about the exploitation of workers from Portugal and other migrant workers in our own areas, with all of us looking on. The Minister played a big part in helping to stamp out some of the worst of that exploitation with the Gangmasters (Licensing) Act 2004. But it will be ironic if the end result of what appears to be being planned in the EU increases slave labour in a country where there is even more vulnerability.

Will the Government examine the implications of the proposed changes and produce some strategic thinking on the future of farming, sustainability and this country's expertise in plant breeding? Such expertise is most notable at the John Innes centre, in Norwich, which plays a national and international role. Can the Government think about how such expertise might devise a way forward for sugar beet and for the entire agriculture industry? We wait to hear from the Minister, and he may indeed put all these fears to rest, but I should point out that, with a bit of common sense, the Government could combine concern for the rural economy, for the environment and for our sustainable future, and, indeed, for the third world.

Third-world countries need the help that the communication is designed to give them, but are we sure that the proposals will really help them, rather than disproportionately helping one very large country? In addition, are we certain that the knock-on effects of the communication's proposals will not cause irreversible damage and problems to our own farming? The Government could begin by tackling the future of sugar beet. They could draw on the world-class expertise of plant breeders at institutions such as the John Innes centre. In conjunction with them, with scientists and with the industry, they could, for example, devise alternative uses for this vital crop.

The Minister has heard me speak many times—too many for his taste, I am sure—about the opportunities that biofuels provide in terms of alternative markets for agricultural products. But the scientists at the John Innes centre have a whole range of other possibilities for the uses of sugar beet, many of which would help to reduce the CO_2 emissions that are in the news again today. This communication, the work surrounding it and the consultation give the Minister and his Government such an opportunity. Are they going to take it?

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I congratulate the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on securing this debate and I welcome the opportunity to respond to the points that she raised. As usual, she made a well-argued, well-researched and well-presented case on her constituents' behalf. She occasionally strayed into one or two wider issues, such as the farming situation in this country. She implied that all is gloom and doom, and that there are problems in the industry, but it is worth pointing out that, according to the House of Commons Library, total income from farming continues to recover from the all-time low in 2000; indeed, it increased by 29 per cent. between 2002 and 2003.

Leaving those points aside, I do acknowledge that the right hon. Lady has been prepared to tackle issues such as the exploitation of workers. I welcomed her strong support for what is now the Gangmasters (Licensing) Act 2004, and I can assure her that we are implementing it and setting up the agency with some vigour. I agree that it is to be deplored when decisions on agricultural matters—or on anything else—lead to unintended consequences and to exploitation in other countries. However, that is not in itself an excuse for continuing with unsustainable practices in this country, and I am sure that she did not mean to suggest that it is.

Towards the end of the right hon. Lady's speech, she asked whether the Government would look at helping with the strategic decisions that are necessary for a strong future for farming in this country. I can assure her that the Government have indeed engaged with that and we have done more than any previous Government to work with the industry to bring forward the strategy for sustainable food and farming. That is an exemplar of how to work with industry to anticipate changes in order to enable the industry to become successful, profitable and sustainable for the long-term future.

Mrs. Shephard: It is the case that the Government have introduced proposals for sustainable food and farming, but will the Minister give the House some details about the interface that the Government have encouraged between plant breeders, research and agriculture to provide alternative uses for crops? I know that a body has been established, but what results has it produced?

Alun Michael: It has improved the methodology of dealing with farming in this country and increased co-operation among farmers to get more of the end-shelf price back to the primary producer. We are carrying through the work of the partnership organisation established to take forward the strategy to create a sustainable future for food farming, which is all-important in this context.

I was making the point that the right hon. Lady was quite right to pose the issue of alternative uses for crops. She has argued—as I have and as my noble Friend Lord Whitty has in the other place—for the promotion of the use of biofuels, and we are perfectly happy to consider other uses. Biofuels have to have a sustainable future. There is no point in having an immediate surge of production that is not followed through in a sustainable way. That is one of the issues that we have debated in the Chamber before.

If I went into all the details that the right hon. Lady asked me to provide in respect of some of her general comments, I would not have time to respond to her specific points about the topic of the debate, to which I should now turn. I would be happy to respond in greater detail if she were to have an Adjournment debate on the topic of the wider future of farming and food and the relationship between various forms of production.

I fully understand the importance that the right hon. Lady attaches to the future of sugar beet production in the UK and to the interests of growers in her own constituency, but that is only one part of a very complex picture, which includes the wider farming community here and in Europe, sugar cane production in some of the poorest parts of the world, food manufacturing and consumer interests and the cost to the economy and the environment of the present regime, as well as its impact on trade and development policies and our international obligations, particularly to the World Trade Organisation.

It is no wonder, in many ways, that reform has been a long time coming, but the fact is that the present 36-year-old regime is now way out of line with other reform sectors and is now the single most distorting and protectionist element of the whole common agricultural policy. An EU sugar price of more than three times world levels is simply not sustainable. I was pleased that the right hon. Lady acknowledged that no change was not an option.

In June 2003, against most people's expectations, we secured agreement to the radical reform of the CAP. The most important element was agreement to break the link between the subsidy paid to farmers and what they produce—the so-called decoupling. So the future is not farming for subsidy, but farming for what the market wants. The environment benefits, too, by removing incentives for over-production and making future subsidy dependent on environmental compliance, which are the objectives of the reform policy. The June 2003 agreement also crucially makes more money available for wider rural development and environmental objectives—the so-called pillar 2 of the CAP. The Government welcomed last June's reforms and believe that it is essential that the reform of the sugar regime should be consistent with those principles.

As the right hon. Lady knows, the European Commission published a communication on sugar in July 2004, setting out reform principles. In particular, it made it clear that the existing regime is unsustainable and that early and radical decisions were needed.

Mrs. Shephard rose—

Alun Michael: I will give way to the right hon. Lady, but I am trying to provide some answers to her questions as well as dealing with her preamble points.

Mrs. Shephard: How can the Minister make an analogy between sugar beet and other crops, when there is a monopoly processor for sugar beet but not for any other crop?

Alun Michael: I accept that there is a difference, but it does not alter the fact that the size of the subsidy and the distortion of the market as a result of the present common agricultural policy is completely unsustainable. Indeed, that was also the view of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee in its excellent recent report.

I shall not rehearse again all the various drivers for reform. The stark truth is that there is no "do nothing" option, as the right hon. Lady acknowledged. Left unchanged, the regime will simply collapse and leave beet growers with neither a future nor any compensation. Loss of jobs depends on decisions made in the industry and many farmers have already changed their operational plans. Others are considering change. Issues of diversification, to which the right hon. Lady referred, are important.

Following the Commission's July paper, negotiations have continued at an official level. Ministers will again discuss the issues at the November Agriculture Council. It is not clear when the Commission will publish legislative proposals. Delay may follow the World Trade Organisation panel report, which has ruled against the EU on several important issues. However, indications from the Commission suggest that no detailed proposals will be produced until March or April 2005, which would make the start date for reform of July 2005 very ambitious.

The right hon. Lady also asked how many responses to the DEFRA consultation exercise had been received. More than 2,000 have been received, including a wide range of views, not all of which opposed reform. Many responses received from farmers revealed that they were clearly worried about the consequences and therefore were unhappy with the proposals. She asked whether sugar beet payment would form part of the single farm payment or would be separate. The Government believe that the payment should be part of the single farm payment.

The right hon. Lady asked who owns the sugar beet quota. That is a question that we have raised with the Commission. It is seeking legal advice and we all await the answer to that question with interest. As she knows better than most, part of the difficulty is that various rumours, counter-rumours, proposals and counter-proposals affect any plan considered by the Commission. It is difficult for producers because they do not know how to judge rumour against proposal. I fear that we will all have to await the decisions from the Commission after it has received the legal advice before I can offer any certainty or clarity on the matter.

The right hon. Lady asked about the UK response to the Commission's proposals. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has welcomed the Commission's proposals as a step in the right direction, but we await the full legislative proposal before some of the issues of detail can be dealt with properly. When those legislative proposals—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Bangladesh

1. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): What representations he has made to the Government of Bangladesh about their domestic security. [190314]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): May I begin by extending the sympathy of all Members to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who I understand is absent from the Chamber this morning as a result of the passing of his father?

We regularly raise concerns about the situation in Bangladesh, including the recent political violence, with the Bangladeshi authorities. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary wrote to the Bangladeshi Prime Minister following the attack in August at an opposition rally. Sir Michael Jay, permanent under-secretary at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, pressed the Bangladeshi Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition in Dhaka on 5 October to work to resolve the problems facing Bangladesh. I hope to visit Bangladesh myself in the near future.

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer, and I join him in offering condolences to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). Is my hon. Friend aware of the recent spate of arrests of opposition members—some reports put the figure as high as 40,000—which come on top of the bombings that have accounted for some 1,400 deaths in the past three years? Will he look at getting support from the rest of the international community so that we can bring urgent pressure to bear on Bangladesh, in order to improve the security situation and the fragile democracy in that country?

Mr. Alexander: May I first place on the record my gratitude to my hon. Friend for her work on this issue, which is of great concern to her. Like her, we are concerned at the deterioration of law and order in Bangladesh, and we are keen to work with the Bangladeshi police to help them to improve their performance. The Department for International Development is providing £5 million for a United Nations police reform project, in order to focus on investigation techniques and prosecution. We are keen to encourage that aspect of such work.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): When the Minister goes to Bangladesh, will he add to his list of issues on which to make representations the security of minority faith communities in Bangladesh—his colleagues are aware of this issue—who are under increasing pressure and subject to harassment? In particular, I draw his attention to the allegation of increasing evidence of fundamentalists from outside Bangladesh infiltrating Government and security services to the detriment of the civil rights of all the community, in what is meant to be a secular state.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman raises two important issues: the treatment of minorities and the threat of external involvement in the challenges facing Bangladesh. I certainly undertake to make those points, which have been made previously, when I visit Bangladesh.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): Half of all British Bangladeshis live in Tower Hamlets, and I reiterate to the Minister how deeply distressed they are by the current political situation in Bangladesh and the floods that have devastated it. Having just returned from that country, I commend the outstanding work of our British high commissioner, Anwar Choudhury, his team and the DFID team. What further pressure will be put on the Bangladeshi Government to investigate properly the attacks on Anwar Choudhury and on the opposition leaders? When the Minister is in Bangladesh, could he also ensure that the experience of my constituent, Nunu Miah, is not suffered by other British Bangladeshis travelling to that country?

Mr. Alexander: My hon. Friend raises a number of points. I know of her strong commitment to, and concern for, her Bangladeshi constituents; indeed, my first meeting with a Member of this House after taking up my new responsibilities was with her. She impressed on me then, before her visit to Bangladesh, the importance that she attaches to these issues. On the 21 August attack, I understand that a one-man judicial committee has reported to the Bangladeshi Government, but that the report has not been made public. On the attack on high commissioner Anwar Choudhury, I am glad to say that he recovered well and returned to his duties in July. Although there have been no arrests as yet in relation to that attack, the Bangladeshi police investigation continues. We have stressed to the authorities—I intend to do so again when I visit Bangladesh—that we are keen that the importance of the investigation be elevated, so that those responsible for perpetrating such violence are brought to justice.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): The Minister will know that the attack on the peaceful rally on 21 August involved the killing of 24 people and the injuring of hundreds of others. That rally was protesting against a previous series of bomb attacks, including one on our high commissioner. I appreciate the efforts that the Government have made, as outlined by the Minister; nevertheless, will he see that the matter is pressed resolutely? What is going on in that country is just not acceptable, and if necessary the United Nations should be brought in at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Alexander: I certainly agree that we were all shocked by the attacks on an opposition rally on 21 August. We utterly condemn such attacks, which have no place in a free and democratic society. We certainly welcome the swift condemnation of those attacks by the Bangladeshi Government, but we are determined to ensure that we continue to press the case that a full investigation takes place. I give a further undertaking that I will make that point when I visit Bangladesh in due course.

Global Warming

2. Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): What representations the Government have made to the United States Administration to encourage it to engage with international efforts to combat global warming. [190315]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and Investment in expressing my condolences to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) on the loss of his father.

The Government are working hard to re-engage the United States on the urgency of tackling climate change, despite our differences over Kyoto. We are making every effort to convince US policymakers at all levels that the right environmental policy, as set out in Kyoto, is also good for business. I made a major speech on the UK's position at Howard university, Washington DC, in May this year. Taking effective international action on climate change is a major priority for our G8 and EU presidencies next year.

Dr. Turner: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I am sure that he would agree that the evidence is now abundant that the process of climate change is accelerating, making the need for action extremely urgent. In the face of the evidence, it is still clear that the United States Administration is in total denial—almost of the science and certainly of the need to take action, which places the future of the entire globe in grave jeopardy. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the time has come to stop playing patsy with the States, and that we need to go in fairly tough on the matter? We need to get together with the rest of the international community to ensure that the US, which produces 25 per cent. of all carbon dioxide emissions and probably an equal share of the other important greenhouse gases, comes together with everyone else. Even Russia has signed Kyoto, yet the US is still standing out and must be brought into line.

Mr. Straw: If my hon. Friend reads the speech that I made at Howard university in Washington in May—I will send him a copy—he will see that, far from taking a patsy line on this issue, I took a very robust line. There is a major disagreement between the United Kingdom and the United States on this issue. Our aim is to persuade US policymakers to change their approach.

There are some encouraging signs. The first is that the National Academy of Sciences in the United States now agrees about the scientific evidence. The second is a developing and all-party alliance in favour of Kyoto. The states of California and New York, which between them account for 50 per cent. more carbon dioxide emissions than the UK, have now adopted measures close to those recommended under Kyoto. The McCain-Lieberman Bill, which would introduce a similar structure of controls to those of Kyoto, received 43 votes when it recently came up for debate in the Senate. We have to maintain our pressure on the United States by presenting the scientific evidence, because its people will be as much at risk as those in the rest of the world if there is not international action on climate change, including by the United States.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): As the Foreign Secretary has not had much success in persuading the current President of the United States of the science behind climate change and global warming, does he believe that the Democratic challenger will be rather more amenable to understanding the problem?

Mr. Straw: From what I read, both challengers for the presidency take a similar position on this issue. As ever in the United States—it is a federal state whose democracy is very widely spread—the headline that it is against Kyoto, which is true, tends to obscure the fact that there is a raging debate taking place in the country and increasing support for the UK's position. I am glad to say that we have now been joined by Russia, which means that the Kyoto protocol can now come into force.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): I recently returned from leading a delegation to Russia, where this matter was discussed. May I tell my right hon. Friend that the Kyoto ratification proposed by President Putin is hugely controversial in the Duma; its members believe that it will jeopardise Russia's rapid economic growth? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that hard promises to Russia of technical assistance and co-operation are made and kept, so that the Kyoto protocol will come into effect and the United States will no longer have the excuse that it is not a reality, as it will be a reality if Russia ratifies?

Mr. Straw: Yes, we will. When I was in Russia in July, I spelled out to my Russian colleague, Sergei Lavrov, and to the other members of the Government and Duma whom I met, that Russia has more to gain than to lose from Kyoto. I also drew their attention to the fact that hard-headed multinational American companies such as DuPont are now taking a lead on this matter and are working as though Kyoto were in force. The tide is therefore moving; we have to ensure that the build-up continues so that Kyoto is implemented fully, and then persuade the US federal Government to come in behind it.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that he will be in no position to take a robust line with the US Administration if we do not get our own house in order? Is he aware that CO_2 emissions in this country have risen since 1997?

Mr. Straw: With respect, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that our record on emissions is good, and I shall be happy to write to him with the details.

Turkey

4. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): What recent representations he has made to the Turkish Government on the equal rights of Turkish citizens from ethnic minorities. [190317]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): We have consistently raised, at the highest levels, the need for Turkey to ensure that the democratic rights of all its citizens are protected, regardless of their ethnicity. The Lord Chancellor and I raised this with the Turkish Justice Minister during his visit to the UK in July. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary also urged the Turkish Government to sustain the momentum of reform during his visit on 7 October.

Bob Russell: Does the Minister agree that Turkey has no place in the EU if it does not give equal rights to its Kurdish minority?

Mr. MacShane: The fact that Turkey is an enthusiastic supporter of EU entry—which sets it apart from one or two political forces in our country—has caused it to improve considerably its laws in respect of the Kurdish minority. For example, new laws allow Kurdish people to study, broadcast and register their own names. The situation for Kurds in Turkey is improving steadily, as Turkey seeks to join the EU.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I welcome the decisions taken in Brussels last Thursday, and the statement by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in Ankara on Friday that the EU must keep its side of the bargain. However, does the Minister share my concern about the forces of reaction in Europe, which try to assert that Turkey will not join the EU until 2019? Will he confirm that there is no question that a referendum on Turkish membership of the EU will be held? Will he also confirm that the UK will give Turkey every assistance possible to ensure that it meets the terms of the Copenhagen criteria, and any other assistance necessary to allow Turkey to join the EU as soon as possible?

Mr. MacShane: The answer to all those questions is an unequivocal yes. It would be helpful if Britain could be united in supporting the Turkish application for EU membership, and even more helpful if the Conservative party and other parties on the centre-right in the rest of Europe also supported that application. However, while the Turks want in, the Tories want out. The Opposition have no locus in Europe, and no presence or status with their sister parties. I urge Opposition Members to stop their lurch to the right and to give up camping after UKIP votes. They should support the national interests of Britain and Turkey and ensure that both countries work for a successful EU and a successful Turkey in the EU.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Does the Minister agree that consideration of Turkish membership of the EU is an important negotiating tool when it comes to improving civil rights in Turkey? However, does he also agree that it is essential that that does not become an excuse for delaying consideration of Turkish membership, artificially and unnecessarily?

Mr. MacShane: Yes.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that this case offers an example of how the EU leads the promotion of human rights? The Turkish Government are adopting more progressive measures in respect of their Kurdish minority in part because they want to join the EU. That is one of Europe's missions that should be continued as more member states join, and it is a very welcome aspect of the EU.

Mr. MacShane: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. The EU exports its values—its democracy, its open market and its liberal traditions—osmotically, as it were, and during the adult lifetime of everybody in this Chamber we have seen considerable advances in many European countries, which were in a very different situation not so long ago. It is all the more sad that we hear relentless anti-European propaganda and see the move to the right by the Opposition. We also hear constant talk of breaching solemn treaty obligations on fisheries and social policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): I welcome the decision on Turkey and I also agree with the comments made so far about Kurds. I would also highlight the situation of Armenians in Turkey and of Armenia itself. Will the Minister encourage Turkey to improve Armenian relations, including making progress on resolving outstanding historical differences?

Mr. MacShane: I am a Foreign Office Minister, not an historian, and there are times when history should be left to history. Turkey wants to look to a better future in the European Union and that will require it—as it requires of all member states—to look with tolerance and sensitivity at some of the problems of the past. Sometimes the past is best dealt with by ceasing to rake it up incessantly.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister is correct to say that human rights in Turkey have improved, but when he says—as he just did—that it is now possible to register one's name and to broadcast in one's own language in some circumstances, it illustrates how far Turkey has to go before it can be genuinely a part of the European Union.

Mr. MacShane: I accept what my hon. Friend says, although such developments also illustrate how far Turkey has come. It seems like only yesterday that I was listening to complaints about the treatment of Kurds, which we all agreed was unacceptable. Now Turkey has made substantial legislative reforms, with implementation right down through the police and other systems. The very act of preparing for engagement with the EU is a powerful pressure on all Turkish society and its political leadership to conform to the values of Europe. That is why anti-Europeanism has no place if we want to help Turkey over the next few years.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): I thank the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues for their kind words for my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram).

The Government have rightly supported the accession of Turkey to the EU, and we welcome that. The Minister has said that Turkey must continue to implement improvements in human rights for all its citizens. Is it also the Minister's view that Turkish accession to the EU should give Turkish citizens, of all ethnic groups, the immediate right to free movement within the EU and the UK—or will the Government seek a derogation with regard to Turkey, just as France, Germany and others did for the countries of eastern Europe that joined the EU this year?

Mr. MacShane: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new post as shadow Minister for Europe. I look forward to as positive and friendly a relationship as I had with his predecessor. When Turkey finally joins the EU—which, frankly speaking, will take some years of negotiation—we expect that it will have the same rights as other countries. I regret and deplore the campaign in the winter against Poles, Hungarians and Czechs led by the Opposition and the isolationist right-wing press. I hope that when Turkey finally does enter the EU, the Opposition will have changed their spots and will support our partners in Europe, instead of campaigning against their being allowed to work in the UK.

Uganda

5. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the Government of Uganda on the security situation in that country. [190318]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): I discussed the security situation in northern Uganda with President Museveni and senior members of his Government during my visit in August. I also visited camps for people displaced by the activities of the Lord's Resistance Army in the north of the country.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. Given the coverage that events in Iraq and Sudan attract, does he agree that the ongoing war in the north of Uganda is the forgotten war? Does he acknowledge—I am sure that he does—how many children have been taken into the LRA? That is bad enough in itself, but the way in which those children are used causes the spread of AIDS. The health service in northern Uganda is collapsing, many people are dying of AIDS and the Government are struggling to cope. Does the Minister agree that the best—albeit difficult—way forward is to hold multi-party elections as soon as possible?

Mr. Mullin: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the dire situation in northern Uganda. There has, I am glad to say, been some progress in recent months, because Sudan, where the LRA previously sheltered, is no longer giving it shelter and has given the Ugandan army licence to operate in the south of the country. As a result, there has been quite a large number of defections—if that is the right word—among people in the LRA, including one or two senior leaders, although I would not want to overstate the position. The LRA remains a serious threat and it is a truly evil organisation. The difficulty in dealing with it is that it has no ideological agenda with which one can engage, but our view is that there is no purely military situation. A combination of amnesty, dialogue and military action is probably the way forward, and I am glad to say that that is making progress.

On the question of multi-party elections, the Ugandan Parliament and people are shortly to take a decision on a move to a multi-party system, and we welcome that.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Have the atrocious activities of the Lord's Resistance Army not gone on for far too long—about 18 years, I believe? The LRA seems to have no popular support, but nor do the people of northern Uganda trust or welcome the intervention of Government troops, so is there not a case for some international intervention or for a third-party force of some kind to put an end to the atrocities in northern Uganda and give that part of the country the security that it deserves?

Mr. Mullin: There has been no request from the Ugandans for outside intervention, although the international community, particularly the donor community, in which we play a leading part, engages closely with the Ugandan Government on that issue. We have been arguing that there is no military solution; as my hon. Friend says, the situation has been going on for 18 years and military activity must be combined with an amnesty and some form of dialogue, although, as I mentioned, such dialogue is rather difficult. By and large, however, that is happening and it is beginning to produce some results, so the situation is not entirely bleak. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that there is a much wider issue that will have to be addressed in due course—in fact, the sooner, the better: the marginalisation of the Acholi and Langi peoples.

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): Further to the Minister's answers to the previous two questions, it is clear that the LRA—the rebel activity in northern Uganda—has been barbaric and inhumane. I hope that the whole House will join me in condemning those atrocities, especially the appalling atrocities against children. Given recent evidence of support for the LRA from the Sudanese Government, what are the British Government doing to ensure that Sudanese resistance is eradicated and that it is not resumed in any volume? What pressure can the Government put on the international community to ensure a solution to the problem, so that that part of Africa is not forgotten while attention is focused on the nearby Darfur region?

Mr. Mullin: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, whom I welcome to his place, there is no such thing as Sudanese resistance. In the past—we think that it stopped about two years ago—the Sudanese were supporting the Lord's Resistance Army; they have given it shelter in southern Sudan and supplied it with arms and food. As far as we can tell, that has stopped. We have continued to talk to the Sudanese about the matter and they have given us clear undertakings on that point—I was in Sudan last month. They have also allowed the Ugandan army to operate in the south of Sudan, which has had an enormous impact on the LRA's ability to function. Considerable progress has been made recently. It is not a forgotten war, but hon. Members are right to draw attention to it, as the situation is dire and serious. About 1.6 million people have been displaced, but there is scope for mild optimism—I put it no higher than that—about the way in which events have moved. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) a moment ago, there will be a long repair job to be done afterwards to deal with the wider issue of the marginalisation of the Acholi and Langi peoples.

Diego Garcia

6. Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): What advice is given to the people of Diego Garcia currently living in Mauritius and the Seychelles who choose to take up their British passports and live in the UK. [190319]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): When passports are issued to Chagossians in Mauritius and the Seychelles, our high commissions there provide written advice on what they can expect when they arrive in the UK. It makes it clear that able-bodied Chagossians without care needs cannot expect to receive automatic support when they arrive in the UK and should ensure before travelling that they have the means to support themselves. That is the same for any other United Kingdom citizen without habitual residence in the UK.

Laura Moffatt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response. He will know that both inside and outside the House there is considerable concern about the plight of the Chagos islanders who moved to Mauritius. For me, the issue has been around people who may have been exploited entering the UK. Immediately on their arrival, a judgment in the High Court is sought on whether they should be given assistance through the local authority. That has caused enormous difficulty. May I ask my right hon. Friend to make sure that all Departments involved in what can be a difficult and painful issue work together to seek a solution?

Mr. Straw: I give my hon. Friend that undertaking. It is a difficult issue. I understand that the High Court's judgment against the county council is the subject of an appeal right now. We do our best to work closely together. I will make sure that we are doing that as well as we can. I repeat that the rules in respect of United Kingdom citizens arriving from Mauritius and the Seychelles are exactly the same as those for any other United Kingdom citizens who do not have habitual residence in the UK. There is no discrimination. Although I understand some of the difficulties that the Chagossians have encountered in Mauritius and the Seychelles, it is also fair to say that we have provided a large amount of compensation to those families.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh) (LD): What efforts have the Government made to ensure that compensation paid to these displaced persons through the Mauritian and Seychellian Governments has reached the people who expected to benefit from them?

Mr. Straw: My understanding is that the British Government have made two payments of compensation in relation to the resettlement of the Chagos islanders. Those payments in today's terms total more than £14 million. I have had no representations to the effect that the intended beneficiaries have not received the money. I am happy to follow up the matter if the hon. Gentleman writes to me.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Given last week's excellent ITV programme, which chronicled the appalling treatment that the Chagos islanders have received from successive British Governments and the fact that many of them signed away their rights to compensation without realising what they were signing, is there not a strong and clear moral case for the British Government to look again at making further compensation payments to some of the islanders who are living in the most appalling poverty?

Mr. Straw: I understand how controversial has been the history of the moves made many decades ago to remove the Chagossians from their natural territory to Mauritius and the Seychelles, but this Government and, I think it fair to say, our immediate predecessors have not acted in an appalling way. We have acted to the best of our ability and large amounts of compensation, given the relatively small numbers involved, have been paid.

Maghreb Countries

7. Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): What plans his Department has to increase its engagement with Maghreb countries during the UK's EU presidency in 2005. [190320]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): We plan to work closely with the Maghreb countries in advance of our EU presidency in the second half of next year. During our presidency, we will organise a high-level event to mark the 10th anniversary of the Barcelona process—that is EU jargon for the EU's engagement with the Mediterranean countries. The conference with the Maghreb countries, which my hon. Friend chaired in June, is an excellent example of how Members of Parliament, on behalf of all Members of the House, can increase our engagement in the region.

Mr. Marsden: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Foreign Ministers and ambassadors from the Maghreb countries who participated in that conference were delighted at the commitment that the Foreign Secretary and Baroness Symons showed to the meeting. I am delighted to hear that the momentum will continue with the conference next year on the Barcelona process. I offer two suggestions to my hon. Friend. The first is that, as part of that process, we do our utmost to encourage dialogue and engagement between the Maghreb countries and the newly acceded EU countries. They would be valuable allies for the Maghreb countries. The second is that, in preparation for the conference, we concentrate on building up the economic and financial infrastructure of the Maghreb countries, because that is close to our national interest in terms of encouraging trade with this country and reducing pressures on migration and potential recruitment to terrorist organisations.

Mr. MacShane: I agree very much with those points. Britain does not want poor neighbours; the European Union wants richer neighbours, growing in wealth and job creation in their own countries, to lessen some of the pressures of economic migrant flows. Indeed, I will have talks with Spanish opposite numbers in a couple of weeks on how, together with Spain, we can engage more positively with the Maghreb countries ahead of the UK's EU presidency next year.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, whichever party is in power, the real thrust of the UK presidency should be to improve literacy, to reduce poverty in the Maghreb countries and to look at serious security and human rights issues, as well as the situation of women in those countries?

Mr. MacShane: Those are important, valid points. On human rights, there are problems to do with journalists imprisoned in Tunisia. Algeria, of course, has had to deal with some pretty bad Islamic fundamentalist politics and a lot of violence. In Morocco, where the situation is easier, there still remain problems of poverty and illiteracy. The British Council is engaged in combating those problems, with the help of the Department for International Development. Britain can play a useful role because of the increase in the proportion of our gross domestic product that goes to overseas aid generally, but this is a priority for Europe. In the past 10 years, Europe has perhaps focused on its eastern and northern borders, but now we have to look south from Turkey to Cyprus and the Maghreb to see what we can do to improve the condition of all the people there.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a strong desire in all the countries of the north African littoral to enhance their relationship with NATO, the EU and, of course, with our own country bilaterally? We have a great deal to offer, and that is very much in our interests because we need to manage immigration and, of course, given the fight against terrorism. Will he indicate what sort of specific initiatives—for example, scholarships and other means—we have, apart from the ministerial conference, to seek to promote stability and improve our general relationship with that region, our new neighbours?

Mr. MacShane: Yesterday, at the conference of European Foreign Ministers, a very important decision was taken to lift the arms embargo on Libya, as a direct—I hate to use the word "reward" because that sounds a little condescending—and correct reaction to the fact that Libya has given a commitment, thanks to the initiative that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and his US opposite number took in getting it to do so, to resile completely from the development of weapons of mass destruction. Much progress is still to be made, and the Government are greatly concerned about some Bulgarian medical staff who are under the most appalling and unfair pressure in Libya. None the less, the progress made shows how engagement works, how working through the EU works and why Britain must stay engaged fully in the region, through the EU, and reject the isolationists temptations that we have heard from some right-wing political parties in recent months.

Iraq

8. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the situation in Iraq. [190322]

13. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): If he will make a statement on the situation in Iraq. [190328]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I will make a statement on Iraq at the end of questions.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that successful result to my question—17 years, and the first positive response.

On a more sombre note, may I express my sincere condolences to the family of the murdered British hostage, Ken Bigley, and ask my right hon. Friend whether the coalition forces can take any measures to try to increase the security of western workers in Iraq, to try to prevent or limit any more of those horrific kidnappings, given the fear and terror and, of course, publicity that they generate, particularly in the run-up to the Iraqi elections in January?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his expression of condolences to the Bigley family because I know that such things are making a great deal of difference to them.

The coalition has a number of measures in place, which it is always seeking to improve, to ensure the safety and security of non-Iraqi and Iraqi workers in the country. We give a lot of advice on our website. It is crucial for those who work in Iraq to register with the British embassy in Baghdad, provide full details of where they are and take detailed advice on appropriate protection. That does not eliminate risk, but it certainly reduces it.

Mr. Carmichael: Who is responsible for the reported disappearance of dual-purpose nuclear material in Iraq?

Mr. Straw: That is not clear. I am seeking many more details following the receipt of the International Atomic Energy Agency report overnight, but it appears that most of the unauthorised removal took place in the immediate aftermath of the major conflict in March and April 2003. I asked for a detailed report before I came to the House and I shall ensure that its results are made available to hon. Members.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): The Foreign Secretary has launched another pre-emptive strike on those of us who wanted to raise now matters that will come up later. In the aftermath of the horrific kidnapping and murder of Ken Bigley, may I put on record the real appreciation of the Bigley family and the city of Liverpool to the Foreign Secretary? He has handled a very difficult situation with great dignity and sensitivity, which has been to his utmost credit.

Mr. Straw: I thank my hon. Friend for that. May I express my appreciation to him, as the constituency Member for the Bigley family, for all the help and support that he gave the family, which I know that they have greatly appreciated?

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): May I associate the Conservative party with remarks about the Foreign Secretary's efforts in relation to Mr. Bigley? I know that the Foreign Secretary will make a statement on Iraq in a moment, but is he aware of a report in The New York Times on 8 October that said that the Pentagon had identified 20 to 30 Iraqi towns that must be brought under control before elections can take place next January? As part of the coalition forces in Iraq, are British troops likely to take part in that campaign? Does the Foreign Secretary have a view on how much of Iraq must be brought under control before valid elections can take place?

Mr. Straw: Assiduous though I am about reading The New York Times, I was not aware of that report—I shall look at it afterwards. Such a list was not discussed with me when I was in Iraq last week. It is perfectly plain, as I shall spell out in more detail in my statement, that there must be a better level of security throughout Iraq. We are not putting a figure on that any more than we did in Afghanistan because that would play into the hands of the terrorists. Although the situation remains difficult, there are indications that things are getting better, not least the agreement brokered last week between Moqtada al-Sadr and Prime Minister Allawi, which looks as though it is holding and will lead to peace and reconstruction in Sadr City.

Terrorism (South-east Asia)

9. Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Government of Australia on combating terrorism in south-east Asia. [190323]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): The Government remain committed to working with the Governments of south-east Asia to combat all forms of terrorism. We have regular discussions with the Government of Australia on the terrorist threat in south-east Asia. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary wrote to their Australian counterparts to offer our support and assistance to the Australian Government and people following the attack on the Australian embassy in Jakarta on 9 September in which nine people were killed. On this, the second anniversary of the Bali bombing, our thoughts remain with the victims and their families.

Ms Munn: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. He rightly points out that today is the second anniversary of the Bali bombing, which killed not only many young Australians, but several British citizens, including one of my constituents. Is the Foreign Office satisfied with the work that is being done in that area between Australia and Indonesia? Given our interests in the area, is every effort being made to support that?

Mr. Alexander: Of course we condemn utterly the bombing of the Australian embassy on 9 September. As I made clear, both the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister have communicated directly with the Australian Government, offering what assistance we can in the continuing efforts to combat terrorism. It is clear not just from that incident but from other terrorist incidents that the need for countries to work collaboratively across borders has never been greater in terms of the challenge of global terrorism. In that regard, Britain continues to play a leading role, not just in south-east Asia but right around the world.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): It took the British Government more than 18 months to implement some of the security lessons that Australia was so brutally taught by the Bali bomb. It is clear that the bombing of the Australian embassy in Jakarta would have resulted in many more casualties had the Australians not pre-empted the problem and reacted with great skill. May I ask that the British Government react with much more speed to this incident than they did to the Bali bombing?

Mr. Alexander: I am sure that the House recognises that we do not discuss the security of individual embassies, but I can confirm that I met the Indonesian ambassador recently. It is only fair to point out that we passed counter-terrorism legislation expeditiously after the events of 9/11 and we continue to take whatever measures necessary to safeguard the security of the British people.

Israel

10. Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): What representations he has made to the Israeli Prime Minister on his proposal to expand the settlement of Ma'ale Adumim on the west bank. [190324]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): A great many representations have been made calling on Israel to freeze all settlement activity. We have raised our concerns with Prime Minister Sharon's office and the Israeli ambassador in London. The Prime Minister and I raised settlement expansion with Israeli Vice-Prime Minister Olmert on 8 September. In my discussions with Israel, I specifically pressed my concerns about the proposed expansion of Ma'ale Adumim.

Martin Linton: I thank my right hon. Friend for making representations to the Israeli Prime Minister and the Vice-Prime Minister. Does he share the pessimistic assessment of Israeli Labour party MPs who believe that the expansion of settlements such as Ma'ale Adumim, deep in Palestinian territory, shows that disengagement is just a cover for assimilation, that the road map is all but dead and that if he is allowed to continue in this way, Ariel Sharon will be laughing all the way to the west bank?

Mr. Straw: I do not take such a pessimistic view. Our position on the settlements in the west bank, as in Gaza, is clear: they are not lawful and it is not in Israel's long-term interests to pursue them. The road map is not dead. I am aware that one or two comments have been made off-message in Israel about the road map, but they have been confounded by official spokesmen, and there was a good meeting of the Quartet, which supervises the road map, in New York on 25 September.

The situation is very difficult. The crucial thing is that we first see a withdrawal from Gaza by the Israelis as they promised. We need the removal of all the settlements there, which, as my hon. Friend will know, is very controversial in Israel, and strong international support for the Palestinian Authority to ensure that it can run the territory once Israel has removed itself from it. We must then ensure that similar withdrawals take place on the west bank.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): I, too, join in the expressions of sympathy to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram).

Does the Foreign Secretary understand that in Arab countries, where the particular nature of resolutions under chapter VII of the United Nations charter may not be fully appreciated, there is none the less an overwhelming sense of double standards when Security Council resolutions are sought to be used to justify military action against Iraq, but resolutions directed against the occupation of the west bank go unimplemented?

Mr. Straw: There are a range of resolutions in respect of Israel/Palestine, including 242, 338 and 1397. They place obligations not only on Israel, but on the Palestinians in respect of terrorism, and on the international community. It is lamentable that they have not been implemented. The road map seeks to ensure that they are implemented. There are clear obligations on Israel to stop the settlement building, to stop targeted assassinations and to move the route of the barrier, but there are also clear obligations on the Palestinians to ensure that they really do—I have been saying this for three and a half years without a great deal of effect—take proper control of the rejectionist terrorist organisations operating within their territory. In addition, countries outside the occupied territories—their neighbours—must cease supporting the rejectionist terrorist groups.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Should not the international community be far more robust in opposing what Sharon and his cronies are doing on Palestinian land? Should there not be far stronger condemnation of the way in which, day in and day out, the Israeli armed forces act against Palestinians, causing immense harm, death and destruction? Should we not condemn that in the same way as we rightly condemn suicide bombings, which are, of course, totally unacceptable?

Mr. Straw: I do condemn it. I have made that clear. Targeted assassinations and the untargeted killings of innocent Palestinians in pursuit of military operations are unlawful and unacceptable to the whole international community. We have made that as clear as we have our condemnation of suicide bombing.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the attitude and actions of the democratically elected Government of Israel constitute perhaps the greatest single obstacle to peace in the middle east?

Mr. Straw: I do not believe that. Israel's voting system has complicated Israeli politics to an incredible extent, as any sensible Israeli politician, left, right or centre, would be the first to say. Those who wish to adopt national list proportional representation need to bear in mind the political chaos that it produces—I mention that parenthetically, Mr. Speaker.

Israel is a proud democracy and we should salute it for that. It must be borne in mind that one of the reasons why the present Government are facing a collapse of their coalition as they seek withdrawal from Gaza and the removal of the settlements is that, unlike the Governments of some of the other states in the region, they have to get those proposals through the democratically elected, and rather difficult, Knesset.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that those who seek peace should welcome the Israeli Government's intention to withdraw from all settlements in Gaza as a first step? Does he also agree with the statement of Yasser Arafat's Prime Minister that the Palestinians should cease to support and incite terrorism, and thereby fulfil their promise in the road map?

Mr. Straw: I agree with both those statements. Although it is hardly a secret that Prime Minister Sharon is not the favourite politician of every Member of this House, we should judge all politicians on their proposals, and Prime Minister Sharon's proposals on withdrawal from Gaza and the removal of the settlements there are fully consistent with the road map and courageous and they ought to be welcomed.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I commend the Foreign Secretary for the balance that he is trying to strike between the Israeli Government's sometimes rather inappropriate behaviour and the Palestinian Authority's inability to bear down on rejectionist terrorists. He mentioned the importance of security in the Gaza strip post-withdrawal, but what specifically will the British Government do to bring about a state of security?

Mr. Straw: We are already doing a good deal to support security in the Palestinian Authority area—for security reasons, mainly in the west bank rather than in Gaza. I am giving active consideration to what further steps we can take to ensure that the Palestinian Authority can operate effectively within Gaza after withdrawal has taken place.

Mr. Streeter: It was interesting to hear during the recent Labour party conference that the Prime Minister will make revival of the middle east peace process a personal priority after November. Have we not heard that before? When did this crucial peace process stop being a priority for the Prime Minister, and why?

Mr. Straw: The peace process has never stopped being a priority for the Prime Minister, and he remains wholly committed to it. My right hon. Friend was simply drawing attention to a fact of life over which we have as little control as we have over the fact that the sun rises in the east, which is that the United States presidential election takes place on 2 November.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Is not the Israelis' intention merely to transfer settlers from the Gaza strip to the west bank, and does not the recent statement by Mr. Sharon's chief of staff that disengagement in Gaza will effectively derail the peace process give the lie to the Israelis' real intentions?

Mr. Straw: I do not think that my hon. Friend's first point is correct. In any case, if we are to get full withdrawal from Gaza and the west bank, it has to start somewhere. The Israelis have committed themselves to full withdrawal from Gaza and we should welcome that. As for what I gather was said by Mr. Sharon's adviser, Mr. Dov Weissglass, it has been disavowed by official Israeli Government spokesmen.

I refer my hon. Friend also to an important interview which Vice-Prime Minister Olmert gave in The New York Times in the middle of August—which I read—in which he spelt out the importance of Israel sticking to the two-state solution. He drew attention to the fact that if Israel did not do that, it would either become undemocratic or it would cease to be Jewish. There are arguments, which intelligent Israelis fully understand, that are in favour of the road map and a two-state solution broadly within the boundaries set out in 1967 for the Israelis as well as the Palestinians.

Sudan

12. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): What recent assessment he has made of steps taken by the Sudanese Government to resolve the crisis in Darfur. [190327]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): I visited Darfur last month. The situation remains extremely serious. Despite some progress on the humanitarian side, the Government of Sudan have not done enough to improve security. Ceasefire violations by rebel and Government forces continue. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister discussed those issues last week with the Sudanese President. We have made it clear to the Sudanese that they will be judged by their actions and not by their words.

Mr. Llwyd: I thank the Minister for that response. I welcome the Prime Minister's intervention in the Sudan and the five-point peace plan that was tabled. Does the Minister share the concern of many, including Amnesty International, that the proposed increase of African Union monitors, although welcome, leads to concern that the mandate and the capacity of those monitors should be strengthened to enable them to do a real job of providing security?

Secondly, what efforts are being made to ensure that UN human rights observers are increased in their numbers and properly resourced to carry out their responsibilities?

Mr. Mullin: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern, especially with regard to making the UN monitoring force more effective. We want to see it expanded and we want also to see the mandate strengthened. These issues are under discussion. We want to see the number of human rights monitors increased. We have been giving logistical support to the African Union as and when that is needed. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that there is a capacity issue. For example, we helped to fly in some of the Nigerian troops.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that Sudan is the ninth largest country in the world and that it is the largest country in the world that is not currently a federal state. Looking at the medium term, both in terms of Darfur and other parts of Sudan, what assurances can my hon. Friend give me that the UK Government are pressing the Government of Sudan to implement the peace agreements that were signed in Kenya this April, which included the establishment of a federal government in Sudan, which would go some way towards preventing certain crises such as Darfur in future?

Mr. Mullin: We believe that a settlement between the north and south of the country could provide a template for a settlement, eventually, in Darfur and in other parts of this tragic country. I am glad to say that the talks at Naivasha, in Kenya, resumed on 7 October. We are fairly optimistic that they will reach a conclusion. We are making it clear to all parties that we want to see progress. It is urgent that there is progress if we are to see a long-term solution to the problems of Sudan.

Charles Taylor

14. Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): What representations he has made to Nigeria with respect to the arrest of Charles Taylor. [190329]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): We believe that Charles Taylor must be called to account for his crimes, preferably before the special court in Sierra Leone. We have made representations to this effect to President Obasanjo. We remain grateful to the President and his Government for their role in diffusing the crisis in Liberia.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am grateful to hear that answer from my hon. Friend. Charles Taylor is a notorious individual who is responsible for the murder and mutilation of thousands of people. I for one would be delighted to see him before a special court, which the British Government have played a crucial role in establishing in Sierra Leone. What is my hon. Friend seeking to do to bring the other perpetrators of great injustice in Liberia to account, and preferably before a hearing in the special court?

Mr. Mullin: The number of indictments issued by the special court is limited, but they include Mr. Taylor. As my hon. Friend may be aware, trials have already started, and we are anxious that progress is made as swiftly as possible. It is essential, if there is to be peace in west Africa, that the culture of impunity that has prevailed in the region for many years is brought to an end, and we regard the special court as a means of achieving that.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Would the Minister impress on the Nigerian Government the fact that if Nigeria is to punch its full weight as the regional power it will be largely judged on its actions regarding Charles Taylor? Bringing him before the court in Sierra Leone is urgently necessary.

Mr. Mullin: Nigeria will be judged on a wide variety of actions, not least the positive role that it has played in Sudan and the AU, and on other issues. We must recognise that Charles Taylor is in Nigeria only because President Obasanjo resolved a difficult problem facing Liberia at the time. That country was facing a real crisis, and his decision to get Charles Taylor out of the country brought it to an end. We must acknowledge that before we go on to discuss what should happen to Mr. Taylor in future. The indictment against Charles Taylor, however, is for life. It will not go away, and the sooner he is indicted, the better—that is the Government's position.

Iraq

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on Iraq.

I know that I speak for the whole House in offering our condolences and deepest sympathies to the family of Kenneth Bigley. Throughout their ordeal, the Bigley family have conducted themselves with the greatest dignity, courage and strength. I also want to pay tribute to the dedication and professionalism of all those who worked to support Mr. Bigley's family and to try to secure his release—our officials in Baghdad, Bangkok and London, police officers from Merseyside and the Metropolitan Police Service and, if I may make a particular point, the Muslim Council of Britain, which was indefatigable it its work to try to secure his release. I thank the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), as well as the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) who, because of a bereavement, cannot be present today, for the restraint and co-operation that they and their parties showed throughout.

The House will understand that there is a limit to the information that I can give about the events leading up to the news of Mr. Bigley's death last Friday. However, at the beginning of last week, an individual approached the British embassy in Baghdad, presenting himself as a potential intermediary with the captors. Messages were exchanged with the hostage-takers in an attempt to dissuade them from carrying out their threat to kill Mr. Bigley, but at no stage did the hostage-takers abandon their demands relating to the release of women prisoners, even though they were well aware that there were and are no women prisoners in British custody in Iraq. These communications were fully in line with the Government's long-standing approach to kidnapping—while ready to receive messages from kidnappers, we cannot negotiate with them. Kenneth Bigley's family in Liverpool and his wife in Thailand were kept fully aware of our communications with that intermediary.

On Friday afternoon, the intermediary provided us with proof beyond doubt that Ken Bigley's captors had carried out their threat to kill him. On Friday evening, I travelled to Liverpool to convey our sympathies and condolences to Mr. Bigley's family. Kenneth Bigley was a decent man who was in Iraq for no other purpose than to earn his living by working for the benefit of the Iraqi people. His capture, the ordeal imposed on him and his family, and his murder were acts of utter barbarism. Our thoughts and prayers are with Mr. Bigley's family and friends.

I should now like to turn to the report of the Iraq survey group on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction which, as the House will be aware, was published last Wednesday, 6 October. The full text of the report is available on the internet, and I have attached to the written text of my statement, which is available now in the Vote Office, the Iraq survey group's "Key Findings".

The report concludes that by the mid-1990s, Iraq was essentially free of weapons of mass destruction, but it goes on to describe a sophisticated and systematic campaign by Saddam Hussein to bring down the United Nations sanctions regime and to reconstitute his weapons programme. It shows how Saddam Hussein subverted the oil-for-food programme in order to reward people

> "for their service and efforts in undermining the resolve of the international community to enforce UN Security Council resolutions".

The report goes on to state that the

> "ISG assesses that Saddam clearly intended to reconstitute long-range delivery systems and that the systems potentially were for WMD".

It continues:

> "Saddam never abandoned his intentions to resume a CW effort when sanctions were lifted and conditions were judged favourable".

I should like to give just one more example. The report says that the

> "ISG judges, based on available chemicals, infrastructure, and scientist debriefings, that Iraq"— in 2003—

> "probably had a capability to produce large quantities of sulphur mustard within three to six months."

The report provides chapter and verse as to why the policy of containment was not working. Indeed, in July 2000, as it makes clear, the ruling Ba'ath party newspaper Al Thawra

> "claimed victory over UN sanctions", and in August 2001 the Iraqi Foreign Minister claimed that United Nations sanctions efforts had "collapsed". Saddam Hussein's regime was dedicated to deceiving the international community, and it was working flat out to undermine containment and rebuild the weapons capability that it had already used on its own people and neighbours.

As the Prime Minister did in his speech at our party's conference, I of course accept that some of the information on which we based our judgments was wrong. But before turning to that, I want to pay tribute to the work of Britain's intelligence services, which is usually done in difficult and dangerous circumstances around the world. Their successes and contribution are necessarily often unsung and unrecognised, but yesterday the European Union recognised a key success from the same people in the British intelligence service in respect of Libya. When we lifted our sanctions on Libya, it was through our intelligence people—the same people who had detected through the same methods the fact that Libya was developing an unacceptable and large programme of WMD—and by ours and others' diplomatic efforts that we managed to ensure that Libya is safe and is brought back into the international community.

The House will recall that the Butler committee concluded, among many other things, that the validity of the line of reporting that included the 45-minute intelligence had come into question. It further concluded that reporting received from a liaison service on Iraqi production of biological agent was "seriously flawed". The House will now wish to be aware that the chief of the Secret Intelligence Service has written to my right hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor), the Chairman of the Intelligence and Security Committee, formally withdrawing those two lines of reporting.

[Mr. Jack Straw]

But I do not accept, even with hindsight, that we were wrong to act as we did in the circumstances that we faced at the time. Even after reading all the evidence detailed by the Iraq survey group, it is still hard to believe that any regime could behave in so self-destructive a manner as to pretend that it had forbidden weaponry, when in fact it had not. It is still hard to comprehend the logic of Saddam's behaviour in resisting UN inspections in 1998, and indeed driving out the inspectors, when he could have demonstrated that he had no weapons of mass destruction. He could even more easily have given the United Nations the full co-operation demanded by resolution 1441—the kind of access and ability to interview key scientists that has now allowed the ISG to reach the verdict that he had no WMD stockpiles, but which UNMOVIC was denied.

Even in the few days before the conflict, Saddam refused our offer to meet a handful of tests that would have shown that he had no WMD, such as delivering just 30 scientists for interview outside Iraq, completing the destruction of the illegal al-Samoud missiles or surrendering all anthrax or providing credible evidence of its destruction. Those were just a few questions drawn from the 173 pages-worth of unresolved issues and questions that the United Nations weapons inspectors were detailing four months after the passage of resolution 1441. In the circumstances, deciding to give Saddam the benefit of the doubt would have required a huge leap of faith. We would have had to conclude that all the intelligence—not only ours, but that from many other agencies around the world—was wrong. We would have had to decide, with no evidence, and despite Saddam's resistance to inspections, that he had in fact disposed of his WMD without telling the UN.

Instead, we made the judgment that it would not be safe to turn away and leave Saddam re-empowered and re-emboldened. Although we can now plainly see that some of the intelligence was wrong, I continue to believe that the judgments that we made and the actions that we took were right. Let it never be forgotten that the whole of the international community, including all 15 members of the UN Security Council, concluded from its own evidence, and not from our intelligence, that Saddam posed a threat to international peace and security, and it did not resile from that conclusion in the four months after resolution 1441.

On the current situation in Iraq, I travelled to Iraq last week and met the President, Prime Minister and other Iraqi politicians including Kurdish and other leaders in the north of Iraq, members of the Interim National Council, UN Special Representative Ashraf Qazi and the UN elections team. The elections to be held next January were one of the key themes in my discussions. Logistical preparations are moving ahead: voter registration is in hand, information on the elections is beginning to be distributed and training for national election staff is also on schedule. I stressed to UN Special Representative Qazi the vital importance of the UN increasing its presence on the ground in Iraq in the run-up to the elections. It is crucial that the UN plays its full part in advising on the electoral process in Iraq, a point that I have since reiterated to UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

The greatest difficulty faced by Iraq's Government in preparing for elections is, of course, the security situation, especially in the Sunni areas in the centre of the country where the violence has been concentrated. I was impressed by Prime Minister Allawi's determination to improve security. His strategy is threefold: first, substantive political engagement with Sunni leaders to persuade them that their interests are best served inside rather than outside the political process; secondly, rapid progress on reconstruction to improve people's daily lives; and thirdly, strengthening and accelerating the training of Iraq's security forces so that they can play the lead role in tackling the insurgency.

That approach is, I believe, beginning to pay off, with welcome progress in the Sunni town of Samarra and in the predominantly Shi'a suburb of Baghdad, Sadr city. Falluja remains the most acute concern, and we will continue to support the Iraqi Government as they work to tackle it. However, despite the security situation in some parts of the country, all the Iraqi politicians whom I met, who came from many parties and who included Prime Minister Allawi, were committed to national elections going ahead in January as planned.

Local elections are already being held in the south of the country, and the Iraqi people are showing a real appetite for choosing their leaders and holding them to account, an experience which has not occurred in the living memory of almost every single Iraqi. Successful national elections would deal a huge blow to the terrorists and insurgents who reject the ballot box and who seek to rule with the bullet and the bomb.

It is worth remembering that some—not to say many—warned that security would prevent elections in Afghanistan, and I remember dealing with that matter in this House not many months ago, but over the weekend we saw a huge turnout. In Iraq, although security is of course important for elections, only progress with elections can deliver lasting improvement on security, allow civil society and businesses to grow and enable trade unions, journalists, women's groups and all those denied the right to exist under Saddam to emerge from the darkness of his terrible regime.

It is vital that Iraqis take the lead in building stability and in shaping their political future, but they will continue to need the support of the international community. I therefore welcome the support of the group of Iraq's neighbours for both the Interim Government and an inclusive political process in Iraq, and their efforts to improve border security and stop terrorists getting into the country.

The international community meets in Tokyo tomorrow to review progress on reconstruction in Iraq. Already, projects to rebuild Iraq are employing almost 500,000 Iraqis who were not employed before. Preparations are also well under way for an international conference on Iraq to be held next month in Egypt, which was envisaged by Security Council resolution 1546, and which I shall attend.

The United Kingdom will continue to play a leading role in the international effort to support Iraq. I here pay tribute to the bravery and dedication of all the British personnel in Iraq, military and civilian, which I again saw for myself last week. Their work is vital as the Iraqi people seek to defeat the men of violence and to build a peaceful and prosperous future for their country.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I thank the Foreign Secretary for his statement and for his courtesy in making a copy available in advance.

I join the Foreign Secretary in sending our deepest condolences to Ken Bigley's family. They have borne their tragedy with great dignity and courage. We are all revolted by the barbaric cruelty shown by his kidnappers, and we stand with the Bigley family at this difficult time. I also add our thanks to all those who worked so hard in trying to secure his release.

Can the Foreign Secretary tell us what confidence he has that al-Zarqawi and his fellow murderers can be captured and brought to justice? Can he give any details about the part played by Ministers in the Government's efforts to secure Mr. Bigley's release? Does he believe that the Government could have done anything more to help Mr. Bigley, especially during his brave escape?

Our troops are carrying out, in very difficult circumstances, and with great courage and self-sacrifice, counter-insurgency and other operations in Iraq. We again pay tribute to their bravery and loyal service. But can the Foreign Secretary tell us more about the chain of command that exists in Iraq? What is the relationship between British troops, the other troops in the coalition forces and the Interim Iraqi Government? What are the means through which the British Government can influence operations carried out by the Americans?

The January elections are an important step in reaching the goal of a stable, democratic Iraq. What lessons can be learned from the picture that is emerging from the recent elections in Afghanistan? Why have we had no statements to the House on that important developing situation?

Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the situation in Iraq would now be far less grave had there been proper planning for post-war reconstruction, as we repeatedly urged for months before the conflict began and thereafter? As Sir Jeremy Greenstock and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) have confirmed, there was no adequate plan. When will the House and the country receive a proper explanation for that serious omission?

I come to the Iraq survey group's report. The House will recall the Prime Minister's words of 30 July last year, when he said we should "wait and see when they"—

the ISG—

"come up with their report what the true facts are."

We have waited and now we have seen.

The report alleges an appalling corruption of the sanctions regime, including the provision of oil vouchers to officials in countries that were blocking United Nations decisions. Were the Government aware of that corruption at the time the alleged events took place? What does the Foreign Secretary believe that it tells us about the way in which the UN operates?

The report's findings are dramatic: that Saddam Hussein has had no weapons of mass destruction for several years. Yes, he had a horrifying track record and the risks of leaving him in place were very great. He was a dangerous presence in the world's most volatile region. The world is better off without him. Those were all powerful arguments for going to war. But that is not the case that the Government made. The Prime Minister told us that "the assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt . . . that Saddam has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons" and that he was

"in no doubt that the threat is serious and current."

He told us that Saddam's WMD programme was "active, detailed and growing", and that it was "not shut down; it is up and running".—[Official Report, 24 September 2002; Vol. 390, c.3.]

But the Iraq survey group found no such thing. How did the Prime Minister get it so wrong?

We have reluctantly come to accept that when the Prime Minister comes to the House to talk about health or education, he spins and twists and bends, because that is what he does. However, on issues affecting the safety of the nation, the public expect the truth. All the way through, the intelligence advice to the Prime Minister was couched in caveat and caution. However, in the hands of this Prime Minister, caveats were stripped away and cautions were removed.

While the Joint Intelligence Committee told the Prime Minister that intelligence was sporadic, patchy and limited, the Prime Minister told us that it was extensive, detailed and authoritative. He did not behave as a British Prime Minister should. The next time that he comes to the Dispatch Box to commit British troops, who will believe him? That is why the British people must receive a full explanation and a full apology—not an apology for the intelligence but an apology for the way in which the Government conveyed the intelligence to the country. That is the apology for which we are waiting. Will the Foreign Secretary now make that apology?

Mr. Straw: I thought that the hon. Gentleman started quite well, and I thank him for what he had to say in respect of the Bigley family. I will come on to the further episodes of flip-flop that we have just seen.

On the hon. Gentleman's points about the Bigley family, he asked me whether I have confidence that al-Zarqawi can be captured. All that I can say is that al-Zarqawi's apprehension remains a key priority for all the coalition forces and for the Iraqis—most of al-Zarqawi's victims, like most of the other terrorists' victims in Iraq, are Iraqis. Those elements are not going at the multinational force, but are trying to stop democracy in Iraq—so it is in everybody's interest that he should be captured.

The hon. Gentleman asked about Ministers' role in Iraq. I can only say that by chance I was in Iraq on a long-planned visit when we got news from the intermediary. I was therefore able to be fully involved in discussions about the decisions made, and to ensure that the Prime Minister was fully involved, too. The hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not go into more detail than I have already offered the House. He asked whether there was any more that we could have done. In the circumstances, we did a lot, but it ended tragically. I rack my brains, as everyone does, about whether there were other things that we could have done. I do not think that there were, but I want to make it clear that there will be a full internal review of what we have done, to examine whether we could have done other things that might have made a difference, although I genuinely do not think so.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the chain of command, which is set out in the relevant paragraphs of United Nations Security Council resolution 1546, and the two letters sent by Prime Minister Allawi and Secretary of State Colin Powell to the Security Council. They work well, and we have a three-star general, General McColl, who is embedded in the key central command in Baghdad, to whom I talked while I was there, as well as our day-to-day operational command in the areas that we control in the south. One of the things that caused anxiety when resolution 1546 was being developed was whether the Iraqis would have sufficient say over key and sensitive operations such as Falluja. I am satisfied that they do.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether there was proper planning for reconstruction. There was proper planning—the problem was in relation to implementation of that planning. I accept, to put it at its mildest, that there were clearly lessons to be learned. One of the things that was unanticipated, however, was the speed with which the Saddam regime would collapse.

Turning to the ISG report, the hon. Gentleman asked me whether we were aware of the corruption. We had intelligence that suggested corruption, but we did not have explicit evidence, which required full access to all the documentation held in the relevant Ministries in Iraq. That was why we did not surface it.

The hon. Gentleman went on to make extravagant and completely unjustified comments about the Prime Minister in relation to the intelligence that we made public. I make two points to him on that. First, there was a huge demand from March 2002 for us to put before the House a summary of the intelligence that we had seen. That came from the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Opposition, and the House as a whole properly asked to see the case. That dossier, as the House is well aware—there have now been three inquiries into its provenance—accurately reflected the views of the Joint Intelligence Committee at the time and was signed off by it. Secondly—I will place these documents in the Library and make them publicly available—the House should be aware that we sought to cross-check the dossier with many people. One of my officials in New York showed Dr. Blix section 6 of a slightly earlier version of the dossier, which I am very happy to make publicly available so that it can be contrasted with the final published version. My official wrote a letter on 12 March 2002 to my then private secretary, the full text of which I will publish, which stated:

> "On the whole, Blix liked section 6—he felt it did not exaggerate the facts, nor revert to rhetoric, probably both desirable for its credibility."

That referred to the section on Iraqi chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes—the current position. It is important that the House fully understands that the evidence that we put forward was a view that was widely shared at the time by other foreign intelligence agencies, as well, as it happened, by Dr. Blix.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): This is a rather ambivalent occasion on which the House is both united and divided. Truly, the murder of Mr. Bigley was an act of gross inhumanity and barbarism. Words are inadequate to describe the fear, humiliation and pain that he must have experienced as his life was cruelly and wantonly taken from him—an act later to be made the subject of a macabre video.

As the Foreign Secretary has generously acknowledged, the Liberal Democrats supported the Government on this matter. I hope that he will understand when I say that we did so with a heavy heart, because we could foresee the consequences. Like the Foreign Secretary, we, too, wish to acknowledge the dignity and courage of Mr. Bigley's family, on whose emotions his captors played with a total lack of moral scruple.

I very much regret that in spite of the spirit of the first part of the Foreign Secretary's statement, I am unable to share the Government's conclusions about the ISG report. The Foreign Secretary acknowledges that the report shows that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and no programmes of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. He tells us that there was an intention. There was indeed an intention, but, to quote the report, there was > "no formal written strategy or plan for the revival of WMD after sanctions".

That prompts me to ask the Foreign Secretary how the regime can be said to have been working flat out to rebuild its WMD capability if it had no strategy or plan for doing so. Does he now accept that there was no "real and present danger", no "serious and current threat", and, as revealed by the leaked Foreign Office documents, from some of which the Foreign Secretary emerges with some personal credit, the true objective, 12 months in advance of military action, was regime change? Does he accept that regime change is illegal in international law, as is military action based on an unspecific intention to acquire weapons of mass destruction in future?

Mr. Straw: First, I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for what he had to say in respect of the Bigley family. As I said, notwithstanding other differences on Iraq, I greatly appreciate that the whole House and the whole country came together as they did. It made my life a lot easier having the full co-operation of the right hon. Gentleman and also the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram).

Let me deal with the ISG report. For the convenience of the House, I have appended the relevant document to the written text of my statement. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is right to say that there was no formal written plan, but that needs to be seen in the context of the ISG report.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Back of an envelope.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell)—I almost referred to him as a right hon.

Member, but I do not want to undermine the integrity of the Privy Council. [Interruption.] Hon. Members say that it is just a matter of time. The hon. Gentleman said that there was no plan, but in fact there was. It is clear from the ISG report that Saddam operated at the level that he did, not by formal written documents, but by making clear his intentions to others and by running a reign of terror. In discussing the ISG's conclusions in an interview with Jon Snow last week, David Kay, Duelfer's immediate predecessor, said:

> "This regime of Saddam Hussein acted as if it had weapons."

That is the point. It was that behaviour that made matters so difficult for both Governments and for the inspectors.

That leads me on to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's final point, concerning whether Iraq was a danger. Well, the whole international community came to that judgment. As page after page of the ISG report shows, Saddam was working to degrade the sanctions effort by playing it long with, and seeking to divide, the international community, and by seeking to bribe many of its key actors. At the same time, he was working to maintain his capability of rebuilding very quickly his chemical weapons programme in particular, and part of his biological weapons programme. By God, if he had been allowed to succeed, he would indeed have re-emerged very quickly as a greater threat than before.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): It is of the utmost importance that the full election timetable be continued until January—even if there are certain no-go areas, where there will have to be some postponement—because any major postponement would be construed as a victory for the insurgents. I was struck by my right hon. Friend's saying that he stressed to the UN Secretary-General that it is vital that the UN increase its presence. Does that imply that he is currently not satisfied with the number of UN personnel present? Of course, the movement of key personnel is restricted to the green zone because of the outrage in August last year. If my right hon. Friend is so dissatisfied, what are the prospects of the UN increasing its presence?

Mr. Straw: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right about postponement—we have to drive ahead with this timetable. The UN's presence is not as adequate as we all hoped, including the Secretary-General. The key problem is security and ensuring close protection for deployed UN personnel, so that they can get outside, and for their bases. This morning, I was on the telephone to one of the contributor countries to the multinational force—I shall not mention which one—to ensure that it provides active support and supplies protection equipment for one of the countries that, we hope, will be deployed very quickly. The situation is, I think, going to get better. Meanwhile, I pay tribute to one member of UN personnel who is already on the ground: Mr. Carlos Valenzuela, the UN elections expert. He is doing a brilliant job in guiding and advising the already established independent elections commission for Iraq, and he is ensuring—until now, at least—that the elections programme is on time.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): The report states in its key findings that, if Saddam had acquired weapons of mass destruction, he would have used them primarily against Iran and Israel and to improve his status in the Arab world. Does that not again highlight the importance of the middle east peace process, and is it not essential that we do something now, together with our European Union partners, rather than waiting until after the American elections in November?

Mr. Straw: I completely agree that a resolution of the entire middle east problem, and above all of the conflict between Israel and Palestine, is fundamental to stability in that region and in the rest of the world. The European Union is doing what it can, but it is just a fact of life that the United States is one of the four key partners in the Quartet. Everybody in the EU understands that unless we can bring the United States with us, our ability to influence one of the key parties to the conflict—Israel—is limited.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) (Lab): I fully accept the statement of my right hon. Friend that, at the time of the invasion, there were questions unanswered. Will he accept in return that, whatever else the ISG report might show, it comprehensively demonstrates that there was no immediate threat from Iraq? Would it not have been wiser to give Hans Blix the extra few months that he asked for to find the answer to those very questions?

On the current position in Iraq, has my right hon. Friend seen the recent figures from the Iraqi Ministry of Health, our own allies, which show that two thirds of the civilians killed in the last six months died as a result of coalition bombing? Will he redouble his efforts to convince the Pentagon that, if we are to succeed in winning over Iraqi opinion, they need to show the same restraint shown by British forces, and to remember that they are in Iraq to keep the peace, not to wage a war?

Mr. Straw: In a spirit of friendship and comradeship, I will not embarrass my right hon. Friend by pointing out all the things that he said when he was in my position about the threat posed by Saddam and his weapons—[Hon. Members: "Go on."] No, I will leave that aside. The heart of the argument in March 2003 was whether we could allow Dr. Blix and his colleagues more time to complete their inspections. The problem was that, although we wanted to allow Dr. Blix more time, there was not an effective international consensus for doing so. I made a statement on 10 March that year, following the failure on 7 March in respect of the six—just six—key points that the Security Council published for Saddam to consider. We would have accepted his agreement—we were going to take yes for an answer—and I should also point out that Dr. Blix went through those six key points. The whole purpose was to establish a clear template by which we could judge whether or not Saddam was complying with Security Council resolutions. It was Saddam who refused.

Meanwhile, there was a fact of life that we had to deal with. One permanent member of the Security Council said that "whatever the circumstances"—the exact phrase used—France would veto any decision in respect of military action. The only reason we got inspectors back into Iraq, following their being driven out by Saddam in late 1998, was thanks to the massing of troops and the threat of military action. A failure to follow through that threat would have led not to

Dr. Blix being able to complete his task, but to the degradation of the whole policy of containment. Saddam would have got what he wanted.

That was the argument, and I accept and respect the fact that my right hon. Friend took a different view. But I can honestly say that I have been through this issue many times, and that we did our best to persuade Saddam to give us a yes for an answer. We would have taken it, and no, we would not then have sought regime change. It would have been impossible for the Prime Minister or me to come to this House and seek support for military action if Dr. Blix had at any stage said that Saddam had complied. However, he had not.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): The Foreign Secretary will remember, because he was involved in events at the time, that about nine years ago, in good faith and based on repeated personal assurances from the highest possible official advice, I made a statement at the Dispatch Box that turned out to be untrue. Within days, I came back to the Dispatch Box, put the truth on the record and apologised to the House of Commons, simply because I believed—I was advised at the time that there were other ways of correcting the record—that we degrade public life if we do not adhere to truth. Why will not the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister please now apologise for giving information to this House that was not true?

Mr. Straw: I remember the case when the right hon. Lady came before the House then and she did well, but I also remember plenty of occasions when I was Home Secretary when I apologised to the House for the sort of disastrous thing that used to happen more often when she was running the Home Office than when I was. I once described it as "business as usual" at the Home Office, and I recall her castigating me for doing that on four separate occasions in one week.

I am the first to make an apology when I feel that it is due, but I must tell the right hon. Lady that the position is rather different here. The Prime Minister has already made it clear in his speech at the party conference that > "The evidence about Saddam having actual chemical and biological weapons, as opposed to the capability to develop them, has turned out to be wrong. I acknowledge that and accept it."

He then went on:

> "And the problem is, I can apologise for the information that turned out to be wrong, but I can't, sincerely at least, apologise for removing Saddam."

That is the position, and I am happy to repeat it here.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that deeply held views expressed in the House on both sides of the argument are to be respected. That is certainly my position. A local doctor working in a hospital in my constituency who comes from Iraq is in regular contact with his family there. They know what is going on and they are constantly telling him that life is much better for them, that they now enjoy a sense of freedom and a decent future at last. What troubles me about the whole debate is that such quiet voices are not getting through. I am not looking through rose-coloured spectacles about what is happening in Iraq, but I believe that we need to listen to those quiet voices.

Mr. Straw: I agree absolutely with my hon. Friend. The security position is very difficult in some parts of the country, but many of the Iraqis to whom I spoke, who represented a wide range of parties, made exactly the same point as my hon. Friend.

I want to apologise to my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) for omitting to answer his question about the casualty figures. I have not seen those figures. We keep a close eye on the figures provided by the Iraqi Ministry of Health and by one of the independent websites. I will follow it up, write to my right hon. Friend and place the letter in the Library of the House.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that if the present appalling level of violence continues in Iraq, there is little prospect of achieving long-term, enduring political stability or successful economic reconstruction? Is it not the case that the violence will be significantly reduced only if there is a radical increase in the number of trained and effective security forces available to the Iraqi Government? Does the right hon. Gentleman see any prospect whatever of achieving that?

Mr. Straw: There are signs, notwithstanding the difficulties of the security situation, that the multinational force and the Iraqi security forces are getting on top of it by a combination of tough security measures and a political process—the two go together. That is how some semblance of stability in Samarra and how understanding between the leaders in Sadr City and the MNF were achieved. A huge amount of effort is going into the training and equipping of the Iraqi security forces—the army, the Iraqi national guard and other paramilitary groups, the facilities protection force and the police. The numbers are rising rapidly, but I entirely accept the burden of the right hon. Gentleman's point—that the quicker the Iraqis become wholly responsible for their own security, the better.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West) (Lab): I support everything that my right hon. Friend has said today and I particularly welcome his comments about the Muslim Council of Britain and its role in the efforts to save Ken Bigley. It is important for the House to focus on the way in which Islam does not agree or go along with the activities of the organisations that perpetrate such actions.

Does my right hon. Friend intend to have any further conversations with Dr. Blix to go over some of his statements made at the time to compare them with his current statements? It would be worth trying to establish where exactly Dr. Blix stands now on some of his earlier statements before and after the inquiry.

Mr. Straw: On the last point, I made sure some time ago that Dr. Blix was made aware of our intention to publish the material in due course. It was also considered by the Intelligence and Security Committee and by the Butler committee, which is useful. Dr. Blix's opinions in September 2002 were a matter for his own judgment, and he came to a different judgment from ours, but it is important for everyone to understand that, far from the dossier being some sort of confection, it was based on the best available judgments not only of ourselves but of the wider international community, including the intelligence agencies of countries that were not in the end supportive of our approach, and of people in the United Nations. Everybody assumed that Saddam had these weapons and made their judgments on that basis. Everybody also assumed that he would become an even bigger threat if the UN measures were not successful.

On my hon. Friend's point about the Muslim Council of Britain, I entirely endorse what he said. I hope that we can acknowledge the efforts of the Muslim Council of Britain in one particular respect by not falling into the trap set by the terrorists and adorning or dignifying them with the label "Islamic terrorists". They are no more Islamic terrorists than Irish terrorists were Christian terrorists. They are simply terrorists, evil people, and everything that they do defies and defiles the values of Islam.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): I accept the good faith of the Foreign Secretary, so will he accept the good faith of those of us who voted against the war and acknowledge that we were not just star-struck Arabists or pacifists? Does he accept that we may have had a point in saying that the invasion would make international terrorism worse, and does he think that we may have a smidgen of an argument when we say that the continuing presence of western troops in a Muslim country is a gift to Arab terrorists and extremists? What is his exit plan and how are we going to get our troops out of the morass after the elections in January?

Mr. Straw: I have argued with those like the hon. Gentleman who have taken a different view, but I have never challenged their good faith. I am glad to hear that he does not challenge mine, the Prime Minister's or the Cabinet's. For the record, I have never thought of the hon. Gentleman as a star-struck Arabist or a pacifist. I reserve my contempt for those who took one position before and during the military action and a different position after it.

In Afghanistan, the great fear is of abandonment by western troops, not of occupation. I accept that it is different in Iraq, which is why we are moving rapidly to hand over responsibility to the Iraqi security forces. Resolution 1546 provides that the mandate of the MNF will run out at the end of next year or the end of the political process, which is more or less next year. It would then have to be renewed; otherwise the troops would leave automatically. We are working towards a sensible and orderly process negotiated with the Iraqis. They do not want us to leave until they feel fully capable of running their own security affairs themselves.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): People are wondering why we cannot have a debate on Iraq. The ISG report certainly demolishes the Government's case for going to war and we are also seeing daily bombing of cities and heavily populated areas such as Sadr City, Falluja, Samarra and others, which is resulting in the huge loss of civilian lives. Are the Government taking account of how many civilians are dead, or of how many women or children are dead or injured? Iraq Body Count estimates about 15,000 losses, and we have heard reference to the Iraq health group, according to which two-thirds of the casualties over the last three months have been civilians. Surely the House should be debating Iraq when those killings are taking place in our name.

Mr. Straw: As my hon. Friend knows, what is debated on the Floor of the House is a matter for the Leader of the House, but I will ensure that her views are put to him. I profoundly regret any loss of life, in Iraq or anywhere else. However, let us be clear that in certain parts of that country the MNF and the Iraqi security forces are dealing with the most unpleasant terrorist insurgency. It is the terrorists—not the MNF, the US, the UK or the Iraqi security forces—who are using suicide bombers to blow up streets full of women and children. They are deliberately seeking to undermine the recruitment of security personnel to the Iraqi police by means of terrorist outrages against them, and to prevent the political process from taking place. The culpability for most of the deaths lies with the terrorists.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): The Foreign Secretary is clearly right to say that the Joint Intelligence Committee signed off the dossier but, as the Hutton process exposed, that dossier's language was considerably strengthened as a result of representations to the JIC made by Alastair Campbell and other spin doctors. In the light of the findings of the Iraq survey group, does the right hon. Gentleman think that the intervention by Alastair Campbell and the other spin doctors made the intelligence more accurate or less accurate?

Mr. Straw: First, I believe that the role of spin doctors can be overspun. Palpably, there are many lessons to be learned from the fact that some of the intelligence turned out to be wrong, but some of the intelligence—such as that received about Iraqi missile systems—turned out to be amazingly accurate. However, I accepted the intelligence without too much inquiry because of everything else that I knew, from perfectly public sources, about the record of Saddam, who continued to defy Security Council resolutions for many years, even though he could have put himself in order. Also, as late as 7 March 2003, Dr. Blix published a 173-page report in respect of unanswered disarmament questions, in which he stated that there was a strong presumption that 10,000 litres of anthrax remained in Iraq. I am very proud of our intelligence service and I remind the hon. Gentleman that it had made very accurate judgments, on a similar intelligence base, about Libya, the A.Q. Khan network and other matters. That is why I, and the rest of us, accepted the intelligence.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): One of my many Iraqi constituents asked me over the weekend whether people in Britain understood that the nightmare endured by Ken Bigley's family had been a daily occurrence for families—including his own—in Iraq under Saddam Hussein. He went on to discuss with me the difficulties encountered when a body such as the UN tries to deal with a person who is a psychopathic killer and who is in breach of both the resolutions and the ceasefire. To me, that was always more important than the question of weapons of mass destruction. People like Saddam Hussein are intelligent and brutal, but also deeply unpredictable. Saddam succeeded in fooling the international community in respect of WMD, but does my right hon. Friend agree that what made him dangerous was his unpredictability?

Mr. Straw: As with my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt), I wish that more people were listening to the authentic voice of Iraqis, both here and in Iraq. Life there is getting better. One Iraqi told me that Saddam was the biggest terrorist of all, and that 300,000 people, including many members of his own family, had been murdered and dumped into mass graves. My hon. Friend is also right to say that, although there might be lessons for us to learn—and there are—it is also plain that there are lessons to be learned about the UN system, and to be learned by those who did not support effective action. As I recall, in the middle of 2001—before 11 September—a number of Security Council members were willing to work with Saddam to allow the sanctions regime to degrade, even though they knew that he was in clear breach of all sorts of obligations. The UN suffered from that, as did international peace and security. I hope that the high-level group established by Kofi Annan will find a way through these difficulties and learn some lessons so that we have much better ground rules for taking decisions in the future.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (LD): I pay tribute to the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister for their personal involvement in trying to secure the safety and release of Mr. Kenneth Bigley in Iraq. I disagreed with both of them at the beginning of Mr. Bigley's ordeal, but by the end I believe that they had done everything possible to secure his freedom. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a new international summit on Iraq, as outlined by Senator John Kerry, would be helpful in increasing the involvement of the UN?

Mr. Straw: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generous remarks, which are much appreciated. However, I hope that he will forgive me if I do not get too involved in the debates currently taking place between the two leading presidential contenders. An international conference called by Egypt is being held next week, and will involve Iraq's neighbours, the P5—the permanent five nations on the Security Council—as well as Egypt and some other countries. There is no doubt that the more we can involve the international community and get it on board in this matter, the better it will be for the Iraqis.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): The Butler report concluded that the allegation that Iraq tried to purchase uranium from Niger was well founded, yet the ISG was unable to find any evidence to support the allegation that Iraq had tried to buy uranium from abroad in the period after Desert Storm. Which of those conclusions does the Foreign Secretary support?

Mr. Straw: I simply say to my hon. Friend that that shows the difficulties faced by our intelligence services. We expect them to operate as effectively as possible but, by definition, they do not deal with established truths. They deal with fragments of information that they then have to put together to make judgments. Without their efforts, Britain would be a far less safe place and would have suffered many more terrorist outrages. To put it bluntly, people must understand that.

The Butler committee went into these matters in great detail and I respect its judgment, although I acknowledge that the ISG's conclusion was slightly different.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): May I associate myself unreservedly with the remarks made by the Foreign Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) about the incident connected with the death of Mr. Bigley, and with the remarks that the right hon. Gentleman made about our forces in Iraq? There can be no controversy about that matter.

I supported the Government in the Lobby in March 2003 because I believed that the Prime Minister had advanced a case for war that was based on the unvarnished truth. However, the Government's current justification for the invasion of Iraq is markedly different. Will the Foreign Secretary give me an assurance that what the Prime Minister told the House in March 2003 was based on the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for the first part of what he said, and I fully understand why Opposition Members might be tempted to raise questions about the good faith of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister or other members of the Cabinet. However, I do not believe that British politics is helped by that, or that there is any foundation for such claims. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister acted in complete good faith and there have been three separate forensic inquiries into the basis of the September dossier and much else besides. If the hon. and learned Gentleman looks at the motion put before the House on 18 March last year—the terms of which were discussed with the Opposition in advance—he will see that it was based on Saddam's breach of his Security Council obligations and on his failure to comply. That remains as true today as it was on the day when we voted for that motion.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): On the issue of an attempt to procure uranium from Africa, the Iraq survey group confirms the view of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which was presented to the UN Security Council before the war, that there was no evidence to support those allegations. However, Butler, while restating the IAEA view, comes to the opposite conclusion without giving any logical argument to justify that view. Does not that call into question the credibility of the Butler report and its conclusions on that and other issues? Why was it that the Government insisted that that allegation was correct, but omitted to mention that Iraq had no need to procure uranium from Africa because it had stockpiles of the stuff?

Mr. Straw: With respect, I am not entirely clear what point my hon. Friend is trying to make. If it is clear that the basis for intelligence was wrong, it has been withdrawn. I have announced two withdrawals today.

Butler analysed the information with great care, including all the intelligence that formed part of the dossier. Together with his colleagues, who included two right hon. Members of this House, he reached conclusions that were his conclusions, and not the Government's. If he had come to different conclusions, we would have accepted them.

All that this shows is the great difficulty of making cast-iron judgments in an area of intelligence. Nevertheless, people have to understand the importance of intelligence. The same intelligence services have a fantastic record of accuracy. In some of the dossiers they have worked on, such as Libya, they have been in error only in underestimating rather than overestimating the problem.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): On behalf of my party and my hon. Friends in the Scottish National party, I wish to associate myself fully with the condolences expressed to the Bigley family.

Today's statement has done nothing to justify the attack on Iraq. The Foreign Secretary referred to an intention to reconstitute weapons of mass destruction and intentions to resume a chemical weapons effort. As an upholder of international law, will he now lobby the United Nations to legitimise any further attack on a state based on its perceived future intentions, as revealed ex post facto?

Mr. Straw: That has never been the basis for action. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that chapter 7 of the UN charter sets out the circumstances in which the Security Council can declare a threat to international peace and security and authorise military action in that respect. I do not wish to detain the House, but I could do so with an account of the negotiating history that led to the operative paragraphs in resolution 1441 in November 2002. The hon. Gentleman and others need to look again at the motion that we put before the House, with Opposition support, on 18 March 2003. We invited the House to agree to military action overwhelmingly because of Saddam's failure to comply with Security Council resolutions. It was not to do with intelligence but with his failure to comply. That was the case then, and not a single word of the ISG report or any other confounds the conclusion that the House rightly reached on 18 March.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): I feel a great sense of outrage that the UN was corrupted by Saddam Hussein's regime. I cannot believe that any hon. Member believes that Saddam worked so hard, using money and influence, to corrupt the UN into deciding to lift the sanctions because he wanted to improve the welfare of his people. Anybody who believes that is living in a fool's paradise. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend whether we can we examine the role of France and Russia on the Security Council. It would not have been possible to obtain a second or third resolution by the Security Council, because whatever Iraq did, France and Russia would have blocked the resolution. The corruption by members of the Security Council, by officials of the UN and by the regime deserves the fullest investigation. For example, when will the oil-for-food programme investigation reach a conclusion?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend makes some important points. She is right to say that an element of naivety existed in attitudes to Saddam. It would not have been okay if we had simply walked away, but that was the only alternative. We sought rigorous inspections, backed by the threat of military force and a clear ultimatum to use it unless Saddam complied. That is what France—leaving aside Russia—said that it would veto in any circumstances, and that meant that Saddam thought that he was off the hook, as he would have been. France and other countries would have rued the day that they allowed that to happen, because he would have emerged much stronger as a result of his degradation of the UN by beating the resolutions.

Several inquiries are taking place, including one by the UN itself. It is important that we do not prejudge that, but on the basis of the evidence in the 1,000 pages provided by Duelfer, several individuals have a big case to answer.

Points of Order

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that thousands of jobs depend on air bases at Kinloss and Lossiemouth in my Moray constituency, and that grave concern is felt about potential cuts or closure under the ongoing airfield review by the Ministry of Defence. Since last night, the media have been tipped off that an announcement was set to be made about the review process. In fact, several media representatives called me at 11.20 this morning, quoting from a letter by the Minister of State about the bases in my constituency. I only received a faxed copy of that letter an hour later and the hard copy has still to arrive on the board. Is that an appropriate way for a Department to deal with important constituency concerns, especially when hundreds if not thousands of jobs are at stake? What remedy is available to Members to ensure that such cynical media management does not continue?

Mr. Speaker: I am deeply concerned about that situation if it is true. Men and women in the hon. Gentleman's constituency are genuinely worried about their future. He and the House should be the first to know. If the media want to know, we provide passes and the facilities of the Press Gallery to them so that they can hear what Ministers have to say. I would hope that the hon. Gentleman will go to the Table Office and inquire into the situation. I hope that it is noted that I expect statements to be made to the House, not elements in the media to be tipped off, especially about matters as serious as job losses.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that the House will have welcomed your strong stand and your admonishment of the Government. May I draw to your attention the fact that the Ministry of Defence is scheduled to make several ministerial statements on the Order Paper today, but there is no reference to the future of Lossiemouth, Kinloss or any other Royal Air Force airfield?

Mr. Speaker: That is why I am so angry. I have noted that fact.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask for your guidance on whether we will have a statement on the breaches of security that took place in this House during the demonstrations by the Countryside Alliance? Are we in a position to understand precisely how members of the public were able to get into this Chamber?

Mr. Speaker: This matter is being considered by the Joint Committee on Security. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate the difficulty that I have, because security matters should not be openly discussed on the Floor of the House. The matter is being considered and I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear with me.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the statement, you will have heard my question to the Foreign Secretary about an apology to the House from the Prime Minister for a statement that proved invalid. The Foreign Secretary's response, which you will also have heard, was that the Prime Minister apologised to the Labour party conference. Is it your view, Mr. Speaker, that the House and the Labour party conference are synonymous?

Mr. Speaker: As the right hon. Lady knows, when I became Speaker the Labour party and I parted company—on perfectly good terms of course, but we parted company.

Rite of Passage (Welcoming and Coming of Age)

1.40 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish Civil Welcoming Ceremonies, Responsibility to Children Agreements and Coming of Age Ceremonies; to make provision as to their conduct; and for connected purposes.

During my time in Birkenhead, my constituents have almost refashioned the way in which they see my role. Twenty-five years ago, when they first elected me to represent them in the House, most of the agenda was class politics. My constituents were concerned about whether I could help them achieve a new house, gain a welfare benefit or protect their job. That agenda has been transformed, almost beyond recognition.

Increasingly, in place of that class politics, my constituents ask whether I can help them to stop people behaving in an uncivilised way towards them, their families and their local communities. In the 25 years I have been the Member for Birkenhead, I have witnessed the replacement of class politics by the politics of behaviour.

There was no one point when it was clear that that transition had taken place. At first, I tried to justify gross incidents of incivility as exceptions, but I can remember the occasion 10 years ago when a group of decent working-class pensioners came to see me and I realised that politics had changed for the worse and, certainly in the short term, for good. They explained the nightmare they were living through: young lads who ran across their bungalow roofs, banged on their windows, peed through their letter boxes and jumped out of the shadows to try to give them heart attacks. They explained that the police were powerless to act to give them the sort of life that they expected. Those pensioners were the bedrock of our country. They had always worked hard and added more than they ever expected to take out, yet they found that the world in which they believed they would end their days was fast crumbling before them.

Both the last and the current Governments have attempted to respond to that changed situation—the politics of behaviour. Almost all of us welcomed the measures that the previous Conservative Government and this Labour Government have taken. The Government are rightly concerned as to whether we can hold the line more effectively against uncivilised behaviour.

The Bill begins to redress the balance. As well as holding the line even more effectively, we need to look at the root causes and to consider why we are increasingly surrounded by constituents who make pleas to which we can only partly respond. The very nature of politics is changing because the agenda has changed.

In the past, we took it for granted that people's behaviour had nothing to do with politicians. We had a peaceable kingdom because families, largely, functioned to ensure that although each of their members thought they were the most important person in the world, they realised that there were three or four other people in the household who thought that, too, and that an agreement had to be struck. In coming to those agreements in our families, we were all taught the social skills that enabled us to go into the wider community and behave in almost as civilised a fashion as in our families.

During my time as a Member, we have witnessed first a small but now, sadly, an increasing number of families who have no idea that their duty is to teach their offspring those common virtues. We have never had to deal with the issue, but now because families, supported by trade unions, Churches, friendly societies and mutual aid societies, all singing from the same hymn sheet, sadly, do not carry the weight they once did, we as politicians have to turn to that most difficult task.

Although any politician who thinks there is a panacea for such a fundamental issue should be led quietly away, put in a dark room, given a high dosage of pills and asked to recover, that does not mean that we should not attempt to build up a more effective programme. In the next parliamentary Session, the Home Office will give us another Bill on antisocial behaviour, and I hope that my Bill gives a flavour of some of the measures that we should like to see in that Bill.

I accept that, sadly, there is a slow walking away in this country from the role that organised religion played in the way we govern our behaviour. I do not believe that, as individuals, we have much chance of reversing that, but the Bill takes what were religious ceremonies and secularises and universalises them. It accepts that although those ceremonies were religious in intent, they also had a civic value in binding people to the wider community where they were treasured as individuals but to which they had responsibilities.

Part of the Bill takes the idea of baptism and secularises it, not to replace baptism where it occurs but to have a ceremony that adds to it. When the British Expeditionary Force went to France in the first world war, more than 99 per cent. of our soldiers were baptised. When we sent our forces to Iraq, fewer than four in 10 were baptised.

The Bill would provide for a ceremony that was once universal, to remind children and families that there is a wider community beyond the importance of the family. It would universalise that idea in a welcoming ceremony. In place of a hurried and unimportant entry in the registry of births, there would be a public ceremony in which we would welcome the child into the community. We would say what we want the child to achieve and set out the resources that we want, to ensure that parents can bring out the best in their child.

Likewise, the Bill would universalise the Jewish coming of age ceremony, the Bar Mitzvah—although without the presents. It is important that all our children know that there is a point when they begin to move from childhood to adulthood, and that as they make that move, so we expect their behaviour to change from the innocence—we hope—of childhood to an awareness of the greater responsibilities of adulthood.

No one would pretend that the Bill, even if it is embraced as enthusiastically as I hope it will be by the House, presents the panacea. However, I hope that it will do two things. First, I hope that it will give some idea of the positive measures that the Government will include in the new antisocial behaviour Bill, so that while we are more effectively holding the line against uncivilised behaviour we also look at its deep-seated root causes and prepare to deal with them.

[Mr. Frank Field]

Secondly, to help concentrate the Government's mind on their task, I hope that, before they publish their Bill, a number of like-minded Members will introduce a much more comprehensive measure than mine, which will both hold the line, because that is what our constituents most want us to do, and look at those root causes, because they want us to do that, too. Where families have failed, politics might achieve, so I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Frank Field, Ross Cranston, Mrs. Ann Cryer, Ms Meg Munn, Mr. David Kidney, Mr. David Willetts, Tony Wright, Mrs. Louise Ellman, Mrs. Alice Mahon and Angela Eagle.

RITE OF PASSAGE (WELCOMING AND COMING OF AGE)

Mr. Frank Field accordingly presented a Bill to establish civil welcoming ceremonies, responsibility to children agreements and coming of age ceremonies; to make provision as to their conduct; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 15 October, and to be printed [Bill 160].

Orders of the Day

Civil Partnership Bill [Lords]

[Relevant document: The Fifteenth Report from the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Session 2003–04, on the Civil Partnership Bill, HC 885.]

Order for Second Reading read.

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill represents a historic step on what has been a long journey to respect and dignity for lesbians and gay men in Britain. It is a natural progression in our vision to build an inclusive society. As such, it builds on reforms that began back in 1967 with Leo Abse's private Member's Bill, backed by the then Home Secretary, Roy Jenkins. The Government's commitment to equality has been strong and unequivocal. We have equalised the age of consent, outlawed discrimination in the workplace on the ground of sexual orientation, secured protection from homophobic hate crimes and supported the abolition of section 28.

In creating a new legal relationship for same-sex couples, this Bill is a sign of the Government's commitment to social justice and equality. It is also a recognition of the realities of modern Britain. Across this country today thousands of same-sex couples have made the decision to share their lives, their home, their finances and the care of their children or of older relatives. They may have loved and cared for each other for many years, yet their relationship is invisible in the eyes of the law. The Bill sends a clear message about the importance of stable and committed same-sex relationships.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Will the Minister recommend to the Treasury that carers, those being cared for and family members living together in their own family units should have the benefit of inheritance tax relief and capital gains tax relief?

Jacqui Smith: No, I will not. It is rather unfortunate that some Opposition Members have chosen to use an important equality Bill to pursue their campaign about inheritance tax. I will come back to some of the amendments that have been made in the Lords.

The Bill sends a clear message about the importance of stable and committed same-sex relationships. It marks a major step in helping such couples gain greater social acceptance of their partnership and overcome the distressing consequences for many people of their legal invisibility.

During consultation we heard and were moved by the personal stories of difficulties faced by same-sex couples precisely because they lacked a way of obtaining legal recognition of their relationship. They included terminally ill people and their partners who had to face not just the heartbreak of death and separation but the added trauma of being unable to leave a shared home or pension benefits. One man who had been involved in a major car accident was shocked to find that it was not his partner but his parents who were consulted about his medical treatment, that his partner might have faced difficulties registering his death and that although they had shared their lives he and his partner had no way of safeguarding their shared interests. Fortunately, in that instance, the parents were supportive through a difficult time, but that is not always the case.

Another man, on the death of his partner, found himself excluded from funeral arrangements and thrown out of his home by relatives of his partner who had had no contact with him for many years. Another person had to buy the couple's joint possessions from the parents of his deceased partner. A woman was kept away from her partner's funeral. These are the inhumane consequences of the invisibility of same-sex relationships.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The points that the Minister is making are valid, but do they not equally apply to platonic companions who share a home together and suffer equally?

Jacqui Smith: I do not believe that some of the issues that I have identified do apply. There is a particular significance to a partnership between two people who have chosen to share their home and their life, to love each other and to care for each other. I will deal with the issue of other types of carers, which I take seriously, later, but to conflate the two is to do justice neither to the same-sex couples whom the Bill seeks to serve nor to carers in the sort of relationships that the hon. Lady describes.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): The Minister describes a loving couple who have lived together for many years, sharing their house, their lives, their food. Do her arguments apply to the elderly sisters in my constituency who have lived together for 40 years and care for each other and love each other in a very real way as much as they do to lesbian couples?

Jacqui Smith: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman was listening carefully when I identified the specific problem for same-sex couples—the legal invisibility of their relationship. Of course there are issues about sisters living together, but their relationship is not invisible—it is already recognised by society, and often by the law.

Mr. Gray: No.

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman is plain wrong: of course their relationship is recognised in law.

The Bill would allow same-sex couples security in life, peace of mind in the event of a partner's death and fair treatment should their relationship break down. It provides the opportunity to enter into a legal relationship in which rights are balanced with responsibilities and the couple's commitment is recognised in law—giving solutions to the practical problems that too many people face—and makes an important statement about this country's support for stable, long-term committed relationships. These are the marks of a civilised and humane society. They are the principles that we set out to fulfil with this Bill, yet others have sought to wreck the principles on which the Bill is founded.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Before the Minister goes into more detail, may I ask her about Northern Ireland? I understand that this is a reserved matter so, conventionally, what happens there will be determined here. The Liberal Democrats are keen to see the legislation implemented in Northern Ireland. Will the Minister give an assurance that that is the Government's intention?

Jacqui Smith: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. It is the Government's intention that, under this Bill, not least given some of the issues that I have identified, the new legal ability to gain recognition for one's relationship will operate across England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Minister will be aware that in all political parties in Northern Ireland there is opposition to this Bill. She will also be aware that in the consultation 86 per cent. of the answers were no. Why is the Bill not going to be left until the Assembly is up and running again so that the people of Northern Ireland can make the decision themselves? [Interruption.]

Jacqui Smith: Well, Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Rev. Ian Paisley: I had nothing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am not quite sure who has finished and who is starting.

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman is right about the responses to the consultation, although I can report to the House that, as of today, we have received nearly 400 letters of support for the Bill from Northern Ireland, and there were 462 responses to the original consultation. The hon. Gentleman is wrong, therefore, to suggest that there is no support for the Bill in Northern Ireland. Given the universality of some of the issues that I have described, it makes sense to legislate, as we propose with the Bill, for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I welcome this groundbreaking Bill, but one issue—survivor benefits in occupational pensions—has worried a lot of people. Will my right hon. Friend take another look at the Bill, because it will create an inequality of treatment between same-sex couples and married heterosexual couples in relation to survivor benefits under occupational pension schemes? Will she see whether she can iron out that manifest discrimination?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend and other Labour Members have certainly worked very hard to raise that issue. Given that, as I have said, the Bill is about equality, I can undertake, as she asks, to look in considerable detail at the way in which we are able to provide, as we are in the vast majority of provisions in the Bill, equality in relation to survivor benefits under pension schemes, difficult though some of the issues may be.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): The Minister has several times used the word "equality". Will she be very specific? Is the equality that she seeks that whereby a homosexual relationship based on commitment is treated in future in exactly the same way as marriage in law?

Jacqui Smith: If the right hon. Lady looks at the Bill, she will see that, in the vast majority of cases, it is the Government's intention that those people who enter into a civil partnership will receive the same rights and take on the same responsibilities as those that we expect of those who enter into civil marriage.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): It would surely be much fairer to Members on both sides of House if the Government came clean and announced that they support gay marriage. Why will they not do so?

Jacqui Smith: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman heard me make the important point that civil partnerships under the Bill mirror in many ways the requirements, rights and responsibilities that run alongside civil marriage. I recognise that hon. Members on both sides of the House understand and feel very strongly about specific religious connotations of marriage. The Government are taking a secular approach to resolve the specific problems of same-sex couples. As others have said, that is the appropriate and modern way for the 21st century.

I wish to move on to the amendments—frankly, they are wrecking amendments—passed in another place. Our belief, which is supported by many hon. Members on both sides of the House, is that certain amendments passed in another place render the Bill unworkable. Those amendments would allow close relatives over the age of 30 who have lived together continuously for 12 years to form civil partnerships. Of course, we recognise that there are genuine concerns about the position of carers. That is why the Government introduced the first ever national carers strategy and ensured that the carers grant that we introduced to provide vitally needed breaks is six times higher this year than it was in 1999, and it is why we supported the private Member's Bill proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), but this Bill is entirely the wrong place to deal with those concerns. Parents, children and siblings already have legally recognised relationships to one another that are widely acknowledged and accepted in society.

The Opposition amendments passed in another place would also lead to myriad legal absurdities. A woman who formed a civil partnership with her grandfather would have her own mother as her stepdaughter. A grandfather could leave a survivor's pension to a civil-partner grandson. That turns pension provision on its head and could cost the taxpayer £1 billion a year and the private sector some £1.25 billion a year.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that those amendments can fairly be described as wrecking amendments, designed to prevent the Bill from becoming effective, and that they were tabled in that form by people who are afraid to come out and express their real motive, which is to oppose equality?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. As I have said, those amendments fail to recognise the principles on which the Bill is based and they will lead to some of the legal absurdities that I have outlined. I hope that all hon. Members will be honest about their real views, their real motivations and their real objectives in what they propose.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Is the Minister seriously telling the House that three bishops who voted for the amendments so ably moved by my noble Friends in the other place were engaged in a wrecking process? If so, they and their parishioners ought to be told that.

Jacqui Smith: I was saying precisely that the effect of those amendments would be to wreck the Bill. Those who voted for them, whatever their motives, need to be aware that that would be the effect of the amendments. I was going through the legal absurdities. For example, a son in a civil partnership with his elderly mother could lose entitlement to jobseeker's allowance, based on his mother's ability to support him financially. That would take our social security system back to the 1930s. Even more bizarrely, if he then wanted to marry someone else, he would have to live separately from his mother for at least two years, or he would have to prove her unreasonable behaviour. For those reasons and many others, the amendments stand condemned by the TUC, citizens advice bureaux, the Solicitors Family Law Association, the Law Society, Stonewall and many others, but, worst of all, they stand condemned by the very people whom they purport to help—carers. Carers UK believes that the amendments may even harm the position of carers and create new problems for them.

The House will also be aware that those amendments have rendered me unable to declare under the Human Rights Act 1998 that the Bill is compatible with the European convention on human rights.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): The Minister is being very generous with her time in giving way. Will she confirm that one of the issues for carers is that they will lose their entitlement to benefit if they register such a relationship because joint incomes will be taken into account? Some of those whom the Bill is directly designed to help would lose the most.

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman points out yet another difficulty with trying to impose an ill-thought-out wrecking process on a Bill that was intended to deal with another problem. He is absolutely right.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): My right hon. Friend refers to the European convention on human rights. As I understand it—perhaps she will correct me if I am wrong—heterosexual couples can take advantage of the Bill only if they are aged 30 and have been in a relationship for 12 years. If so, does that not breach the European convention on human rights, as it is discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is right. That is precisely one of the reasons that make the Bill in the amended form incompatible with the convention. For all those reasons and many more, we will seek to reverse those amendments and restore the Bill to its original purpose.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Is not the truth of the matter that those who tabled those amendments in the other Chamber did so because they do not believe that homosexuals are equal to heterosexuals, and that, unfortunately, that includes many of the bishops?

Jacqui Smith: As I suggested earlier, I hope that people will be honest about their motivation today—I suspect that my hon. Friend is right about some people's motivation.

I acknowledge concerns expressed by hon. Members and those in another place about the vulnerable position of unmarried opposite-sex couples, many of whom are under the misapprehension that they enjoy more rights than they actually do. That is the very reason why the Department for Constitutional Affairs is running a campaign to inform cohabitants of the significant differences between their rights and responsibilities and those of married couples. We agree that there are aspects on which all couples who live together need protection, especially those with children. That is not a matter for the Bill, but the Government are mindful of the issue, which is why we recently asked the Law Commission to carry out a project on cohabitation for inclusion in its ninth programme of law reform.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The Minister will be aware that page 12 of the report by the Joint Committee on Human Rights referred to the undertaking that the Government have given, but said that it did not go far enough and asked for more information. What information have the Government provided in response to paragraph 26 of the report?

Jacqui Smith: I have replied at length to the specific issues raised by the Joint Committee and I am sure that it will have ample opportunity to consider my responses. The Bill will provide the same opportunity for same-sex couples to gain legal recognition of their relationship as currently exists for opposite-sex couples through the route of marriage. That does not mean that all same-sex couples will choose to enter into that arrangement, just as not all opposite-sex couples choose to marry. However, same-sex couples currently have no route of legal recognition, so the Bill will put that right.

I shall now turn to the detail of the Bill. Part 1 defines civil partnership and makes the point at which a civil partnership is formed and ends clear. It makes it clear that a civil partnership may be formed in the UK, or overseas under UK law, and that same-sex relationships that are registered under the law of another country may be treated as civil partnerships under UK law. Part 5 provides a way of identifying those overseas relationships that can be treated as civil partnerships, and deals with the jurisdiction of UK courts in overseas cases and the recognition of orders made by courts abroad.

Part 2 sets out the procedure for forming and terminating a civil partnership in England and Wales and some of the rights and responsibilities that will flow from that relationship. The rights and responsibilities are serious, so entering a civil partnership will represent a major commitment. The registration process will be delivered by the local registration service, and there will be a formal, court-based process for dissolution if a civil partnership breaks down. That process would involve both rights and responsibilities for the civil partners involved. The provisions will ensure that civil partnerships are entered into seriously, that they cannot be exited lightly and that the rights and responsibilities that same-sex couples are given support them in their lives together.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Does the Minister share my disappointment that the Scottish Parliament is not considering the Bill, despite the fact that it has the competence to do so? There are differences involving dissolution and registration in the Scots courts. Is it the case that the Scottish Parliament is afraid to deal with the issue and is thus happy to let the Government pass legislation on its behalf?

Jacqui Smith: I completely disagree with the hon. Gentleman. As we consider the Bill in more detail, I have no doubt that any hon. Member who so wishes will be able to examine the detail of how we are responding to the specific nature of Scots and Northern Irish law. However, both legislatively and for the people who will be affected, it makes sense to legislate through one Bill because of its complex legal implications.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): Further to the point made by the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart), surely the situation illustrates the grown-up nature of the devolution settlement. The Scottish Parliament and Executive indicated well in advance their intention to pass a Sewel motion if the Bill was to their satisfaction. That allows Scottish Members, such the hon. Gentleman and me, to participate in the debate in the knowledge that the Bill will be applied in Scotland, although it might seem on the face of it that the debate relates to England and Wales. We should celebrate the situation as a success of devolution, rather than criticising it.

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is right. The Labour party has a grown-up approach, and I hope that all parties will adopt that approach.

After going through the process, same-sex couples' relationships will no longer be invisible and their duties and obligations to each other as civil partners will be significant. They will have responsibilities during their relationship, during the dissolution of their relationship—should that be necessary—and on the death of a civil partner. The provisions span registration, dissolution, property and financial provisions, measures to protect the interests of children and amendments to intestacy rules. They will directly resolve many of the problems that same-sex couples face, including issues of housing and tenancy, domestic violence and fatal accident claims.

Parts 3 and 4 deal with provisions relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively. Although there are differences between the provisions for civil partnership in parts 2, 3 and 4, most of the differences are procedural and reflect distinct legislative history and legal systems. As we have heard, the Scottish Parliament has debated a Sewel motion and agreed that Scottish provisions should be included in the Bill.

Part 6 ensures that references to certain familial relationships in legislation, such as step relations, can be read as including relationships that arise through a civil partnership. Parts 7 and 8 deal with several discrete areas of legislation that must be amended to reflect the existence of the new legal relationship of a civil partner. For example, schedule 24 will ensure that income-related benefits rules treat same-sex couples in the same way as opposite-sex couples. Child support rules will assess civil partners in the same way as married people, and civil partners will be entitled to most state pension benefits from the date of commencement of the Bill. The Bill also contains powers to require that pension benefits provided to married people are made available to civil partners from the date of the Bill's commencement, notwithstanding the commitment that I made earlier.

I must inform the House that the Government will move several amendments during the Bill's passage through this House. Most of them will be minor and I will write to hon. Members with detailed explanations of them. The great majority were tabled for consideration in the other place, but because of the impact on the Bill of the amendments passed on Report, which would fundamentally change the nature of civil partnerships, it was impossible for us to proceed with them.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): Will the Minister clarify the reference that she made earlier to survivor benefits? Is she saying categorically today that equal rights will be retrospectively applied for public sector pensions?

Jacqui Smith: I made a comment at the behest of my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle). She and other hon. Members have rightly emphasised the Bill's objectives on equality and the possible inequality that could arise with survivor benefits under pensions. I undertook to examine her representations and those of others in more detail.

The Bill has commanded widespread support and I would like to offer the House just two examples of that. A fortnight ago, I was able to visit the registration department of Brighton and Hove city council. It opened a pink wedding waiting list in July and people came from all over the country and queued around the block to express their personal wishes to register their relationships and support the Bill. I commend Brighton for that initiative.

Chris Bryant: I join the Minister in commending Brighton, but what will happen if a council such as Kent county council, a Conservative council that has reintroduced its version of clause 28, chooses not to co-operate?

Jacqui Smith: The Bill makes clear the process that registration authorities will need to put in place to ensure that civil partners have the opportunity to have that civil partnership recognised.

Support has also come from across the political spectrum. In November last year, a leader in The Daily Telegraph said:

> "The time has come to give homosexual couples some legal recognition . . . It is perverse that existing law should actively discourage any two people in a lifelong relationship from enjoying legal and financial security . . . Allowing gay people to affirm their relationship within a civil contract does not undermine the institution of marriage. It might even reinforce it".

I do not often agree with The Daily Telegraph, but I do in this respect. The support recognises that the Bill offers a reasonable and principled solution to the disadvantages that same-sex couples face because they cannot gain legal recognition of their relationships. Amendments passed in another place do not weaken our resolve to see the end of that unfair treatment and exclusion.

The Bill sends a clear and unequivocal message that same-sex couples deserve recognition and respect. It is a crucial step on the road to a fair and inclusive society, and I look forward to the House restoring it to its original purpose. I commend it to the House.

2.21 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I thank the Minister for her opening remarks and explanation of the Bill. It is a pleasure for me to give it my personal support and to do so on behalf of my party from the Front Bench.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I well recognise that my hon. Friend speaks in a personal capacity and from the Front Bench, but I take it that he is not speaking on behalf of the entire Conservative party.

Mr. Duncan: My hon. Friend should show a little patience. My right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition has stated openly many times that he supports civil partnerships and will vote for their introduction. I am pleased to repeat and share that commitment. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) rightly and forcefully points out, Conservative Members have a free vote. The Bill is not whipped. It is up to my hon. Friends to vote as they choose, from the position of principle that they will undoubtedly argue, although I am confident that a large number will share my view that supporting the Bill provides a timely opportunity to show that the party understands the world in which we live and that, as my right hon. and learned Friend the leader of the party has said, we are a party for all Britain and for all Britons.

Miss Widdecombe: Will my hon. Friend clarify, in the same way as the Minister did—I have to say with some honesty—that the Bill is actually about homosexual marriage?

Mr. Duncan: I do not accept that, but I will try to clarify the situation. In anticipation of my right hon. Friend's assessment of the Bill, I intend to devote a lot of time to answering that question, which it is fair and reasonable to ask. I hope that I might even be able to allay her concerns to the extent that she might approach the Bill differently.

Miss Widdecombe: I do not think so.

Mr. Duncan: I live in hope.

The demand for the Bill is far greater than many people realise. One of the facts about people's attitudes to gay people in the modern world is that essentially they are relaxed—utterly unexercised—about the phenomenon until the time when which they detect intolerance, at which point they become deeply and profoundly indignant. That is the climate in which the Bill is sought, not just by those who benefit from it, but by those who see the benefits it confers on others. It has much wider support than from those who are directly affected by it.

In passing, perhaps the Minister will confirm in the wind-ups that there is no danger, as highlighted in the report in The Independent on Sunday, that the passage of the Bill is under threat from the compression of time as we reach the end of the Session. I do not think that that many amendments will be tabled in Committee.

Mr. Chope: Does my hon. Friend think it reasonable that the Committee will have only two days to discuss this detailed Bill, plus all the Government amendments?

Mr. Duncan: I thought for a moment my hon. Friend said two gays in Committee.

Chris Bryant: Take a roll-call.

Mr. Duncan: Indeed.

I am not aware of how many days are proposed for the Committee, but I am sure that that will be discussed by the usual channels. I am sure that the Committee stage will be extended appropriately if amendments are tabled so that the Bill can be properly discussed.

I shall deal first with the Bill as the Government introduced it in another place, before turning to the amendments passed there. The need for the Bill is obvious to anyone who has seen and felt some of the heart-rending injustices that can occur when a committed gay couple are denied the basic rights that a married heterosexual couple would take for granted. Despite sharing their lives together, too many of these people find that their mutual love and commitment count for absolutely nothing in the eyes of the law. As the Minister mentioned, practical matters such as pension rights and financial issues are on one side, but more serious still are cases—sadly, all too common—in which the partner of a terminally ill patient is denied the right to make key medical decisions, or even the right to visit the ill person. On death, the surviving partner can be crippled by inheritance tax and evicted from the home they have both shared for years.

To illustrate that I shall quote just one of the examples, which is vivid, contained in a briefing from Stonewall. It says:

> "Rex is 76. His partner, John, died after they had spent 45 years together. Their house was in both names and John left everything to Rex in his will. Rex faced a huge tax bill in order to be able to stay in his own home. He also lost John's pension. Had he been married to a woman for just one day, no tax would have been payable, and Rex would have had a survivor's pension."

I hope that those reasons alone are enough to convince hon. Members that the Bill is needed.

Rob Marris: Do the hon. Gentleman and his Front-Bench colleagues support, as I and many of my colleagues do, retrospective survivorship benefits on pension schemes for registered gay couples?

Mr. Duncan: We will consider that in Committee. I am not clear about the likely cost. If it is minimal, the public sector might give serious consideration to retrospectivity. Shifting actuarial calculations is much more difficult in personal and private schemes because other people in a similar scheme could be disadvantaged by the retrospectivity applied to same-sex couples. That needs to be discussed properly in Committee in a responsible way.

Gay men and women are a fact of life in our country, in our communities and in the House. There are some who wish it were not so, but it is. Gay couples live together in committed relationships across the land and are accepted as couples by their friends and families. The Bill's purpose is to say that continuing to use the law to penalise them cannot be justified. It is designed to recognise same-sex relationships while applying the same restrictions as marriage regarding consanguinity—the bloodline links—thereby excluding partnerships between son and father, daughter and mother, siblings and so on. It is also designed, as the Minister said—I share her view—to apply equally across the country, so as to leave no pockets of discrimination within our United Kingdom, and to avoid the absurdity of people rushing from Gretna Green or Belfast to avoid it.

Civil partnerships have already been introduced in different forms around the world. Denmark introduced the first registration scheme in 1989. Today, eight EU members have some form of civil partnership, as do Norway, Iceland, Canada, Australia and some states of the United States. All have recognised the need for such provisions and have legislated for them.

One argument, brought up by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), is that civil partnerships create gay marriage and thus damage and undermine the institution of marriage. Some may see it that way; the House may wish to see it otherwise. First, although there are of course many similarities between the two institutions, they remain distinct in several important respects. While marriage is an ancient institution with special religious significance, civil partnership is a secular legal arrangement. That difference is made clear in the drafting of the Bill. Registration is given effect by the signing of the register rather than by the verbal affirmation, and a religious service is specifically banned during the signing of the register; in both such important respects, civil partnership is very different from marriage.

Even taking into account the elements of the proposed partnerships that are similar to marriage, the argument that they will damage the institution of marriage still does not stack up. If we preach that the values inherent in marriage—love, mutual commitment and responsibility—strengthen and enrich society, how can we claim that the replication of such values for gay couples will cause damage? Imitation is, after all, the sincerest form of flattery.

True, the two institutions are designed on similar lines, but they are designed on parallel lines; and parallel lines, as we all know, never meet. They are separate institutions for different groups of people. Gay men and lesbians are different precisely because of who they love, so the formal recognition of that love will itself create differences. One can therefore argue strongly that the Bill does not undermine or compete with marriage. After all, we are not exactly fishing in the same pool.

[Mr. Duncan]

Many practical issues will need to be dealt with as civil partnerships become accepted. For example, what does one call one's civil partner? It is a problem of modern manners that the term "partner" has many meanings these days: it can mean a business partner, a casual boyfriend, a girlfriend, or someone in a longer-term relationship. As developments take place, we may well find that we need to find new etiquette and new manners to enable us, in our changing civil society, to describe others in a form that makes people comfortable. I invite hon. Members to try to think of an appropriate word. As a prize, I offer a bottle of pink champagne. [Laughter.]

Mr. Leigh: I disagree with my hon. Friend. He supports the creation of an institution that is formalised in a register office, has all the attributes of marriage and can be terminated only by a form of divorce. Marriage does not need to be a Christian contract; it can be carried out in a register office, just like the proposed partnerships. Why will he not simply be honest and say that what we are creating is a form of gay marriage? He is entitled to that view, and he should be honest about it.

Mr. Duncan: The honesty emerges from a clear difference in respect for religious institutions. If we were forcing partnerships on a Church or religious institution, my hon. Friend would have a valid argument that they would conflict with what is now regarded primarily as a religious or religiously blessed institution. It is up to Churches, not up to Parliament, to decide what happens in future, but the clear distinction between a civil secular partnership and the institution of marriage will, in my view, be preserved. If my hon. Friend does not agree, he can vote against the Bill.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman is making a very good speech. In fact, the Bill prohibits Churches from taking such a step, despite the fact that many lesbian and gay Christians and ministers might want to do so.

Mr. Duncan: It is up to the Church. Yes, the Bill prohibits any sort of ceremony for the purpose of these partnerships in a religious institution. By the way, the Bill is flawed in that respect: it refers to any religious institution "so designed", but on Charing Cross road there is a gay club in an old church—a building designed as a religious institution. That might have to be dealt with in Committee. However, I repeat that it is for the Church to decide. That reinforces the point that I made in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough: the Bill establishes a clear distinction between secular civil partnership and the existing institution of marriage.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): I am following my hon. Friend's argument about parallel lines with great interest. If one accepts that that argument is correct, does it not follow that heterosexual couples who do not want to marry might feel that the terms of the Bill unreasonably exclude them from entering into a civil partnership?

Mr. Duncan: The answer is clearly no, because such couples have the option of marriage, in either a church or a register office, and under the law as it stands they can use other legal means to register their interdependency, so to apply civil partnerships to such couples would undermine marriage. That is why such a provision should not be made in the Bill.

Miss Widdecombe: I, too, have been following my hon. Friend's parallel lines with great interest. Citing the religiosity of the institution, he makes a distinction between marriage and the proposed partnerships, but what is the distinction under the Bill between a civil marriage carried out in a register office and a civil partnership? Will he admit that there is none?

Mr. Duncan: No. I admit that there is not a massive difference, except in terms of the ceremony itself: in marriage, the verbal vow is the contract, whereas in a civil partnership it is the written signature. In that sense, there is a legal distinction. Although I want to stick religiously—if I can put it that way—to the geometry of my parallel lines, I acknowledge that they appear to get ever so slightly closer together in that respect.

David Cairns: The hon. Gentleman is making an excellent speech. Earlier, he read out a long list of countries that have civil partnerships, some of which have had them for years. Has his research revealed any shred of evidence that the existence of partnerships has in any way undermined heterosexual marriage?

Mr. Duncan: In my personal view, no. In many respects, their creation has introduced in those countries' societies a degree of stability that is currently prohibited in ours by the law as it stands.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The hon. Gentleman said that consanguinity is applicable in civil partnerships as it is in marriage. Why, when the partnerships signify a secular relationship but the degree of prohibition comes from religious teaching?

Mr. Duncan: Because the proposed partnerships are a recognition of loving couples in stable relationships, not an endorsement of incest—something that I am sure the hon. Gentleman would not want to see in any legislation. I shall address those points when I discuss the amendments made in another place.

Concern is frequently expressed that civil partnerships will undermine the family. Let us consider those arguments. Today's families come in many shapes and sizes and people face many challenges. Marriages break up, parents remarry and the structure of the family changes. Many families no longer fit perfectly into the traditional two-parents-and-2.4-children framework, but are extended families in which there has been remarriage and same-sex relationships. The latter are increasingly acknowledged and accepted, even by grandparents, who 25 years ago would have found such relationships abhorrent. No one suggests that the absence of traditional arrangements within those new family units has led to the absence of bonds of loyalty, commitment and support that hold families together. Despite the difficulties of modern life, those values have shown a reassuring durability.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I must challenge my hon. Friend on that point. All the Office for National Statistics surveys illustrate that children brought up in a married household do better than those brought up in a cohabiting household, let alone in a homosexual household. The question that my hon. Friend has to answer—I am sure that he will do so elegantly, if not persuasively—is, is he not setting up yet another alternative lifestyle, which young people will consider equally valid, and will not the nuclear family be destroyed?

Mr. Duncan: What the Bill does is recognise what already is, and it tries to introduce a measure of permanence and stability into those relationships. I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend that a mother and a father together in a happy marriage are the best forum in which to bring up children, but I disagree with his suggestion that the Bill undermines that in any way. I do not think that it does.

Pete Wishart: I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's speech. May I contrast it with some of the clarion calls from Conservative Back Benchers, which confirm the view that theirs is very much the nasty party? What does he say in response to the illiberal and intolerant attitude that has been demonstrated by some of his hon. Friends?

Mr. Duncan: I say simply that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. We should dignify the House by accepting one another's differences in a proper way that puts arguments in an honest and direct context, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) does on so many issues, many of which I do not find myself in agreement with. There we are. Difference in the House, as a form of democracy, should be respected.

Let me follow on from what has been said. The fact that the bonds of relationships have endured is due in no small measure to the way in which our predecessors in the House have adapted the law to allow it to keep pace with social change. We have seen reforms of property rights, tax arrangements, divorce law and child care, which have all played their part. We have always accepted that ordered change is the best way to conserve those things that we value. The issues of child care and work-life balance are a growing item on the political agenda and are becoming increasingly important.

Measures such as those before us today are a way of protecting the family in changed times, not of damaging it. As I have said, gay couples are a fact of life. Rather than ignoring their existence, perhaps the House can now take a positive stance on their position in society.

I am sure that the issue of child care, which often causes strong feelings, will arise during the debate. It will be argued, rightly, that the best environment for bringing up a child is with two loving, married parents. However, that is not always possible, for a host of reasons, and children are now raised in many different circumstances. What is most important is that love is given to the child and that there is stability in his or her home life.

We had these debates at length two years ago during the passage of the Adoption and Children Act 2002, which legalised joint adoption by gay couples. I openly admit—the Minister was the judge of this—that even I was not entirely comfortable with the concept for a number of reasons. I was largely undecided. I had some qualms about whether it was the right way in which to proceed, but we passed the legislation. In many ways, that was a far more emotive issue than the one that we are discussing today. Having passed such measures into law, it makes even more sense now to approve civil partnerships. If we are concerned that children should be brought up by a stable, loving couple, these measures, when seen in conjunction with gay adoption, make a positive contribution to the family, rather than detract from it.

There is much in the Bill that I believe can be seen as deriving from the values in which Conservatives believe. It promotes responsibility and removes the intrusive hand of the state from people's personal relationships. As a whole, the Conservative party has always been welcoming of people from different backgrounds, and does not pigeonhole people from different backgrounds. It does not pigeonhole people into restrictive categories. I may be the first openly gay Conservative Member, but history will show that gay men and women have played leading roles in our party for many years, and I am pleased to say that many are among our candidates in winnable seats at the next election. So I do not accept that the Bill is in some way incompatible with conservatism. I personally welcome the measure, but it is up to my right hon. and hon. Friends to decide how they wish to vote.

I shall deal with the concerns that exist over the consideration of the Bill in another place and the amendments that were passed there. I begin from the basis that although the issues of discrimination and unfairness which the original Bill was aimed at tackling are, in my view, the most widespread—in many ways they are damaging and pernicious—they are sadly not the only ones that exist. Other groups are still disadvantaged, and the Bill as introduced does not, or did not, assist them.

It is profoundly unfair that carers and siblings who cohabit are disadvantaged on the death of one or other of them by being forced out of their home by their tenancy terms or by the burden of inheritance tax. So it was right for these issues to be raised in debate, and in doing so the plight of those who are disadvantaged in this way has been drawn to a wider audience. That is one of the purposes of our parliamentary system of scrutiny, and I am glad that the efforts and effective advocacy of colleagues in another place resulted in the Government promising—they did so, and I remind the Minister of this—to take further action to address these issues.

In another place, the Minister of State at the Home Office, Baroness Scotland, said in Grand Committee:

> "I shall certainly undertake . . . to give the House the more mature reflection of the Government in relation to how to respond to that issue".

That is, the issue of siblings and carers. The Minister then said that > "these issues have percolated to the top of the discussions on a number of occasions. They are issues with which the Government have grappled and they will wish to continue to do so."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 May 2004; Vol. 661, c. GC31.]

As they have now had since May to grapple and to percolate, I look to the Government, as I think all Opposition Members do, to fulfil that undertaking. I seek a clear guarantee from the Minister of State of the Government's firm intent to bring forward measures to address these issues at an early opportunity.

Angela Eagle: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is highly inappropriate, regardless of the merits of argument about home sharers, to think that the solution somehow lies in civil partnership arrangements? Will he be voting to take out the provisions in section 2(1) and schedule 1, which so disfigure the Bill?

Mr. Duncan: The hon. Lady's timing is impeccable. I was coming on to that issue and I can assure her that I think she is right. I accept that the Bill was not the appropriate vehicle for such action. When those in another place supported the Back-Bench amendment to widen the scope of the Bill, I believe that they did so with good intent. However, in doing so they fundamentally changed the Bill's nature and effect. They created a Bill that is at best bad legislation, and at worst unworkable and damaging.

As the Minister has said, the Carers Association has stated its opposition to the changes made in the other place, stating:

"We foresee many potential negative impacts"—

I think that this is the same quote—

"on the cared for person and the carer with the amendments to the Bill . . . The changes could have a devastating impact on the income of the carer and the person for whom they care."

So we are not doing a favour to carers if we move an amendment about carers that they do not want.

As the Minister said, many other anomalies and rather absurd unintended consequences arise. For example, a woman who formed a civil partnership—the Minister said with her grandfather, but I can equally say with her grandmother—would, following the amendment, have her own mother as a stepdaughter. That is clearly absurd and unworkable. On a more serious point, by allowing the degrees of prohibitive blood relationships within the existing family to be breached—I hope that this is persuasive to my right hon. and hon. Friends—to form a partnership with one another, the amendment does a great deal to destabilise and compromise the traditional family unit.

Their Lordships' amendment destroys what it sets out to protect. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has said in a letter to people who have written to him on this issue, if "two sisters were to register their partnership, they would have to pool all their assets. If later on, one of them wanted to get married, the only way they would be able to terminate this partnership would be through complicated legal proceedings."

That would be divorce. Imagine Doris and Violet, aged 80, going through a divorce. All that they would really need would be inheritance tax deferral so that one partner would not have to sell their home when the other dies.

Whatever the good intent, the Bill, as amended in another place, is now unworkable. The impression has been given that the Conservative party has sought to wreck the creation of civil partnerships, which I can assure the House is certainly not the case. That is why my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has said explicitly that he would like to see the amendment reserved—[Interruption.]—reversed. I can give that guarantee. We have a free vote, but I am confident that that is likely to happen.

I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to use the time that we have available during the debate to discuss other issues of detail, of which there are many. The issues of carers and siblings deserve their own bespoke legislation. If right hon. and hon. Members want to advance this cause, I hope that they will join me in demanding that the Government bring forward any such Bills at an early opportunity. I hope also that the Minister will now withdraw her rather abrupt refusal to do so in response to the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). In a sense, what she said starkly contradicts the comments of Baroness Scotland in another place.

The Bill is not, as some have argued, about giving an extra set of rights to gay couples and thereby discriminating against other couples. On the contrary, it is about removing a discrimination that already exists in law against them. For this reason, it is a case not of greater state intrusion, but of less intrusion, which is to be welcomed. As far as I am concerned, the duty of the state is to intervene where two people are hurting each other and not where two people just happen to love each other. As a Conservative, I believe in encouraging committed, long-term relationships that strengthen society. That is one of the best reasons that I can give for supporting the Bill.

For too long there has been perpetuated a negative stereotype of gay love as less committed, less stable and less valid than that between heterosexuals. That has been at the root of much homophobia, and has been used by otherwise rational people to argue for the retention of discrimination. "I am not homophobic", they say, "but gay people are promiscuous and do not want long-term relationships." That argument is not only insulting but inconsistent. How can people argue, as the Christian Institute does, that the proposals while also claiming that there is no demand for them? If we refer to our personal experience, I suspect that most of us can see at once how wrong that contention is. Most of us know at least one gay couple who live together in a loving, committed relationship. Many of us also know of at least one heterosexual couple whose relationship may not be so healthy or committed. The simple fact is that love comes in many forms, and so do the relationships that give expression to that love. It would be odd indeed if those who espouse and defend traditional values of commitment and faithfulness opposed giving gay couples the choice to live their lives according to those values. There is a long way to go in eroding the homophobia that still exists in certain places in Britain today. Gay people still face many barriers to full acceptance, but eliminating discrimination from our laws is an essential first step to eliminating discrimination from our hearts and minds.

"create a counterfeit moral standard that is imposed on all"

Mrs. Barbara Roche (Hornsey and Wood Green) (Lab): It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), whose speech was most elegant and, more importantly, tremendously moving. The whole House, whatever the position of individual Members, will treat it with great respect, and I congratulate him on it.

Seven years ago, I went to a beautiful summer wedding with my husband and daughter. I love weddings—it is like seeing a Shakespeare play performed with a different cast—and attend them with great anticipation. On that lovely day, we were all very pleased for the happy couple. Like anyone who is married, I remembered my own wedding, now some 27 years ago, and recalled the emotions, the commitment and the shared responsibilities that I embraced on that occasion. I turned to a friend who was sitting beside me at the ceremony and talked about that. She is in a long-standing lesbian relationship. We were all enjoying the lovely occasion, but she told me that the possibility of a commitment to her long-standing partner in which rights and responsibilities were exchanged was not open to her. That made a great impression on me, and I discussed it with my family and friends afterwards. I vowed that if I ever had the opportunity to do something about it, I would. I was therefore pleased to have had the opportunity in December 2002, when I was a Minister, to say that civil partnerships for same-sex couples were a good thing.

Before I made that announcement, there was a great deal of nervousness in government about what would happen, how people would react and what they would say. Would the heavens fall in? However, I made the announcement and that did not happen—life went on as before, and society did not appear to have suffered any disruption. Almost as soon as I made the announcement, my offices in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and in my constituency received many messages of support from people who had been in same-sex relationships for years. They loved and cared for one another in sickness and in health, but had never had the opportunity to register their relationship and enjoy the rights that many of us take for granted.

The proposed legislation, which I warmly support, is important for two reasons. First, it deals with equality and social justice. It gives people in loving relationships an opportunity to register those relationships. There will no longer be terrible cases of people who are in dire straits at times of great sickness or bereavement being denied access to their partner. Secondly, it will show that our country has grown up and come of age. We have heard about the great reforms of the 1960s, but those reforms decriminalised homosexuality and did not deal with acceptance. They did not achieve equality and social justice, but the Civil Partnership Bill will change that. It is therefore right to look at the Bill's approach to rights and responsibilities.

Make no mistake—we are doing something of fundamental significance for equality and the society in which I want my daughter to grow up. We must treat people with respect and compassion, which means that we must go even further than we are going today. If, for example, the Bill is enacted, as I am certain that it will be, and the first civil partnership registration takes place, the happy couple may decide to go on holiday to celebrate. The holiday company, however, may refuse to accept their booking because they are a same-sex couple. Most people in the House would be outraged by such behaviour, but the practice is not outlawed. People cannot be discriminated against at work, from nine to five or whatever hours they work, on the grounds that they are gay, lesbian or bisexual. After five o'clock, however, if they go to the pub with their friends they could be refused a drink. Until very recently, a well-known holiday company, Sandals, which offers Caribbean holidays, overtly prevented same-sex couples from going on some of their holidays. It has now reversed its position following pressure, but discrimination is still possible under the law. It has changed its policy, but there is nothing to prohibit discrimination against gays and lesbians on the ground of sexual orientation in the provision of goods and services.

If this House truly wants to show that it has come of age, it should move to outlaw discrimination on the ground of sexuality in the provision of goods and services. That is long overdue and we should resolve to take action as quickly as possible.

In all the campaigning on this issue, the speeches and articles that have been written and the questions that have been asked in this place and elsewhere, one organisation has campaigned particularly hard—Stonewall. I congratulate it on the way in which it has conducted its campaign. It is perhaps one of the best lobbying organisations in this country, and it is known to hon. Members in all parts of the House. It conducts its lobbying and campaigning in an exemplary way, but operates on a shoestring. It is amazing that it manages to do what it does. As we deliberate on this Bill, we should recognise that we owe a great deal to that organisation and to the people who have worked with it, campaigned with it and supported it.

We often assume in this House that it is we as Members of Parliament who have brought about legislation, but that is not the case. We also owe a great debt to the civil servants and officials who have spent months, if not years, putting everything together. From personal experience, I know that there is a devoted team of officials in the women and equality unit who have pioneered this legislation. In particular, one of them is a woman who has dedicated her life over the past couple of years to ensuring that it is introduced. I thank those people very much indeed. For them, this has been not a 9 to 5 job, but a life's work ensuring that we get the legislation that is so important.

I am grateful for having had the opportunity to speak in this important debate. I know that many important speeches will be made. I believe that we are doing something very important today that other parliamentarians will look back on in future years, and say, "I wish I could have been here then." Our Parliament has grown up, our country is growing up and we truly are striving for a society that is equal and in which there is social justice.

3.3 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), who did a great deal while she was in government to promote and pursue this agenda. I agree with her remarks about the need for equality of access to goods and services, although she may accept, as I understood her to do on the "Today" programme this morning, that this Bill is not the appropriate place for that. I wish to place on record my admiration for the manner in which both the Minister and the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) conducted themselves. They both made comprehensive and compelling contributions. In particular, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton made what I consider to be the best speech that I have heard from the Conservative Front Bench since I entered Parliament. Before hon. Members rush to accuse me of damning him with faint praise, I assure him that my comments are sincerely and warmly intended as a compliment.

The Liberal Democrats are pleased to give the Bill a warm and unequivocal welcome. We see it as an opportunity to offer the same rights and opportunities to people in same-sex relationships as are currently offered to people in civil marriages of mixed sex. It is an opportunity to offer fair and equal treatment to all in our society today, regardless of their sexual orientation. For us, the question on this Bill is not so much how we can support it as how we could not do so.

As the first Scot to contribute, I wish to say that I thought that the intervention of the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) was remarkable. I was astonished to hear a member of the Scottish National party talk down the Scottish Parliament as he did. Indeed, he should be aware—I am astonished that he does not seem to be aware of this—that the Justice 2 Committee of the Scottish Parliament discussed the Bill at length and produced an excellent report. Many of the concerns were taken on board by the Scottish Executive, which responded positively, and were well on their way to being included in the Bill as amendments in another place before Baroness O'Cathain did her work. I am confident that we shall see them back in Committee.

Pete Wishart: I am staggered by what I understand the hon. Gentleman to be saying. I intervened earlier to say that the Scottish Parliament is fully competent to deal with this issue. It could have dealt with the specific points in Scots law that arise. It chose not to do so because of the fear of controversy; it was like passing the buck back down to Westminster. The Scottish Parliament could have dealt with the matter and it should have done so, and the legislation would have been better as a result.

Mr. Carmichael: Time will tell just how good or ill the legislation is. The hon. Gentleman ignores the fact that the Scottish Parliament has already considered the provisions in detail, so it is not a question of running scared. Whether he likes it or not, he must recognise that there is a clear confluence of interest on many aspects of the Bill that have UK-wide application and involve Scotland. For him to suggest that the matter is better undertaken with a piecemeal approach is verging on the absurd. [Interruption.] Does he wish to intervene again, or is he happy to chunter away from a sedentary position?

The Minister and the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton cited a number of examples—I am sure that many others will deal with such cases—in which, after the death of a partner in a same-sex relationship, the surviving partner is frozen out of everything from the funeral arrangements to the disposal of the family home and other items of the deceased's estate. The treatment of the survivor in a range of other ways is discriminatory and wrong and the Bill provides the tool for ending that discrimination.

The Minister referred to the progress of legislation on equality that started with Roy Jenkins in the 1960s. She will also recognise that this Bill in particular is the result of a process that started two years ago with the private Member's Bill introduced in the other place by my noble and learned Friend Lord Lester. I wish to place on record my admiration and appreciation of the work that he has done to get this issue on to the political agenda. It is also to the credit of the Government, whom I have not been slow to criticise on occasion for being timid in tackling difficult and challenging political issues, that they are seeing this work to a conclusion. It would be churlish—I try not to be churlish, Madam Deputy Speaker—not to recognise the courage that the Minister and the Government have displayed.

The Liberal Democrats are, however, not uncritical of the Bill as it stands. The provisions that seek to create categories of civil partners other than same-sex couples, worthy though they may be, do not belong in this Bill, and they should be removed. When the Government table amendments in Committee to remove those provisions, the Minister will have the support of its Liberal Democrat members. On that issue, we are at one with the Government.

Notwithstanding the Minister's warm words, I fear that we will not achieve a similar consensus on the Bill's provisions on pension entitlement for surviving partners. It makes no sense to undertake an exercise such as this Bill to remedy injustice, unfairness and unequal treatment, only to enshrine injustice, unfairness and unequal treatment in the new law. The Bill will allow same-sex partners to accrue survivor's pensions in public sector schemes from the date of its enactment, which will probably be some time next year.

Chris Bryant: I wholly agree with the hon. Gentleman's direction, but his last remark is entirely inaccurate because the Bill does not say anything of the sort. The Bill allows the Government to do what they want on pension provision for surviving partners, and given what we have heard this afternoon, I hope that the Government move in that direction. However, he is wrong to say that the Bill prevents the Government from providing pensions for surviving partners on the basis of parity with spouses.

Mr. Carmichael: If we examine the outcomes, they amount to much the same thing, and the hon. Gentleman is harsh in saying that I am wholly inaccurate. The matter may require further textual analysis, in which I will be happy to indulge in Committee. Given what the Minister said today and what Ministers said in the other place, however, my point is that the Government intend not to afford survivors of civil partnerships equal treatment on pensions.

Angela Eagle: Following my earlier intervention, the Minister indicated that the Government are re-examining the matter, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that reply.

Mr. Carmichael: I welcome that reply. I hope that I have not become cynical after three and a half years in this place, but I have seen other Ministers get through Second Reading debates in which a tricky issue is causing disquiet among Government Back Benchers by promising carefully to re-examine the matter. I am delighted that the Minister is prepared to look again, but I would be even more delighted if the Government made a concrete improvement to their position, and I hope that the reconsideration is not just a measure to get the Minister through today's debate.

To allow even limited retrospection to 1988, the date when the equivalent provision was introduced for mixed-sex couples, would represent true equality of provision, and we shall introduce amendments to achieve that in Committee. That process will involve the insertion of a new clause, so the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) may have a point.

Quite apart from the inherent inequality of the Government's current position, surely it is wrong to penalise people who have done what the Government are always encouraging them to do by saving for their retirements. So why do the Government continue to resist? The argument is twofold and concerns cost and an aversion to retrospective provisions. Turning to the latter point first, I accept that it is undesirable to make retrospective provision in such matters, but it is not written in tablets of stone that it should not be done. If the choice is between retrospection and discrimination, surely retrospection should win the day.

The matter is not without precedent. In 1994, the Conservative Government changed the rules to allow female part-time workers who had been excluded from occupational pension schemes to obtain retrospective rights back to 1976, if they had paid the appropriate contributions. As far as parties to a civil partnership are concerned, the contributions will already have been paid, so we seek not an improvement in their position, but merely the removal of discrimination. In that case, employers bore the cost, whereas public sector pensions entail a cost to the Treasury.

What will the actual cost be? The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton referred to that point, and Stonewall has received actuarial advice that the cost would be between £6 million and £12 million per year over 15 years depending on the take-up of civil partnership or, to put it another way, between 0.01 and 0.02 per cent. of the pensionable payroll. Indeed, the Treasury might make a net saving, because parties to a civil partnership are entitled to equal treatment in relation to benefits and tax credits, which could amount to some £60 million per annum if the Government's position remains unchanged.

The question of survivor pension rights is the only substantive point of difference between the Government and Liberal Democrat Members, but it will not go away. Even if the Government refuse to concede the point here, they may be forced to concede it if the Bill is challenged in the courts. The Government will be aware of the decision in the House of Lords on the Godin-Mendoza case on 21 June this year. When the Minister replies, will she explain how the Government's position may be reconciled with the decision in that case? There is an old saying that for a ha'p'orth of tar the ship was lost; how much good will are the Government prepared to lose before they change their mind?

I shall expand my earlier remarks on the application of the Bill to mixed-sex couples and, in particular, to the much cited cases of carers and spinster sisters living out their latter years together. In principle, I have some sympathy for the arguments in both those cases, but we have gone well beyond arguing broad principle and are dealing with a Bill, and a fairly substantial Bill at that. It is apparent to anyone who bothers to read the Bill that the Government have, with some care, sought to re-enact the provisions relating to civil marriage for mixed-sex couples, warts and all. They have sought to put same-sex couples in exactly the same position as people who are married in a civil ceremony.

If one considers the Bill as being about outcomes rather than about labels, one must ask what benefit a mixed-sex couple would accrue by entering a civil partnership rather than a civil marriage. I cannot see one. Like a civil marriage, a civil partnership requires a declaration to be made before a registrar and witnesses, the same degrees of relationship are forbidden and publication of the intention to enter into the partnership remains the same as for marriage.

Should a civil partnership fail and be shown to have broken down irretrievably—the only ground for divorce in a civil marriage—it can be dissolved only by a court process, which addresses all the same issues as a divorce. So what is the difference for a mixed-sex couple? The only difference would be the acquisition of inferior pension rights for a surviving spouse in certain circumstances, but as I said, we have plans on that matter. In principle, I do not object to making the Bill available to mixed-sex couples, but in practice I can see no material benefit in doing so.

Turning to the Baroness O'Cathain provisions, I sympathise with the points that she raised in the other place but, as others said there, the Bill is not the place to address them. The argument concerns people who cohabit and who have a relationship based on love—albeit that the love that exists between siblings is very different from that which exists between partners drawn from outwith the family. The law has always treated such relationships differently for strong social, genetic and scientific reasons, and to abandon that approach in this Bill would be dangerous to say the least.

In some parts of my constituency, a higher than average number of people—either siblings living together or a child caring for an elderly parent—live in that way. In my experience, those people mostly manage to regulate their affairs and do not create problems for themselves or others in their family. However, I suspect that many of them would be offended by the suggestion that their relationship was in some way comparable to that of a husband and wife or a same-sex couple in a long-term relationship.

One can imagine even greater difficulties being created by the Bill as it stands. The example cited is usually that of the adult's offspring who gives up his or her job to care for an elderly parent, but what about the same person who gives up a job to care for both elderly parents? He or she would be prohibited from entering into a civil partnership until one or other of the parents dies. That surely cannot be right.

Most of the perceived inequalities could be eliminated by changes to taxation and property law, but that is not what the Bill is about. There will be another Finance Bill next year whereby such changes can be effected.

[Mr. Carmichael]

We need to pay attention to several other aspects of the Bill, and we shall do so in Committee. There are interesting debates to be had about the use of church buildings for the conduct of ceremonies and the recognition of civil partnerships in other jurisdictions. I look forward to hearing the Minister's explanation of the Government's position regarding the recognition of same-sex marriages constituted in Massachusetts. However, those are more issues of detail than of substantial principle, and they properly belong on the Committee Corridor, not on the Floor of the House.

For today, I am satisfied that the Bill is necessary and overdue. It is about ending discrimination and promoting equality, and we should all take pride in giving it the Second Reading that my colleagues and I will support tonight.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I welcome this groundbreaking Bill, which has been introduced by a Labour Government, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), who had a great deal to do with its early stages. Although she was unable to be around for its production, she has every right to very proud of the work that she put in.

This is a complex and comprehensive Bill—exhaustive, even, as I thought when I looked at some of its details the other night—and it has been three years in the preparation. It covers all the bases in terms of giving, as closely as possible, with the proviso of a few little kinks that I shall mention, equality of legal recognition to same-sex partners, who until now have not had their partnerships, however long-standing or loving, recognised in law at all. It is a time of celebration for many of us and of considerable personal interest for some of us.

For many years, same-sex couples have had to live not only with bigotry and ignorance, but with being legally invisible. We have heard some moving comments about the awful situations that that has created for them in times of great personal hardship. It is a great moment for celebration that the Government—and at least some Conservative Members, notably those on the Front Bench—realise that now is the time to put that injustice right and to grant legal recognition to same-sex partnerships. That gives them rights and responsibilities in terms of expressing their own partnerships with each other and having those partnerships recognised in law over a range of issues, including equitable treatment for life assurance; almost equal pension benefits, with, I hope, even more movement during the passage of the Bill; next of kin rights; rights to death registration; intestacy recognition; and gains in respect of recognising partnerships for capital gains tax and inheritance tax purposes. Those measures will avoid distressing tales of the kind that we have heard during the long consultation period and the response from many members of our society to the Government's comprehensive and long-awaited proposals.

As is only right in these circumstances, there should be responsibilities too—for example, a duty to provide maintenance for a partner in a civil partnership and any children who happen to be involved in the family.

Today we are celebrating the validity of same-sex partnerships. If the Bill becomes law, as I hope that it will at the end of this Session, and is enacted about a year from now, people will finally be able to celebrate their partnerships in that way.

The Bill does not represent an unusual obsession of the Labour Government—it is in the mainstream of change that is taking place world wide. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) mentioned some of the international comparisons in his excellent speech. In western Europe alone, 13 other countries—Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Spain, Iceland, France, Germany, Portugal, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Finland, Belgium and Luxembourg—have already introduced forms of registered partnerships or have such proposals in the pipeline. Areas of the world with similar plans include Hungary, Croatia, Canada, various states of the USA, and parts of Australia. New Zealand will consider a civil union Bill later this year. The Bill is in the mainstream of legal reform throughout advanced societies.

We have seen today a welcome change in the attitude of Conservative Front Benchers. However, there is still a Janus-faced side to the Conservatives that perhaps explains the free vote. They have a schizophrenic attitude; one need only read the debates in the House of Lords to understand how that manifests itself. I wish Conservative Members who are fighting the good fight well and hope that they continue to make progress. Some of the comments that were made in the House of Lords give some measure of the distance still to go in order to persuade Conservative Back Benchers that they should share the welcome views expressed by their Front-Bench colleagues. Baroness O'Cathain said that the Bill creates

"a parody of marriage for homosexuals".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 May 2004; Vol. 661, c. GC54.]

That echoes the awful and hurtful phrase, "pretend family relationships", which so damaged many same-sex couples during the era of section 28. Many Conservatives in the Lords are associated with the spoiling and wrecking amendments that have effectively torpedoed the Bill unless we can reverse them.

A great deal of work is required to persuade some Conservative Members that they should show respect to people who may not be of an orientation of which they approve but nevertheless have the same human rights as they have. I hope that the time of oozing hostility and distaste is passing, but there is still a fight to be had, and I wish those on the right side of the Conservative party well.

The extraordinary thing about the Bill's passage through the House of Lords was that it was used as an opportunity to drive a coach and horses through inheritance tax. It was used to argue that liabilities to inheritance tax or property rights somehow ought to be minimised through the Bill. The amendments that were passed, which, thankfully, the Conservative Front Bench will oppose, and which, I hope, will be overturned today, would cost £2.8 billion annually in forgone tax liabilities. I cannot think of anything less respectful than trying to turn something so important into a tax loophole.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Can the hon. Lady tell the House where she gets that figure of £2.8 billion from?

Angela Eagle: Official Government figures suggest that the amount is £2.8 billion, as the hon. Gentleman will see if he reads the House of Lords debates, as those figures were used by the Minister in the other place. That is quite a lot of money, and it is annual.

Mr. Howarth: The fact is that inheritance tax raises £2.6 billion a year in total. The hon. Lady cannot seriously suggest that the changes proposed by my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain would result in an even greater forgoing of tax by the Treasury than the total amount currently claimed by inheritance tax.

Angela Eagle: No, but inheritance tax is only part of the tax loopholes created by the vote to incorporate new clause 2 and schedule 1 in the Bill. The figure represents the cost of the whole effect of the provisions that we are considering. Although the hon. Gentleman is obsessed with inheritance tax, other loopholes are created by what the Lords did to the Bill.

We have all been brought up to respect the level of debate in the Lords, assisted by all the extremely expert people whom we are told are always in there. But this debate, I believe, is one of the most shameful that have been held in the House of Lords. It has had a ridiculous effect on the Bill. I shall quote a few of the people whom it purports to help. The Solicitors Family Law Association called the amendments an "unworkable mess" and an "absurdity". Lord Alli said—rightly, I think—that they were > "spoiling amendments designed to make the Bill unworkable."

The Lesbian and Gay Lawyers Association said:

> "We do not believe that people who care for their elderly parents would want to be in a situation where they would be prevented from marrying . . . and be jointly assessed for welfare benefits with their parents".

Carers UK, who were meant to be assisted by the amendments, said:

> "The changes would have a devastating impact on the income of the carer and the person for whom they care."

The Law Society said that > "it is inappropriate simply to include them"—

family members—

> "within the categories of those who can register a civil partnership. Registration will not solve their problems and may even worsen their position."

Many who have spoken in the debate so far have referred to the absurd effects of the amendments. I will give another example: a daughter entering into a civil partnership with her elderly mother to avoid inheritance tax would be effectively married to her own mother, and if she met a man whom she wished to marry, she would have to go to law to prove that her relationship with her mother had irretrievably broken down. She might also be legally liable to support her mother financially in any subsequent settlement. Clearly, that is ridiculous and inappropriate, and I am a glad that Front Benchers of all the major parties have said that they will be in the Lobby to expunge those amendments from the Bill.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Lady has just used an interesting term. She said that if a daughter and mother entered into a civil partnership, the daughter would be married to the mother. Therefore, she is saying that the Bill is about homosexual marriage. It is about one person in a civil partnership being married to the other.

Angela Eagle: It is not for me to interpret what the Government Front-Bench team want. I was careful in my choice of phrase—I said that such people would be effectively married. Whether one believes that that is homosexual marriage, as the right hon. Lady clearly does, or that it is a parallel state, which recognises—rightly, in my view—the legal rights and responsibilities for people who live in caring same-sex relationships, is irrelevant. Clearly, it is a completely inappropriate state to expect mothers and daughters, grandfathers and grandsons and other numbers of family members or carers who may be unrelated to the people for whom they are caring to resort to, in order to avoid some of the problems that currently occur with inheritance tax or property rights. When important disadvantages are associated with that, one needs to consider changing property rights or tax law to deal with the matter, rather than opting a whole load of people, who are sometimes closely related to each other, into what is either a marital state or something parallel to a marital state. I hope that she will agree that that would be completely unhelpful and absurd.

I want to spend a little time talking about pensions for surviving partners. I very much welcome the commitment that the Government gave earlier to taking another look at the problem of unequal access to occupational pension entitlements under the Bill as drafted. We welcome the fact that it grants equal access to state pension entitlements in what is a highly complex and technical set of provisions, but as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) rightly identified, as drafted it treats same-sex couples and married heterosexual couples unequally in respect of survivors' pension benefits under occupational pension schemes. Indeed, the same point is made in the fifteenth report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which I recommend that everyone read. It deals with the issue extremely cogently.

That admirable report points out what would happen under the Bill as drafted. Let us compare the situation of a married couple, one of whom dies, and a couple who entered into a civil partnership, one of whom also dies. Even if both deceased people make exactly the same contributions to exactly the same occupational pension scheme and die on exactly the same day—for example, the day after the Bill is enacted—there will be completely different outcomes for the surviving spouse and for the surviving partner of the civil partnership couple. One will get 17 years of their partner's pension contributions, but the other will get nothing. For what is a small sum—as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland explained, the Government's figure is £9 million a year for 15 years before the provision fades away—we could put right an anomaly that will discriminate purely on the ground of sexual orientation if the Bill is passed in its current form, even though such people have made exactly the same contributions to the same pension scheme.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be odd if someone like me, who has been paying into a public sector pension fund for nearly 30 years, did not have the same rights as a married heterosexual man, and ~~if they~~ did not receive any discount in respect of the amount that they had been forced to pay throughout that period?

Angela Eagle: My hon. Friend makes in a much shorter way precisely the point that I am labouring to make. Fixing this kink in the Bill as drafted is a question of equity rather than retrospectivity. Given that the contributions to these schemes have already been made, retrospectivity does not arise. What matters is ensuring that people in a similar state—civil partners or spouses—have access to the same benefits in the same way. So arguing about retrospectivity distracts us from the real issue, which is equity.

I am delighted that the Government have recognised that this is an issue. I hope that we will get a little more information in the winding-up speech on how they intend to proceed, but I certainly welcome their open-mindedness in taking another look at this problem. I hope that, if we can fix it appropriately, we can then concentrate on dealing with the wrecking amendments introduced in the Lords, and speed the passage of this extremely overdue but welcome legislation on to the statute book.

3.38 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): I believe that this Bill is wrong. If we pass it today, we will undermine the uniqueness of marriage, which is why I will oppose it at every stage. In a moving and interesting speech, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) paid tribute to those who have worked hard to bring the Bill about. I pay tribute to those who have worked hard and fearlessly for many decades, in an increasingly secular and sardonic society, to defend the institution of marriage, to defend traditional values, and to defend families.

I believe that what we are doing today is misconceived. I challenged the Minister, who responded with nearly 100 per cent. honesty, to say whether the Bill is really about homosexual marriage. I also challenged my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), who responded with a parallel lines analogy, but had to admit, under pressure, that those lines almost converged. He said that they did not quite cross, but I believe that, when it comes to civil marriage and the Bill, they do. That is what we have to address: do we think that homosexual marriage is right?

Everyone on this side of the House ~~would~~ cleave to the proposition that it is wrong of the Government to interfere in the exercise of free choice. The fact is that the Government do not interfere in the exercise of the free choice of homosexual individuals to form relationships—sometimes very committed ones—or to set up domestic arrangements together, which may then prove to be of very considerable or permanent duration. There is nothing in our law—or, increasingly, in the attitudes of society, which have been a bigger barrier in the past—to prevent that.

Mr. Borrow: I recognise the strong reasons why the right hon. Lady will oppose the Bill on Second Reading this evening, but the Bill is made up of many parts and provisions. I would be interested to know of which specific parts of the Bill that will assist same-sex couples the right hon. Lady approves and of which parts she disapproves.

Miss Widdecombe: I am coming on to that, if the hon. Gentleman will be patient. I am currently setting out the grounds of my opposition to the Bill.

Failing to pass the Bill will not stop, put any barrier in the way of, or make it illegal for two homosexual individuals—whether they be male or female—to set up a permanent relationship. If I thought that the law prevented that from happening, my attitude would be different, but it does not. The question before us is not whether we prevent that from happening, but whether we bless such arrangements with equivalent rights that have been wholly reserved for marriage in the past. That is the question that has to be answered today.

I accept that there are some unkindnesses and "inequalities"—to use the buzzword, though I noticed that my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton has a concept of both equality and costless equality, which are apparently rather different—in the way people who have set up a homosexual relationship will be treated by comparison with those who have set up in a proper married state. People whose domestic arrangements and sharing and caring responsibilities place them outside marriage will also face similar unkindnesses and problems.

I happen to agree that the Bill is not the right place or context to rectify those problems. I do not impute wrecking motives to those who voted in a certain way, because they were making a point, saying that the inequalities are not confined to homosexual couples so that if we are concerned about them in the one context, we should also be concerned in the other. The Bill is not, as I said, the place to address that matter.

Equally, the Bill is not the right way to address those problems when applied to homosexuals. The essence of the Bill is that people sign a register, as they do when they marry, which automatically confers all the rights of marriage. If there are problems, such as being dispossessed of a home because of inheritance tax or tenancy arrangements, they should be dealt with separately and they should cover not just homosexual arrangements but others as well.

Chris Bryant: To do what the right hon. Lady suggests, one would have to decide beforehand which people would be affected. Would that not mean that some kind of civil partnership would have to be set up?

Miss Widdecombe: No. As the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) pointed out just now, it would be nonsensical to have a civil partnership between a mother and a daughter. I believe that we must look again at the categories of person who are disadvantaged by a given provision, and then deal with problems on their merits in appropriate legislation—for example, the Finance Bill.

Mr. Alan Duncan: The fundamental premise being put forward by my right hon. Friend is that she wants to defend and protect traditional heterosexual marriage, and I think that all hon. Members agree with that. However, does she accept that homosexual love exists, as do permanent long-term homosexual relationships? Those relationships are of considerable value, even though they may be different. People who are gay are never going to enter into a heterosexual marriage, but does my right hon. Friend accept that their wish to be recognised as partners in no way competes with or undermines the heterosexual marriage that she wants to defend?

Miss Widdecombe: No, I do not accept that. I am usually in agreement with my hon. Friend, but perhaps not on this occasion. He says that homosexual love exists, and of course it does. As I said earlier—and I think that most Conservative Members will agree—it is inappropriate for Government to intervene in people's exercise of choice. People who want to enter such relationships should be able to do so because, after all, Almighty God gave us all free will. My question is whether we should deal with some of the anomalies that exist in homosexual relationships, and other caring arrangements, by means of a Bill on civil partnerships which, of necessity, precludes any arrangements other than homosexual partnerships. Alternatively, should we not look at each case individually and then decide whether to extend some of the provisions to certain groups in certain specified circumstances?

What is proposed, however, would restrict to one group only the rectification of the unkindnesses and injustices that I have mentioned. That would be achieved not by addressing the individual laws involved but by creating a register that exactly resembles the marriage register and by making the divorce provisions exactly the same as those that apply to civil marriage. As a result, the proposals would extend to another group a property that has always been unique to marriage.

There will be two views in this House about whether that is desirable, but we should have the basic honesty today to acknowledge what it is that we are doing. If we pass this Bill, we will send out of this House the message, which will be translated into law, that marriage is no longer unique. I want to keep it unique, but other hon. Members may not.

Mr. Carmichael rose—

Angela Eagle rose—

Miss Widdecombe: I hope that the hon. Gentleman and hon. Lady will forgive me, but I am under some time pressure—[HON. MEMBERS: "There is no time limit on speeches."] The pressure does not arise from any time limit, as I am about to explain.

If we want to keep marriage unique we should vote against this Bill. That is not to say that I do not recognise that the law contains certain unkindnesses that could and should be addressed in other ways. However, when we address them we should not restrict our efforts to one group, and certainly no effort in that regard should take the form of this Bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker, may I apologise to the House for the fact that I will not be present for the wind-up speeches? In case anybody accuses me of wimping out, I sincerely hoped that I would be able to get back for the vote but I have an urgent and completely unavoidable engagement which, owing to circumstances beyond my control, is now imminent. I apologise for that: when I asked to speak in the debate, it was certainly not my intention to miss the vote. However, I wanted to be able to make a clear statement of the fact that I believe in the uniqueness of marriage. I am prepared to address injustices, but not through aping marriage.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this important debate on this groundbreaking Bill. The Bill represents the partial completion of more than three years' work, because almost three years ago I was proud to move the Relationships (Civil Registration) Bill under the ten-minute rule. My Bill sought to allow all couples living together to register their relationship, but this Bill addresses the issue of same-sex couples. That is why I describe it as a partial completion. I will not rehearse the arguments about that now—others will do and have done so ably. However, I welcome wholeheartedly this Bill as a major step forward for the rights and responsibilities of an important section of our community.

It has been said that all people deserve to be treated with respect. That is right and that is what the Bill is about. As an aside, I may say how pleased I am to see gay and lesbian people as part of the mainstream of our society and no longer having to skulk, as they did 30 or 40 years ago, in little establishments that the rest of us were not even supposed to think about. I draw the House's attention to the first ever Pride festival in Reading last month. It was a delightful occasion and I invite all hon. Members to join us in future years.

When I introduced my Bill I received much support from Thames Valley police and, in particular, from WPC Alison Brown, who has been in a stable relationship for more than a decade and, like all Thames Valley police officers, pays 11 per cent. of her salary into her pension scheme. However, should she die, her partner would receive nothing. Alison has led a campaign for a change in the police pension scheme. In that respect, I am pleased to hear from Ministers today that the whole pensions issue will be reconsidered. I appreciate that the issue is complex and may be costly, but sometimes its costliness can be exaggerated. It should not be forgotten that gay and lesbian couples are not treated as households for the purpose of benefit entitlement. When I introduced my Bill I had letters from several people in same-sex partnerships who said that they were claiming benefit because they could. Their partners could afford all the household expenses, but my correspondents claimed housing benefit because they could. That is wrong. Benefits should be paid because they are needed, not because someone can claim them. That is the sort of anomaly that should disappear when the Bill becomes law, as I fervently hope it will.

[Jane Griffiths]

Can we learn from the rest of the world? Many countries in Europe and the developed world have partnership registration legislation and schemes, and other hon. Members have ably described them. Some countries have gone even further and allowed same-sex couples to marry. That has been a matter for some debate, especially in the United States, but also in Europe. Almost all our near neighbours have introduced some changes to allow same-sex couples some rights and, of course, some responsibilities and, as Chicken-licken might have said, the sky has not fallen in.

I was pleased that following the introduction of my Bill in 2001 much work was done in government. I was pleased to hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) about some of that work and the commitment to addressing the issue shown by officials and Ministers. As I have said, lesbian and gay partners are at present treated more generously under social security provision than others. A system of civil registration would allow same-sex couples to be treated in the same way as other couples. If people are not working, for whatever reason, the benefits they receive should not be affected by whether they are gay or lesbian, or heterosexual.

I was grateful, too, for the help and support that I received from Stonewall when I was preparing my Bill. At the time, I was contacted by a couple in my constituency—Ed and Tony—who have been in a stable relationship for many years. Ed was some years older than Tony, so he was concerned about what would happen if he died first. I am grateful for the heartfelt support that I received from Ed and Tony and for the support that I know they give this Bill. They are not alone. I have been contacted by a number of people who told me about their circumstances.

John has been in a relationship for seven years and is buying a car with his partner. That is a normal thing to do—couples do that all the time. The model comes with a year's free insurance but, under the scheme, it applies only to what are described as "normal" couples, so John and his partner must decide which of them can be insured for free—the other will have to pay.

Dick and Ben are in their 70s and have been together for 50 years. Of course, they have endured the general prejudice against the gay community—if we can use that word—as well as some of the injustices and, as the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) said, unkindnesses that the Bill sets out to correct. I was interested that the right hon. Lady used that word; it is one that should be used in the House.

Dick and Ben jointly own their home and most of their other assets, but in the high-cost area that they, and I, inhabit they will face massive inheritance tax, which is likely to make it impossible for the survivor to remain in their home. I understand that, at present, inheritance tax is a shibboleth of the Conservative party and this is not the place to explore the complex issues surrounding it.

I received a letter from Mark in support of the Bill. He said:

> "Many people criticise homosexual people for the alleged frequency and rapidity with which they change partners, yet still take the opinion that a measure to support enduring and meaningful gay relationships is also wrong."

Those real life examples provide evidence that the change we want to make is so right and that the wrecking attempts in the other place are so wrong. I am proud to have played a part in getting the Bill to this point and I look forward to it becoming law.

3.57 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): The Bill is about justice. The subject of civil partnerships is a heady mixture of sex, prejudice and religion, and the Bill is a serious attempt to address the injustices facing same-sex couples in the context of changing social attitudes and evolving religious interpretation of the scriptures.

It is a great strength of the Bill that it offers a secular solution to the way in which same-sex couples are treated, but there is also an important religious dimension. The Church of England, rightly, is the established Church of our country and Christian values are intertwined throughout our constitution.

I was a signatory to a cross-party letter urging support for the measure, sent to all Members of the House in September. We think that the Bill will remedy many of the injustices faced by stable same-sex couples. We also believe that it should be passed in its original form, without the amendment passed by the House of Lords on Report, which extended the scope of the Bill to family members and carers. I have great sympathy for siblings and others in mutually supportive relationships—we all know many such people in our constituencies—but I am convinced that the provision is wrong. That view is shared widely by Carers UK, the Law Society and others, so I very much hope that the House will remove the amendment. I am delighted that that position has the support of the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition.

It is easy for any Government to misjudge the speed of social change, and it is also easy for the House to do so; both must proceed with caution. Similarly, Christian interpretation of scripture moves on and practice in the Church evolves. It does so in a way that some find too fast, while others find it too slow. I believe that now is the right time for both Parliament and the Church to take a lead, which I am sure will be acceptable to the majority of our citizens, including Christian congregations.

It is good that the Bill proposes justice for gay and lesbian people. Is it not interesting, Madam Deputy Speaker, that 10 or 15 years ago those words would not have passed my lips? If we are honest, it is a measure of our own prejudice that I would not have spoken the words "gay" or "lesbian" then—certainly not in public.

The Bill would remove some of the almost mediaeval prejudices against gay and lesbian people. If they enter a civil partnership, the Bill would ensure similar legal recognition and similar consequences for their relationship as those enjoyed by married couples. I am a strong supporter of traditional marriage and I declare my interest. I have enjoyed 36 years of marriage and I look forward to many more. I believe that the term "marriage" and the cultural identity that it implies should be reserved for heterosexual couples and that it should have a religious as well as a secular dimension. I can understand why some committed same-sex couples yearn to call themselves married, but I urge them not to alienate opinion by pressing that wish and to settle instead for civil partnerships.

By giving legal and practical recognition to same-sex relationships, the Bill may help to support them and encourage their stability. Surely it is good to minimise the breakdown of any relationships. I believe that the Bill will enhance the institution of marriage by increasing public approval for stable, committed, loving interdependent relationships in society. I fail to see that acknowledgement of one permanent, faithful, stable relationship can undermine the status of another legally acknowledged, permanent, faithful, stable relationship. How can my marriage be undermined by someone else's civil partnership, or the other way round? Surely the more committed, stable relationships there are, the better. Furthermore, the fact that opposite-sex couples cannot enter into a civil partnership because they have the option of marriage stops civil partnerships being an alternative to marriage. It is marriage or nothing for a straight couple, and civil partnership or nothing for a same-sex couple.

The Bill will reduce prejudice against such relationships and reduce homophobic violence. It will also reduce homophobia because it challenges the view that the social benefits of marriage, which I think are stability, faithfulness, the nurturing of children, mutual support and so on, can apply only to relationships between people of the opposite sex. That is important. I have found it quite a struggle intellectually and emotionally to come to the view, for example, that same-sex couples can become parents. They do not always want to do so, and it is not always appropriate. Opinion remains very divided within the gay community, let alone within the heterosexual community, about the merits or otherwise of in vitro fertilisation or embryo manipulation among lesbian partners, but it takes place. As more lesbian and gay people become parents, there is now a growing body of research from the United Kingdom, Australia, Canada and the United States that finds no measurable difference between the children of lesbian mothers in terms of gender identity, social or emotional disturbance, quality of friendships, social acceptance or sexual orientation. Those are the facts. I have faced them and I have talked to some same-sex couples in my constituency. I have concluded that I was as prejudiced about this as most people are, not because I was wicked or perverse or stupid but because that is the received wisdom of the society in which I was born and educated.

It requires effort to open one's mind and adjust one's attitude, and it can be a painful process and a journey that, for all sorts of reasons, many people are unwilling to take. In short, we follow the pack or we take a lead, and I hope that the House will take a lead.

During scrutiny of the Bill in Committee, I hope that the Government will think again about the pensions issue. I believe that a wider power than exists in clause 245(1) is needed to allow limited retrospection to 1988, which I think is the appropriate date. Individual pension schemes could then be altered by regulation after Royal Assent. This is an issue of fairness. Yes, there would be a cost. It would amount to about 0.02 per cent. of pensionable payroll, which equates to about £12 million over 15 years. There would also be savings to the Treasury of about £60 million a year on income-related benefits.

To return for a moment to the Christian dimension, I was heartened that both the bishops who spoke on Second Reading in the House of Lords—the Bishops of Oxford and Peterborough—were broadly in favour of the original Bill. I am a Christian and I am doing my best to live a Christian life, so I pay attention to what the leaders of my Church say. In 2003, the House of Bishops of the Church of England published its guide to the debate, entitled "Some Issues in Human Sexuality". The chairman of the working group that produced it was the Bishop of Oxford. It makes very heavy, but very necessary reading if a non-theologian such as me seeks wisdom in place of prejudice.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: May I repeat the point that I made earlier? Three of the four bishops who took part in the vote supported the amendments proposed by our noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain. My hon. Friend is a little wide of the mark in suggesting that there is a firm view. In fact, three bishops out of four voted for those amendments.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is confused about the vote in the other place. I was referring to the debate on Second Reading, in which only the Bishops of Oxford and Peterborough took part, and they were both broadly in favour.

The Bishop of Oxford gave the official view of the Church of England—as it happened, on my birthday earlier this year—during the debate on Second Reading in the Lords. He said that the General Synod had voted to reaffirm the unique place of marriage in the law of this country, but recognised that there are issues of hardship and vulnerability for people whose relationships are not based on marriage that need to be addressed by the creation of new legal rights. That motion was passed by 248 to 27 votes in the General Synod of the Church of England. He also reported that, in its response to the Government's consultation on the Bill, the Archbishop's Council reiterated the central and unique place of marriage and endorsed the need for new legal rights because > "the law no longer reflects current social patterns and needs amendment to remedy injustice".

I agree.

In coming to my decision to support the Bill, I have been grateful to many organisations and individuals on both sides of the argument for their advice. I am grateful, too, to the quiet and thoughtful gay and lesbian people in my constituency— many of them active Conservative voters—for explaining why the Bill will change their lives for the better. I have received e-mails from as far afield as New Zealand, which has been through such a debate already.

I am particularly grateful to Jacqueline Humphreys—an English barrister specialising in family, matrimonial and ecclesiastical law—for pointing out some of the legal problems that the Church of England may face if the Bill becomes law. The problems range from the consequences of the clergy entering civil partnerships, including the possible conflict with the Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 and the exclusion of part II of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 in respect of women priests. There could also be new challenges in the occasional offices of baptism, marriage and funerals.

I am also grateful to the people who have put me in touch with a growing number of Christian websites that tackle morality and sexuality issues from all angles. I started with www.inclusivechurch.net and moved from there across the spectrum of the debate and around the world. I was particularly struck by the discontent among evangelicals at their traditional line.

In discussing the Bill with people of all ages, it is clear to me that there is indeed a generation divide. First-time voters—indeed, second, third and fourth-time votes—cannot understand how politicians in the House can be so out of touch. They have little or no sympathy for sexual prejudice. We say that we want to listen to young people, but they do not believe us when they hear or read some of the exchanges in the House. It is far harder for people over the age of 40-something to cope with change of all kinds, especially cultural, social and religious change. So, mindful of our heritage and core beliefs, I am convinced that the future is more important than the past, and I hope that Parliament will put the Bill on the statute book as soon as possible.

4.9 pm

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak about a Bill in which I have a personal interest, because I hope to take advantage of it once it is passed. I can think back to what society was like when I was in my late teens and early 20s—in the late 1960s and early 1970s—after the Sexual Offences Act 1967 was passed and compare it with what it is like now. The 1967 Act made it possible for gay men to live without such a risk of being criminalised, but it did not mean that that was easy, so few entered into lifelong relationships. In about 1971, I met a couple in Huddersfield, where I grew up, who had met during the war—they seemed very old to me at the time, although they were probably about my age now. Couples from previous generations have lived in lifelong relationships, so it is nothing new.

I have had the privilege of being a Member of the House for the past seven years, during which there has been a sea change in public attitudes to, and legislation affecting, gay people. I have a short list of the measures that the House has taken in that time, because it is sometimes useful to remember what the Labour Government have done since 1997. There have been measures to equalise the age of consent; to equalise sexual offences legislation; to give employment rights; to abolish section 28; to allow gay people to serve in the military; to give adoption rights; and to allow spouses from overseas to join their partners in this country. Those are the measures that I have remembered since I entered the Chamber this afternoon. That batch of legislation has generated changes to public attitudes.

The right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) mentioned some of the unfairness of current legislation and suggested tackling that piecemeal. That would be totally wrong. When people, be they heterosexual or gay, meet someone special, a relationship develops. One can be in love with a person, but that does not mean that one wants to share one's mortgage with them. When the point comes in a relationship when couples decide that they want to make a lifelong commitment, such a commitment should involve rights and responsibilities. If we are considering the structure in which we want couples to live, dealing with only the unfair and difficult bits, such as next-of-kin issues, or a little bit about inheritance tax, will not address the responsibility aspect.

If we are to provide a proper framework for relationships, there must be a way in which rights and responsibilities kick in. Mixed-sex couples reach that point when they decide to get married, but I believe that too many such couples feel that they can drift along without taking on rights and responsibilities in full, with the misguided assumption that everything will be all right. When people are relatively young, all the ifs, maybes and things that could go wrong seem to be in the distant future, so they wonder why they should worry about them. However, I am beginning to wonder how my partner would cope if something happened to me, because I am not 20-something, but 50-something. That consideration has become crucial to me and many others who are in long-term same-sex relationships.

I am fortunate that my partner and I have the support of an extended family, so problems involving next of kin, funerals and what happens in hospitals are unlikely to arise as starkly as they do for others. However, there are well-documented cases of the partners of people who have died or become ill being completely excluded from any consideration. We need to address such matters comprehensively, which is what the Bill does.

The issue of rights and responsibilities relates to benefits. It is crucial that same-sex couples are treated as a single household, not as separate households, in the benefits system. That is part of the quid pro quo of what we want to establish. Whether people see that as the equivalent of marriage is not important. What is important is that we provide a structure for same-sex couples to live their lives in a way that gives them some security, especially as they move towards old age. That is when such issues become very important.

When I speak to constituents about the subject, they say, "What's the big deal? Why is there a problem? I assumed you'd be all right anyway", or "Is that what would happen if you died and your partner was left on his own? I didn't realise that was the case." All those issues are in the melting pot.

There is something important for a couple in publicly demonstrating and affirming their commitment to each other. It is not simply about signing the bit of paper, but about having a big do with families and friends in which the relationship is publicly endorsed by people for whom we care and who care for us. That may be like marriage, but it is important to be able to do that in the family in which I live. It is crucial to demonstrate to my family and friends, and to my partner's family and friends, that this is who we are, where we have come to and how we care about each other.

The amendments agreed in the Lords will, I hope, be thrown out in Committee. No matter how good the intentions, they are clearly unworkable. If we are to tackle some of the issues raised by the amendments, it is better done elsewhere.

I have some concerns about the part of the Bill that deals with pensions. I said in an intervention that I have paid into a public sector pension for nearly 30 years. No one has offered me a discount, because survivor's rights are not applicable to me. It is a matter of equality, not retrospectivity. I and thousands of other gay men and women have paid into the pot knowing that our partners will not benefit from it, yet we have had to pay for other people's surviving partners.

The Minister made a helpful contribution. I look forward to hearing an even more helpful contribution in the wind-ups. I certainly look forward to the Bill's successful passage, with full equality on pensions in due course.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Listening to the debate, I have been wondering why the Bill is called the Civil Partnership Bill rather than the same-sex partnership Bill. I suspect that the amendment was passed in the House of Lords—I include myself among those who sympathise with the arguments made there—because people took the Bill at face value and thought that it was about giving new rights to people who are in partnership outside marriage. If it were designed merely to enable those in settled long-term relationships to have a better deal from inheritance tax law or pension benefit law, I would have no problem with it.

The extent of the financial burden borne by those in settled long-term relationships outside marriage is apparent from the estimate of the Government Actuary's Department, but just extending survivor pension rights in contracted-out pension schemes to close family members could cost as much as £2.25 billion a year. That is not as much as the £5 billion being taxed by the Chancellor from pension funds every year, but it is still a large sum.

I therefore do not take seriously the Government's suggestion that they will address the issue. Answering interventions, the Minister of State was remarkably vague about what the Government would actually do.

I welcome what my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition has said on the subject. His letter states:

> "I therefore think it better to allow the Bill to be returned to its original form and fight vigorously for provisions to be included in a Finance Bill which would remedy the unfair disadvantages which affect them"— that is, people not of the same sex who are engaged in relationships outside marriage. He continues:

> "This is what we shall do our best to achieve in the House of Commons during the passage of the next Finance Bill."

However, if we go along with the Government's arguments on rejecting the Lords amendments to the present Bill, we will have missed a great opportunity to get a fair deal for participants in long-term relationships outside marriage.

Mr. Leigh: The truth is that no Government will ever address that issue in any Finance Bill. Doing so would simply be too expensive.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend states the very point implicit in my remarks. It is disingenuous of the Government to argue that they will give serious consideration to the matter when they have an opportunity, in the form of the Civil Partnership Bill, to ensure that there is no discrimination between different types of relationship outside marriage. We should deal with all such relationships on the same basis.

Ultimately, we shall have to face the problem that is succinctly and coherently set out at paragraph 22 of the report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which states:

> "when the Bill comes into force, exemption from inheritance tax will be available to a surviving spouse and a surviving civil partner, but not to the surviving partner of an unmarried heterosexual couple, even though they may have lived together as though husband and wife for the whole of their adult lives, and possibly raised children together."

That is the problem that we as parliamentarians should be addressing, but the Government are ducking it.

Mr. Carmichael: Surely the difference is that an unmarried heterosexual couple have the opportunity to rectify that problem by entering into a secular or civil marriage. That course of action is not available to same-sex couples.

Mr. Chope: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman made that intervention, because it brings me to my next point. The argument he makes has been echoed by Lord Lester and Ministers, but it is not justified, as paragraph 24 of the Joint Committee's report points out:

> "The Government's argument is that there is an objective justification for any difference of treatment, because unmarried heterosexual couples may be free to marry. But a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in a case called Miron v Trudel illustrates that the courts may not accept this line of argument. The Canadian court recognised that heterosexual couples who choose not to marry may do so for very personal reasons of conscience and belief, for example because of the historical implications of the word 'marriage' and the historical nature of the institution in which the woman was treated as property. Second, the court noted that being unmarried may not always be a choice made by both partners in an unmarried relationship. Both of these considerations would call in to question the Government's reliance on 'choice' as the justification for not extending the scope of the Bill to opposite-sex unmarried couples."

I am sure that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, know people who have been widowed and who do not wish to enter into a new marriage because they feel that they have had their one and only marriage, but that does not stop them entering a long-term relationship. At present, such people are discriminated against by the legislation. So, too, are the many people whose marriage has collapsed but who, because one party to the marriage objects, have to serve out their five years of separation before they can get a divorce. There are many examples of people who live together but who do not effectively have the choice to get married. That is where I disagree with some of the observations that have been made by those who seek to justify the distinction that is being drawn.

Why are the Government not concerned—

Mr. Borrow: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's arguments with great interest. Will he explain whether he wants to encourage more people to get married or whether he wants to encourage people to have the benefits of marriage without getting married? Does he feel that that would be entirely within traditional Conservative family philosophy?

Mr. Chope: I believe that people should be free to choose whether they want to get married or to enter into any other sort of relationship. I am not in the business of encouraging people to do this or that. If I were to encourage people to take a particular direction, that would probably be counter-productive.

Why are the Government putting one particular type of relationship outside marriage on a pedestal, in preference to all others? The unavoidable conclusion that I have reached is that the Bill is a homosexual marriage Bill in all but name. As a result, it will be a double whammy. It will further undermine the institution of marriage—the holiest state of matrimony. At the same time, it will be an affront to Christians and other faith communities. It will also be an insult to all those who happily share their lives with relatives or friends outside marriage, because their relationships will be given institutional inferiority to homosexual ones.

Mr. Carmichael: I ask the hon. Gentleman, as a Christian myself, to draw the distinction between marriage—as I see it and as I have benefited from an institution being solemnised in a church—and civil marriage, which is a highly secular and different institution.

Mr. Chope: I am happy to draw that distinction. I was lucky enough to be married in Wimborne Minster. I have not been married for as long as my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), but I hope that I shall be able to be married for as long as him before my time is up. I recognise the distinction. I am concerned about the way in which the Bill does all but equate the terms of marriage breakdown with civil partnership breakdown.

For example, why is it necessary for a party to a civil partnership to have to wait for a year before they can start divorce proceedings? Why is it necessary in a civil partnership to have to prove irretrievable breakdown of the relationship before that relationship can be severed in law? Why is it that we are adopting, in the language of the Bill, exactly the same provisions as those that are contained in the laws relating to the breakdown of marriage? It seems that that is being done because the Government's mindset is that the Bill is about homosexual marriage.

The only difference is that one of the grounds for breakdown leading to divorce in a proper marriage is sexual infidelity on the part of the other partner to the marriage. I have not seen any provision in the Bill that refers to sexual infidelity on the part of the other partner to a civil partnership as being a ground for "divorce".

I regret that I find this to be an extremely muddled Bill. That brings me to a brief and succinct conclusion. If one is minded to use contemporary slang, the most appropriate expression to sum up the Bill is that it is a buggers' muddle. When we turn to the dictionary of slang, we find that that means that it is an absolute mess.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow many Members who have spoken this afternoon, with the possible exception of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who seems to have a muddled view of the legal definition of adultery, which does not apply to relationships between same-sex partners.

I support the Government's proposals and welcome this progressive and timely reform. I very much hope that co-operation will be achieved in both Chambers to allow the measure to complete its passage before this Session ends. My hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) gave a compassionate explanation of the dilemmas facing same-sex couples in permanent long-term relationships and there is an increasing sense of injustice at their treatment under the law. I welcome cross-party support for the Bill from Front-Bench spokesmen and I appreciate the considered speeches made by the hon. Members for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) and for Salisbury (Mr. Key). I hope that other Conservative Members will accept without qualification that the amendments made in the Lords make nonsense of the Bill and should be deleted. In the Scottish context, it is heartening to note the approval of the overwhelming majority of respondents to the Scottish Executive's consultation on the proposals.

Nowadays, it seems extraordinary that homosexual acts in Scotland were illegal as late as 1980. At that time, the comments of the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) would probably have been considered very liberal. However, there was a sea change in attitudes in Scotland to homosexuality in the years after the unfortunate debacle when the Scottish Parliament legislated to remove the utterly iniquitous section 28 or, as it was known in Scotland, section 2A. Most Scots were deeply embarrassed about the hostile, macho, aggressive and narrow-minded manner in which that debate was conducted by a small minority of people in our community and the way in which Scotland was projected to the world as a result. It is an experience that the vast majority of Scots do not wish to repeat. Most of our constituents recognise that the Bill tackles the need to provide formal recognition for same-sex couples and to address the disadvantages that they face under our civil law.

I do not accept the argument perpetuated by some commentators, including the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart), that the Scottish Parliament is too scared or feart to seek to legislate on so-called controversial issues. The fact that it had the courage to face down such a personalised and bigoted attack is often forgotten, and it deserves our congratulations. I am confident that any legislation on this subject would pass through the Scottish Parliament with very little controversy, but there are good reasons, not least the fact that changes to the taxation system remain reserved to the UK Parliament, to cover the whole United Kingdom with one piece of legislation and to implement it throughout the country at the same time. In a survey conducted by the Scottish Executive, 82 per cent. of respondents wanted a comprehensive package of rights and responsibilities in devolved areas that largely mirrored those in other parts of the UK, subject to the reforms being firmly based on Scots law. By and large, the proposals in the Bill reflect those sentiments. In fact, the Law Society of Scotland—I declare an interest as a member of that body—in its response to the consultation conducted by the Scottish Executive stated that one single Act covering the whole United Kingdom

> "would have the advantages of avoiding inconsistencies between the jurisdictions, smoothing cross-border issues and ensuring a comprehensive location for the law on this issue."

I agree.

Hon. Members have commented on the Bill's pension provisions and I am encouraged by the Minister's assurance this afternoon that she will look at the matter again. On 25 May in the other place, Baroness Hollis, at column 506 of Hansard, referred to the pension provision for widowers that was altered in 1988 to provide survivor pensions. It was not a retrospective measure and she tried to use that as justification for not providing retrospective provisions for same-sex couples. However, she missed the point that the Bill seeks to create a fundamentally new status for a group of people within our society. The widowers in her example received a right additional to those to which they already were entitled by virtue of their married status. Accordingly, I suggest that the parallel that she attempted to draw is incorrect.

A better analogy is the legal change in the civic status of children born out of marriage and the reforms to provide them eventually with the same rights as legitimate children. In Scotland, that is now set out in the Law Reform (Parent and Child) (Scotland) Act 1986. Those rights started immediately on commencement of the legislation and were not restricted to a certain period. The legislation before us seeks to remedy an injustice, rather than simply give additional rights. It recognises that our society, on the whole, now views same-sex relationships as having validity in our communities, just as we recognised 30 years ago that questions of legitimacy should not affect a child's rights or status in our society. The Bill should be viewed on the basis of principle rather than mere fiscal advantage.

In evidence to the report issued on 1 June by the Justice Committee of the Scottish Parliament—as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) correctly stated, the Scottish Parliament has considered the provisions in a great deal of detail—the Law Society of Scotland expressed concerns about how to establish a partnership retrospectively for the purposes of pension provision. That is a valid point, but I think that the Law Society forgot that, in Scotland, we establish marriage not only by civil registration or religious ceremony, but by habit and repute. Given the experience of other European nations that already have similar legislation, we are not likely to see great numbers taking up such agreements and I believe that the anticipated cost to both state and private pension funds is minimal.

The matter should also be set against a context of a society in which increasing numbers of adults, such as me, are not married or in permanent relationships, which offsets any increase in fund claims. I do not think that it would be too difficult to set up some form of interim arrangements, perhaps based on proof of years spent residing at the same address, to allow these important pension rights to be backdated. I urge the Government to think again about those points, and to propose new amendments to the Bill.

On a similar point regarding equity, I also wish to raise with the Minister the issue of succession rights, especially as they apply in Scotland. As she will be aware, the Bill will amend the Succession (Scotland) Act 1964 to provide surviving same-sex partners with prior rights to their partner's intestate estate. However, the Bill does not provide that same-sex partners will have legal rights to an estate where their partner dies with a will or where the estate exceeds the level of prior rights. I should explain that prior rights are given for separate categories of estate in Scotland, based on values of heritage, furnishings and movable estate. As the common law currently applies in Scotland, we have always held to the notion that it is not possible to disinherit one's spouse or children. Given that legal rights can amount to either a third of the deceased's movable estate if there are surviving issue or one half if there are no surviving issue, that can be an important entitlement.

I note from the Justice Committee's report of 1 June that the Scottish Executive Minister for Justice identified that issue. I would be grateful if the Minister now present will confirm that the Government will seek to amend the legislation in Committee to provide full parity, as in the rules that apply in succession for married couples. Given the complexity of the law of succession in Scotland, of which many people are ignorant, the Minister will concur that it is important to make it clear to same-sex couples that simply entering into a civil partnership in Scotland does not necessarily mean that the survivor will automatically inherit an estate should their partner die intestate. Prior rights are, by definition, a very arbitrary form of determining rights. Given the rise in property values, they frequently fail to cover a significant number of estates each year.

I understand that the Scottish Executive intend to conduct a review of the law of succession. Given that it is 40 years since the previous major measure, that is probably well due, but I hope that any briefings or advice notes on civil partnerships will strongly recommend that parties consider making their own wills.

I agree with those hon. Members who have expressed concern about the lack of verbal affirmation to the registration process. Given that in a significant number of cases such partnerships will have repercussions for not only couples, but their children, it is preferable to include a measure that positively indicates consent rather than its simply being inferred. Same-sex couples who express consent want to do so explicitly, particularly because it is likely that friends and family will accompany them through the registration process. It is not too much to insist that they be allowed explicitly to give their consent at such services.

Finally, I reiterate my support for the Bill. I hope that it will pass through Parliament in this Session, because many same-sex partnerships face hardship and discrimination and they will benefit from the measure.

4.40 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): It is a pleasure and privilege to follow the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin). Since she entered this House, and probably for a substantial period before her election, she has been an articulate champion of sexual equality. Today, she once again made a compelling speech of which she can be proud.

I strongly support the original form of the Bill, which was introduced to help lesbian and gay couples, and it should be official Conservative party policy to do so. The essential issue is discrimination, which takes the form of the non-existence of gay couples in law. Such discrimination is best tackled—indeed, I would argue may only be tackled—by the legal recognition of same-sex partnerships. The Bill is not about encouraging homosexuality, but it is about recognising homosexuality; it is not about giving special rights, but it is about affording equal treatment; it is not about undermining marriage, but it is about promoting stable relationships; and it is not about political correctness, but it is about personal decency.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: My hon. Friend is, as always, eloquent. Does he understand that some of us have a deep-seated and genuine fear that setting up what my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) called "a parallel institution" will send out the message to the people of this country that there are two equally valid lifestyles and that one can be in a homosexual relationship or a heterosexual—many of us would describe it as normal—relationship? That message will encourage the proliferation of homosexuality.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is wrong—he is usually wrong on such matters and will probably continue to be wrong—but if he is prepared to exercise the modicum of self-restraint that he can muster in the circumstances, I will attend to his point in due course. Although he is entitled to his view—no one can deny him its possession or expression—I firmly and honestly believe that the Tory party must take a definitive, meaningful and forward-looking stance on the subject.

As a result of historical discrimination, it is undeniable that gay couples suffer grave injustices. Those injustices should be removed, which the Bill does by giving those who voluntarily opt for the status of civil partner a welter of rights and responsibilities that will be influential in the running of couples' lives. In that sense—I am pleased to make this point—the Bill is an excellent piece of social reform that will significantly improve the lives of a sizeable minority of our fellow citizens, and I warmly congratulate the Government on its introduction.

Such arrangements exist in Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland. Such arrangements exist in Hungary, Croatia, Canada, parts of the United States, Australia and New Zealand. Such arrangements exist in Brazil, Argentina and Israel.

I have mentioned more than a score of very different societies, all of which are nevertheless united by a common bond of humanity that for them decrees that such provision should be available. I believe that the time has come for Britain to follow suit. To those who say, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) just did and doubtless others might, that the effect of civil registration arrangements for gay couples will be to undermine marriage, my response is twofold. First, if we look at the two countries that have had civil partnership registration for the longest periods—Denmark and Norway, since 1989 and 1993 respectively—we see that more people are getting married in those countries than was the case before the advent of the legislation.

Secondly, we should reflect on the premise underlying that argument—that helping those who cannot marry means hurting those who can. That is a flawed premise. It is wrong to argue that all politics and legislation represent a zero sum game in which a gain to one individual or group necessarily entails a loss to another. Neither my enjoyment of marriage nor the status of the institution of marriage in our society as a whole depends in any way whatsoever on discriminating against, repressing or vilifying gays and lesbians: far from it. It is possible and, I would argue, desirable for the institution of marriage, on the one hand, and civil partnership, on the other, peacefully to co-exist in this country every bit as successfully as they manifestly do in the plethora of other countries to which I referred. It is simply not correct to argue that, if one introduces a new arrangement, it will somehow corrode the institution of marriage. There is no evidence to justify that thesis.

As I said at the outset, I strongly support the Bill in its original form. Equally, I strongly oppose the amendment that was successfully pressed in the other place by my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain to extend civil partnership arrangements to close family relatives over the age of 18 who have lived together for 12 years. That amendment has been variously described by critics as absurd, a distortion, inappropriate, unworkable, a legislative mess and the worst possible outcome. I should like to focus on four of the many arguments against it.

First, my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain explicitly argued in the other place that because, following the passage of the Bill, gay couples will enjoy the inheritance tax relief that currently applies to married couples transferring assets to each other, close family relatives should be granted a similar relief. I am prepared to concede that there is an argument for such a policy, but it is a different argument for a different Bill at a different time. The rationale of this Bill is not to deal with inheritance tax, nor is it principally about tax relief—its focus is relationship recognition. If my right hon. and hon. Friends want to argue the case for the reduction or abolition of inheritance tax, good luck to them—I happen to think that they have a powerful case—but inheritance tax relief was never originally a rationale for the introduction of the Bill, and it certainly should not be allowed to hijack it and become its defining or central feature now.

Secondly, my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain and her supporters were keen to emphasise that they back marriage and wish to bolster the family, yet if one looks at the detail of the amendment, it is clear that it achieves neither of those objectives. Indeed, it is not even neutral. It is counter-productive. It is a force for undermining marriage and damaging the family. The hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), in a persuasive speech, gave the example of a woman living in a civil partnership with her mother. It is important to underline the significance of that example. If that young woman decides that she wants to get married, she must extricate herself from the civil partnership and then demonstrate that there has been an irretrievable breakdown of her relationship with her mother—and there is a possibility that she could wait for up to five years before her wish to marry would be fulfilled. What could be more anti-marriage than that?

Let us take the other predictable scenario that is almost certain to arise in the event that the amendment remains as clause 2 in the Bill. If, within a family civil partnership, there is a breakdown, and the dissolution process is set in train, there would have to be, quite properly, equitable financial provision for all the different parties involved. Certainly, in most cases, it is foreseeable that the family home would have to be sold. The prospect exists that an elderly relative would be evicted from the home in which he or she had long lived. What could be more anti-family than to do that?

Thirdly, my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain and her supporters argue that they want to help carers. Of course, as right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber will acknowledge, very large numbers of carers are within the family, and yet if that is the principal motive force behind the amendment, how does she explain the fact that she failed to consult the principal representative organisation of carers, which has been championing their interests for 40 years, Carers UK? She did not consult the Law Society or the Solicitors Family Law Association either. Each and every one of those three organisations—I name only three at this stage—believes that there are potent objections to the amendment. All, on the basis of their accumulated wisdom and experience, contend that the amendment would require a massive reactionary rewriting of social security legislation, which would take us back to a pre-Beveridge period. It would take a very long time to undertake, and some of the consequences are uncertain, but of one thing we can be fairly sure: as a result of the rewriting of the law, benefit levels would be lower, and tax payments for all too many people, although they would not yet be aware of it, would be higher. That seems to me a thoroughly counter-productive consequence.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): My hon. Friend, of course, advances a very well-argued case, with which I do not entirely agree but which I respect entirely. Does he accept that, as many contributors to the debate have said, this legislation is to rectify an injustice? Does not he think that he is being unfair on my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain, who was trying to put right an injustice whereby a daughter, for example, could look after her elderly family for many years, and when her mother and father die might have to leave the family home because she cannot pay the inheritance tax that would be due on the property, which has been her home for the whole of her life?

Mr. Bercow: The argument that my hon. Friend advances can certainly be considered, but, if I may say so, his customary generosity gets the better of him. The reality is that most of us have studied the debates on the Bill, and my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain set out her stall at an early stage, on Second Reading. I am willing to acknowledge that there will be people who voted for that amendment in good faith, who believe that it can be of benefit and who are not motivated by any desire to undermine the Bill. The trouble is that that argument does not work for my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain, any more than it works in favour of my noble Friend Lord Tebbit. Both those individuals made it clear beyond doubt that they passionately opposed the Bill and wished that it had never been brought before the House in the first place. Indeed, Baroness O'Cathain explained eloquently and at some length that she would far prefer an inheritance tax abolition Bill and that she thought this a bad Bill that should not have been introduced, so I do not accept that argument.

I reiterate what seems an important constitutional point. It was grossly irresponsible of Baroness O'Cathain to press the amendment—successfully, as it transpired—without undertaking the elementary duty of consulting the organisations whose client groups would be affected. Equally, it was grossly irresponsible of the other place to allow the amendment to pass, in the full knowledge that Baroness O'Cathain had failed so to consult.

There is a fourth and final argument that I want to make against the amendment, which is that there would be a very substantial cost. The argument has been made by others, but let it be underlined. To suggest an additional £2.25 billion-worth of expenditure, which is what the extension to close family relatives of civil partnership arrangements would require, seems an extraordinarily profligate way in which to behave. I am bound to say to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin)—the distinguished shadow Chancellor—that if my party is to pursue a policy of fiscal restraint, it seems a rather curious state of affairs to allow the party in the other place to go ahead with a proposal of this kind.

Ultimately, the O'Cathain amendment is but a smokescreen. It is a smokescreen erected by its proposers in a determined but ultimately doomed attempt to conceal their deep-seated hostility to the very principle of gay equality. For in fact, of course, they simply cannot abide it. They despise it. They are frightened by it. The policy of the Bill's most vociferous opponents is driven not by considerations of reason, logic or fairness, but by considerations of paranoia and prejudice. Such an approach should be thoroughly denounced and rejected.

The Tory party cannot just sit on the fence. We have to take a stance; we cannot be on both sides. It is no use simply saying, "Oh yes, we recognise the disadvantages and discriminations suffered by gay individuals and couples, and we think that something should be done, so perhaps there is something to be said for supporting the Bill," only then to be happy to participate in a cynical cabal with Members of another place, effectively to undermine the Bill and probably to destroy it. It is wrong in itself to behave in that way. It feeds the very cynicism about the political process that damages each and every one of us in this Chamber and beyond, and ultimately, such behaviour gets found out. It is a profound insult to the electorate's intelligence to think that we can behave in that way without their latching on to it. People are not stupid—they will see when someone is speaking with forked tongue.

My personal view is that it is not good enough for my own party, of which I have been and remain a proud member—indeed, I have been a member of it for 25 years—to argue that we can retreat underneath the comfort blanket of a free vote. No, I am afraid that that will not do. We on the Conservative Benches still have a great deal to prove. No member of the current shadow Cabinet voted on 10 February 2000 for equalisation of the age of consent. Only one member of the current shadow Cabinet—my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo)—voted in March last year for the repeal of section 28. This is the third big policy challenge in the field of gay equality and we must not duck it. We must meet it, rise to it and do the decent thing, which happens also in the end to be the politically advantageous thing. We must support the Bill in its pure form. We must support it today, in Committee, on Report and when it becomes law, because of the benefits that will flow from it.

I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition, who said in his speech at the Saatchi Gallery at the end of October last year that he wanted the Conservative party to be a party capable of representing all Britain and all Britons. He is right. We could start on the road to achieving that objective by voting with enthusiasm and en masse for this Bill in this House.

We have to decide whether we are to be a 21st century party. Of course that involves removing discrimination, but it involves more than that. It involves Conservatives ceasing to pat themselves on the back by saying, "Isn't it good that we preach and practise tolerance?". In the end, the debate is not about tolerance, but about respect—respect for the unique dignity of every individual, respect for all our fellow human beings, respect for the principle of equality before the law and respect for the call for parity of esteem.

To those who say, "You have changed your tune", I say, "Yes, I have changed my tune", like my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), and I make no apology for it. The person who never changes his or her mind is the person who never learns anything. I am perfectly prepared to recognise the error of some of my past ways, but I passionately believe in the cause of human equality and social justice. There could be no better signal for the Conservative party to send than the fact that it has changed for the better and changed for good by adopting support for civil partnership as its official policy and giving the Bill, in its original and unadulterated form, the unequivocal blessing that it certainly deserves.

5.1 pm

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): This has been a very heartening afternoon, and it is particularly heartening to follow the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who eloquently articulated the reasons why the amendments passed in the other place have to be removed. I had thought myself perhaps a little cynical about the motives of those who tabled those amendments, but the hon. Member for Buckingham has made me realise that I am absolutely justified in my cynicism about them.

It is heartening to achieve a piece of social reform, which I am confident that we are going to do. It is a fine Bill. I quote Stonewall, who called it a "thorough and far-reaching" Bill. It is not often that organisations that we work with outside the House say such things. It is a ringing endorsement and something to be treasured.

With a few exceptions—perhaps the medieval wing of the Conservative party—everyone in the House is united on the need to finish addressing the outstanding inequalities and discriminations that our society has been carrying for far too long. The Bill not only brings us up to parity with all the civilised countries of Europe and the rest of the world, but almost completes an ambitious agenda for change on inequalities that the Government—and Stonewall—set out when we came to office in 1997. We abolished section 28 and so on and so forth—and now this Bill. All I can think that we will be left with when the Bill completes its passage is addressing discrimination in goods and services. If we do that, we will all have to think very hard to find anything else necessary to complete the package. When that happens, it will reflect extremely well on Parliament.

It is heartening that the Government have introduced this measure and it is heartening to hear the thoughtful and considered contributions of Conservative Front Benchers and other Conservative Members.

It is evident that a sea change is under way on the Opposition Benches. Over the past few years, this Government have set about reforming the homophobic elements in our law, some of which were put in place by hon. Members who are members of the current Opposition. Indeed, I seem to remember that it was the current Leader of the Opposition who introduced section 28, but I suppose that he has reformed now so perhaps we should gloss over that for the moment.

Angela Eagle: The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not want to abolish it.

Dr. Turner: No, that is right.

I shall not speak for long as the debate has been very comprehensive, and has covered all the technicalities very well. Various hon. Members have referred to the important matter of pensions, and it would be a great pity if the Bill were to be undermined by the fact that it contained a serious flaw in respect of inequality of treatment for survivors of those in public sector occupational pension schemes.

I and other hon. Members have drawn up amendments to deal with that problem. There is no need to set out the arguments involved, as that has already been done. In her opening remarks, my right hon. Friend the Minister indicated that the Government were considering correcting that defect. I hope that when she winds up the debate she will say that the anomaly will be corrected and that the amendments that we have prepared will therefore be rendered superfluous. We should be only too happy not to have to table those amendments and to give the Bill's Second Reading a ringing endorsement in the Division later this evening. The Bill is capable of improvement in various ways, but the important thing is that it will offer people equal treatment. That is its entire purpose.

I am pleased to have been able to say a few words on this very pleasant afternoon. I am glad to see that the Conservative party is changing and that its rational wing is starting to win over the medieval wing.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): At the beginning of the debate, the Minister agreed with me when I said that 86 per cent. of the people in Northern Ireland who responded opposed what is planned with this Bill. I shall direct my remarks to Northern Ireland, as this Bill will apply there.

Any part of the UK that is affected by legislation coming from this House should be given fair play. However, this Bill was printed on 30 March, only 25 days after the end of the consultation process. The wording of its provisions in respect of Northern Ireland were very incomplete and shabby. Then, the Government did an amazing thing on 11 May. They attempted to fix all the provisions that they had got wrong in the original Bill by tabling 52 new clauses and six new schedules. Those 120 pages of amendments must be a record for such an important Bill.

The day after the amendments were published, the Bill went before the House of Lords. All the amendments were passed with virtually no scrutiny. So the final say, as far as Northern Ireland was concerned, was without consultation, because the amendments were tabled after the original Bill was published.

The census of 2001 found only 288 same-sex couple households in the whole of Northern Ireland. The Government say that only 5 per cent. of same-sex couples will commit to civil partnerships. Well, 5 per cent. of 288 is 14, so 14 couples in Northern Ireland will have the opportunity provided by the Bill, even though a majority of people who have a view on the matter across the political and religious divide oppose it. Their voices were not heard or taken into account. The basis of family law in Northern Ireland is to be changed for the sake of 14 homosexual couples.

More than 80 per cent. of the adult population in Northern Ireland are married or single, never having been married. The divorce rate in Northern Ireland is much lower than in England and Wales. The Government say that the Bill will remedy hardships in Northern Ireland. According to the census, there are 330 times more house sharers in Northern Ireland than people living as homosexual couples. However, those house sharers will not have their burdens eased or lifted by the Bill. The Government should come clean and tell us when they will legislate so that everybody who takes on responsibilities in their homes will be treated the same legally. It is essential that we have a response to that from the Government tonight.

My views on this matter are clear. I believe in the divine sanctity of marriage. I believe that marriage is a solemn and holy thing. A country that does not uphold the institution of marriage strikes at its own heart. The home is the building block of society. If we do not have good, moral and righteous homes, the nation will suffer. We must realise that.

Many comments have been passed today. We have been told that some of us have not grown up yet. Well, I grew too much because I had a lot of orange juice when I was a baby. It does not matter whether we are told that we have not grown up or are medieval; we have convictions and we are entitled to hold them as strongly as we can. When it comes to legislating for Northern Ireland, I trust that the Government will treat us in the same way as they treat the rest of the United Kingdom. If a Scottish Member got up and revealed the same record on a Bill as I have just done, there would be some row. The same applies to any English or Welsh Member. Why is Northern Ireland treated in this shoddy way on an important issue on which its people have expressed a definite opinion? I trust that that will not be repeated.

5.14 pm

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I am delighted to be able to follow that speech, although perhaps we shall now have to refer to the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) as the orange juice man. I have to tell him that I suspect that there are rather more than 288 homosexual couples living together in Northern Ireland. I suspect that they are very reluctant to admit to the fact, owing to some of the bigotry that they have had to face in Northern Ireland over the years.

David Cairns: They still face it.

Chris Bryant: Indeed.

I am also glad to have the opportunity to speak in the debate as I have probably married more people than anybody else in the Chamber, because I spent six years in the Church and performed weddings on most Saturdays. I congratulate the Government not only on the Bill as I hope it will end up, nor only on the Bill as they presented it in the House of Lords, but just as important, on the steady process whereby they have tried to achieve consensus on legislation to right wrongs that have existed for years and for centuries.

We have heard some excellent speeches this afternoon. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) is not in his seat, but many of us agree with Members who have already said that his was one of the finest speeches we have heard on the subject. Many people who have campaigned on the issue for many long years, in the Chamber and in the wider community, have already spoken: my hon. Friends the Members for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) and for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), who advanced the measure when she held ministerial office.

It has been good to have some converts over the years. The Lord rejoiceth in the one who changes more than the 99 who were with us in the first place, so it is good to have the hon. Members for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on our side.

There has been only one particularly difficult note—the one struck by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). I think in the final words of his speech he was deliberately offensive not only to those who support the Bill but, more important, to those in the country who feel that their rights will be established by it. It is a shame that the Tory party is still somewhat AC/DC on the issue, but I hope that we shall see further change in the direction that the hon. Member for Buckingham urged on his party earlier.

Mr. Bercow: The points that the hon. Gentleman makes are fair. I readily acknowledge that I am very late to the issue. All that I ask him to recognise is that after discovering the error of my earlier ways, I have spent the last four and a half years on the course of discovery of the merits of sexual equality.

Chris Bryant: I am more than happy to put it on the record that the hon. Gentleman has been one of the most assiduous campaigners on the issue since I entered this place, and for some considerable time before. After confession there is always a period of penance, and I fear that the hon. Gentleman is still at that stage.

[Chris Bryant]

The Bill, when it has been changed back to its original form, will be about loving, same-sex couples, who want to make a commitment to one another and who accept not only the rights that civil partnership will give them, but its responsibilities. I know that each of the three parts of that sentence is difficult for some of the people who oppose the Bill. Some people believe that because love is ordained by God, it is impossible for same-sex couples to love one another. I defy them to meet some of the people I know, who have lived together for many years, in sickness and in health, and have provided one another, and sometimes children in their care, with the kind of love and support from which many other families could learn much. If they still said that same-sex couples could not love one another, they would be blind in their hearts.

There are also people who believe that same-sex couples who love one another cannot make a commitment to one another. That is a vital point; it is made by those who believe that the Bill will, somehow or other, undermine marriage. I simply do not see that point. I do not see how giving rights to one set of people would undermine the rights of others. Indeed, I have always believed as a Christian that the whole point of love is that it should be based on commitment. The Bill allows people to make a public statement of commitment to one another and stand by it. That must be something that not only those who have a liberal attitude to life but every Christian in the land can support.

The third part of the sentence that some people will find difficult to accept is that loving same-sex couples who want to make a commitment to one another will be prepared to accept rights and responsibilities. Let us face it, there will be same-sex couples who have lived together for many years but do not want to form civil partnerships because they bring with them a set of responsibilities. There will be those who will be troubled by the fact that they will lose some financial benefits; that they will not be able to claim all the benefits to which they have up to now been entitled as two individuals; that they will be treated as a couple. I suspect that they, just like those who intend to be married according to the rites of the Church of England, will not enter into civil partnerships lightly but after sober reflection. That is another strong point in favour of the Bill.

Of course there will be people who will think, "I may be in a relationship, but I can call time on it at the flick of a switch. If I enter into a civil partnership, we will have to follow a legal process in order to separate." Of course that will create further responsibilities for those who enter civil partnerships.

The Bill is also about rectifying a series of injustices. Many hon. Members have referred to the fact that partners who have been together for many years and looked after each other at home in sickness and in health find that when one partner goes into hospital they suddenly lose the right to have any say over what medical support is provided.

When I was curate in High Wycombe, I used to visit patients in the local hospital. It was not uncommon to meet people who had been prevented by the parents of their partner even from visiting the person whom they loved and had lived with for many years. This was at the time when HIV/AIDS was new and many people did not have much understanding of it. Many parents blamed the illness on their son's partner. I am glad to say that the world has moved on for many families, but still that injustice exists.

The injustice is compounded if there is a death. The bereaved partner is often excluded from the funeral arrangements. I have conducted countless funerals that the partner was not even allowed to attend, and many at which the partner was forced to sit right at the back and not take part, and no mention was made of the relationship. Sometimes the bereaved partners had to have separate ceremonies because the families took precedence over the partner. That was caused by bigotry in many cases, and it led to injustice that was allowed by the law.

As other hon. Members have mentioned, many bereaved partners are made homeless. They may be unable to inherit their own home without penalty, but that applies to only 5 per cent. of estates. Many find that they cannot carry on the tenancy that was in their partner's name. Similarly, survivors have had no rights to a partner's pension. That has been a significant issue for many lesbian couples. Two women living together may have child care responsibilities. One of them may not work throughout her economically active life and reach retirement age without having acquired any pensionable service of her own. Bearing in mind the fact that many women are paid considerably less than men, the issue of poverty and rectifying injustice is important. Similarly, same-sex couples are treated differently in law from married couples when it comes to providing evidence in court. We should right that injustice because it puts another strain on relationships that is not there for married couples.

Domestic violence laws apply differently to same-sex and married couples. That is another injustice that we should put right in the Bill. There was a time when it was presumed that, somehow or other, a same-sex couple could not have been violent to each other; but of course, that is a major issue, not only between two men, but between two women. We should ensure that that injustice is put right.

The greatest injustice of the lot is that people have no recognition of the fact that they are two people who live together, sharing their lives. The Bill will put right that injustice.

I want to say a few words about the Lords amendments—an issue which has been rehearsed at some length already this afternoon. I noted that, in the House of Lords, one of the obsessions of some Tory Members was with inheritance tax. I confess—this is one of the few partisan points that I will make—that having watched a lot of the Tory party conference last week, I was bewildered at how obsessed the Tory party is with inheritance. I am not sure whether that is because they all form part of the 5 per cent. whose estates might fall liable to inheritance tax, or because they are worried about dying off, given that they are so elderly. Either way, the inheritance tax issue is one of the largest red herrings—in fact, it is a red cod or a red tuna fish—in the middle of the Bill. I refer to how those amendments relate not to same-sex couples, but to carers, and to the speech by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton.

Mr. Alan Duncan: Let us be frank about this. Does the hon. Gentleman not appreciate the fact that two people who have shared their lives, not necessarily in a sexual union as in the Bill, may face problems when one partner dies, either with the tenancy or ownership of a house, because of inheritance tax, and that it is as well, separate from the Bill, to try to find a way to remedy that?

Chris Bryant: There may be situations in which the hon. Gentleman is right, but the inheritance tax issue is a red herring when applied directly to the Bill, except in so far as it applies to same-sex partners, where we ought to rectify the problem now.

I believe that those who tabled the amendments in the Lords were seeking to wreck the Bill. That is not to say that everyone who voted for those amendments did so to wreck the Bill. They did so ill-advisedly because those amendments would not even rectify the injustice that they believed to exist. As the hon. Member for Buckingham has said, those amendments would not improve the situation of carers. In fact, it would make their situation far worse in many cases.

We have only to look at the bona fides or the track records of those who tabled the amendments in the Lords. Lord Tebbit's views on homosexuality are extremely well known. He aired them on the "Today" programme, when I heard one of the most bizarre things that I have heard in all my life: he said that one of the major causes of childhood obesity in this country was the Government's promotion of buggery. That was one of the most extraordinary leaps. It even put the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) into deep shock. So we know Lord Tebbit's bona fides.

Baroness O'Cathain's views on homosexuality seem similar. She has taken up the mantle that was cast upon her, Elijah-like, by Baroness Young in opposing section 28. So we know exactly what her aim was; she declared it very openly in moving her amendments. Incidentally, I thought she was wrong to press them to a vote because that showed that they were not about simply airing the issues, but specifically about trying to wreck the Bill. Let us be honest: some people think that homosexuality is wrong and a sin.

I am somewhat saddened, incidentally, that several hon. Members have immediately left the Chamber after speaking in the debate, without listening to the rest of the debate. That is a rather surprising change in custom in the House.

The amendments tabled in the Lords are particularly maladroit. They would be of no use to carers. Clause 2(1) is particularly bizarre in its wording. When I started to read it, I almost expected it to end with the words, "and they must be accompanied by both their grandparents", because it seems to take the proverbial mickey out of the rest of the Bill. The curious thing is that that amendment was allowed to be tabled because it is wholly without the scope of the Bill. I am surprised, on a constitutional point, that it was allowed to be tabled.

There are a number of aspects of the Bill in addition to the wrecking Lords amendments that should be reformed. The Bill currently presumes that there will be no ceremony, but I agree with hon. Members who think that it would be entirely appropriate for the two people who sign a civil partnership to make a statement to the effect that they are not legally barred from entering a civil partnership and that they consent to doing so. Beyond that, they should be entitled to have whatever ceremony they wish, which would parallel the provisions in the Marriage Act 1949 and thus make sense.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that changes are currently taking place to the registration of birth and deaths, but that consideration of marriage registration is being deferred so that note can be taken of the final state of the Bill? The type of ceremony to which he refers may well be considered.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend makes a good point that I was about to address.

It is also a mistake to prohibit a religious service of any kind at the signing of a civil partnership. The provision in the Bill is virtually identical to section 45(2) of the 1949 Act, which states that no religious service shall be used at the solemnisation of a civil marriage. However, that provision is wrong in itself because it means that many registrars refuse to allow couples who want to marry in a civil ceremony rather than a church to use any religious readings. Although many people would like readings such as 1 Corinthians 13 or something from Khalil Gibran, registrars refuse to allow such words to be used. I would like the provision to be removed from the Bill and section 45(2) of the 1949 Act to be similarly repealed.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman is arguing his point of view powerfully, but I am not sure that both sets of Front Benchers will welcome his remarks, because we were informed earlier that neither were in favour of gay marriages and that we were not considering a gay marriage Bill. However, the hon. Gentleman is eloquently arguing for exactly that, so people should realise that that would be the next step.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman is completely mistaken, and I hope that I do not have to repeat this too often. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton made a good proposition about parallel lines. I do not want same-sex relationships to ape marriage in any sense—several people have used the offensive phrase—because they are different. Although the two share similar elements, they do not have to be identical, so the legal provisions should be distinct.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I have much sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Does he agree that the nature of a real relationship might suggest that people will want it to be celebrated or blessed?

Chris Bryant: Indeed, and the hon. Gentleman prompts me to mention a third aspect of the Bill that I would like to change.

There are churches and individual clergy in the Church of England and the Church of Scotland who would be happy to provide a blessing. There are clergy in many of the churches who would be more than desirous of the opportunity to hold a blessing in their churches. It is thus curious that the Bill will prohibit any kind of religious service or ceremony from taking place in religious premises. The provision's drafting is rather odd because some churches meet in gyms or halls and thus would not be covered by the current wording, so that might need tidying up. However, such matters are not ones of enormous principle and they can be debated in Committee.

One remaining issue of principle is pensions. To put it simply, as others have already done, if Jean were to marry John next week, the full pensionable service of Jean since 1988 would be taken into consideration for his widower's pension if she should die. However, as things stand, if Jean and Janet were to form a civil partnership, the benefit would, according to Baroness Hollis, accrue only from the date of the Bill. I hope that the Government will manage over the next 10 days to offer surviving civil partners parity with widowers' pension arrangements. I hope that the Minister's words were tending in that direction and that they might tend even further in that direction by the end of the day or the end of next week.

I note, incidentally, that as far as I can see, the only people for whom the Bill guarantees parity are the surviving civil partners of a Speaker of the House of Commons or the Prime Minister. I am not sure whether we have any particular idea in mind as to who either of those people will be in the near future, but I thought that that provision was rather curious.

Mr. Alan Duncan: The hon. Gentleman has just renewed my ambition.

Chris Bryant: It seems that it is the hon. Gentleman's ambition to have a civil partner to whom he can grant a surviving pension, although it is not clear whether that would be as the Speaker or the Prime Minister.

Having borne those issues in mind, I wholeheartedly welcome the cross-party support. That is important. The issue is not acrimonious in the country and many people will benefit from it. However, I suspect that only a Labour Government would introduce such a measure—

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD) indicated dissent.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman suggests that the Liberals might have introduced it, but that is stretching credulity too far because we would have to have a Liberal Democrat Government in the first place.

I am proud of the Labour Government's progressive record. To be honest, it is without peer in Europe. They abolished clause 28, introduced an equal age of consent and used the Parliament Act to enforce it. They legislated for joint adoption by gay couples, outlawed workforce discrimination and brought in a new category of homophobic hate crimes. The Government should be congratulated on that.

In the end, the Bill is about recognising a simple fact of life. It is not about setting up a new lifestyle, as the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) claimed. It is not about persuading people to be gay or lesbian. It is not about proliferating homosexuality because, in truth, homosexuality is not something that we can proliferate. It is not something that we can be persuaded into. It is not an illness that we can catch. It is not a cancer that we can have excised. For roughly one in 10 people in this land it is simply a fact of life that they have to come to terms with. Now, at last—thank God—the law will recognise the fact of loving homosexual relationships. The whole of the UK will come to terms with a world in which two men or two women can love one another and make a commitment to one another, for richer and for poorer.

5.38 pm

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): It is a great privilege to participate in the debate, which has been one of the most dignified and enlightening that I can remember. I am pleased to give my full support and backing to the Bill for the reasons that the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) summed up in his final sentence. He almost could have given up the first 23 minutes of his speech and just used that sentence in an extremely powerful and effective way.

Chris Bryant: That would be very unlikely.

Charles Hendry: I realise that that would have been entirely out of character.

The Bill is about fairness and justice. That is why it is so important. When I got married, like everyone else who has got married, I became eligible for certain rights and entitlements and, to go with that, certain responsibilities as well. So when one of us dies, the surviving spouse is entitled to inherent the family home and the family assets without being subject to inheritance tax. We can benefit from the other one's pension contributions, particularly in the circumstances of death. For those people who live in social housing, the tenancy would transfer automatically from one to the other without any question of whether that was right.

Marriage also brings with it certain entitlements that are so self-evident that it is not possible to conceive of the position being otherwise. For example, in the event of one spouse being injured in an accident, the other is entitled to give their opinion on what should happen and what is the appropriate medical treatment; they are entitled to visit their spouse in hospital without anyone being able to say, "You shouldn't be here—you're not entitled." A spouse can act as an active next of kin: my wife and I have to fill in a form for our children at school saying who should be called in the event of an accident, and we name each other as next of kin. That, to me, is so self-evidently right that it is inconceivable that it could be done in any other way.

Mr. Pike: Civil partnerships do not yet exist legally. If a partner in a relationship that will be eligible for a civil partnership were to die in a traffic accident today, his or her partner would have no right to make decisions in respect of organ donation. A person who has clearly indicated their wishes might have those wishes totally disregarded, even though their partner wants to adhere to those wishes.

Charles Hendry: I agree entirely. That sort of anomaly is not just unfair but absolutely barbaric. People who have committed themselves to one another over many years in an established loving relationship should not be denied the opportunity to be involved in such fundamental decisions. I simply cannot understand why those rights that I as a married man take entirely for granted, as does every married person, should not be extended to same-sex couples who have demonstrated the same degree of commitment and endorsed it by entering into a legally binding arrangement.

To correct that position is not, as some have suggested, to give extra rights to same-sex couples; it is simply to give them the same rights as heterosexual married couples who have made the same legally binding commitments to one another. Particularly powerful to me is one of the phrases that has been uttered by the Minister today, which was also used by Lord Alli in the House of Lords debate:

> "Same-sex couples . . . are . . . invisible in the eyes of the law".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 May 2004; Vol. 661, c. GC121.]

That is not right, it is not how the law should work and it is an issue that we should address.

The whole House is concerned that many people have become disengaged from politics and from Parliament. One of the reasons that has happened to such an extent is that people see Parliament as too remote—they see it as a place that does not understand and is not interested in how they live their lives, and is too often involved in legislation that harms their interests as individual citizens.

Mr. Bercow: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's observations on the disconnect between Parliament and public. Does he not think that an eloquent and worrying illustration of that trend was expressed in the recent Populace survey published in The Times, which showed, in contrast to some of the antediluvian attitudes that still prevail in this Chamber, that 75 per cent. of respondents aged between 18 and 30 said yes, of course gay couples should have exactly the same rights as heterosexual couples?

Charles Hendry: My hon. Friend makes an entirely appropriate comment and one that I was about to make when he intervened. Our hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said that there was a generational dimension to the debate. Young people in their 20s, 30s and 40s want this House to look like the society in which they live. They want it to be a place where racism, sexism and issues of sexuality have no part to play—a place where we simply get on and discuss the issues as grown-up individuals, rather than as people who are stuck in the past. An entire generation cannot understand a Parliament or parties that do not think in that way. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) said that in years to come people will read this debate and say, "I wish I'd been there." I disagree: I think that they will read it and say, "What was all that about?" They will not understand why on earth we had to have this debate. The world in which they live is understanding and accepting. To them, debates about whether such things are right or wrong belong to an era to which they do not relate.

I echo the hon. Lady's praise for Stonewall. The dignified way in which its members have conducted the debate, using quiet persuasion and showing great understanding, is one of the reasons it has moved forward as it has. We all owe Stonewall a great debt of gratitude.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my hon. Friend aware that Stonewall brought enormous pressure to bear on British Airways to disown our noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain, who is a director of BA? She may be forced out because of the views that she honourably and honestly expressed in another place. Does my hon. Friend think that that was a good thing for Stonewall to have done?

Charles Hendry: Shareholders will decide whether our noble Friend is the right person to hold a position on that board. My hon. Friend says that she may be forced out. It is entirely legitimate in a democracy to make people aware of the views and the comments that others have expressed.

I shall take head-on the suggestion that is made, especially in the media, that the Bill confers unfair advantages on same-sex couples or that it panders to the gay agenda. In my role as shadow Minister with responsibility for young people, I have met different youth groups throughout the country. Sometimes they have been working in inner cities, sometimes they have been involved in colleges and schools and sometimes they have been working with young gays and lesbians. The most shocking things that I have heard have been about the abuse that young people face.

I heard a young lad in Brighton describe how he was beaten up in the streets simply because he was out with his partner. He was not doing anything that anyone in the heterosexual community would find it difficult to do. He was beaten up merely because he was out with his partner. I heard from a young kid in Leeds who had suffered constant homophobic bullying in school. When he, as an individual, finally fought back he was the one who was excluded. That was abominable. He was the victim. Bullied children are always the victims and they need Members of this place to stand up for them.

As people grow up they might find that they face difficulties and discrimination merely because of their sexuality—something with which they are not able to deal. There are those who have to go through the trauma of telling their families and friends that they are gay or lesbian, as a result of which they are often thrown out of their homes.

In my old role as chairman of the all-party group on homelessness I heard of 16-year-olds who had been kicked out of their homes because their parents were not prepared to accept their sexuality. I cannot understand people facing abuse throughout their daily lives because of their sexuality. We are right to address these issues, and we must put a stop to them.

People who happen to be gay or lesbian and play a role in public life end up finding that they can be gratuitously insulted because of their sexuality. Brian Paddick is the Assistant Metropolitan Police Commissioner. He is a fine and outstanding police officer. I often feel that the media think that they can give him a kicking and criticise him because he is an openly gay policeman. Such attitudes belong to a bygone era, and the Bill is part of kicking them into history.

David Cairns: The hon. Gentleman is making an outstanding contribution to the debate.

[David Cairns]

We need to clarify what we are talking about. Some people listening to us might think, "What are a few insults? Everyone receives a few insults. If you are a bit fat, you get a few insults. If you are losing your hair, you get a few insults. Perhaps people should get a bit tougher about these things."

Will the hon. Gentleman join me in congratulating the organisers of the MOBO awards, who said this year that records that incite murder and violence against gay people are completely unacceptable? We have been congratulating Stonewall—and deservedly so. I never thought that I would say this publicly, but I think that we should congratulate Peter Tatchell on what he has done in exposing the reggae artists who peddle this violence and hate and on forcing MOBO to have a belated but welcome change of heart.

Charles Hendry: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Had those lyrics referred to the same incitement of violence towards old people, black people or women, the police would have taken action; they would have intervened. I am pleased that the MOBO awards organisers decided to take action and to say that such lyrics were not acceptable.

I wish to look at some important contributions that the Bill will make. The issue of inheritance has been discussed, and I am grateful to Stonewall for providing examples that bring it to life. Chris is in his 60s and has been with his partner for 40 years. After his retirement, he was told that he had renal cancer. As if it were not enough to fight a virulent form of cancer, he found that in the event of his death his partner would be forced to sell the home that they had shared for 25 years to pay death duties and other taxes. It is utterly wrong that someone who is fighting a terrible illness should have additional worries about whether his partner of many years will be treated fairly.

Stonewall also told us about the next of kin issue and the way in which people are affected. When Andrew's partner died, for example, he was excluded from decisions, as his partner's parents had never accepted him as their son's partner; they removed personal effects, including photographs, and Andrew was denied access to them. They sold the flat in which the couple had lived, and Andrew had no right whatsoever under legislation to challenge their decision. That is barbaric, and it is not right in any society. If the Bill ends such practices, we should all be happy.

Kate had a history of depression, and had been with her partner, Jo, for 10 years. Jo, however, found it virtually impossible to persuade the NHS to recognise her as Kate's next of kin and encountered homophobic reactions among some of Kate's relatives. In the end, she was forced to seek a power of attorney to get the rights to which she believed she was entitled.

We should all, therefore, welcome the fundamental changes that the Bill will bring about. I agree, however, with many of my colleagues and other Members that the amendments made in the Lords were a mistake, and should be reversed in Committee. I accept that people are anxious about the interests of interdependent relatives and other people who are living together, but the Bill is not the place to address those issues. I know that other Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude shortly, but the only people who will gain from the anomalies of such relationships are accountants, who will discover a new wheeze to prevent their rich clients from paying taxes. They will say, "We could advise you to move to the Bahamas or set up a family trust. However, we think you should encourage your 18-year-old son to live with his grandfather. When he is 30, he will inherit everything free of tax. The only problem, of course, is that if he dies soon afterwards and leaves the money to his stepson, who is also his father, a huge amount of tax will be payable." That will make a mockery of the system, so it should be swept away because it will not improve the lot of carers, whose position must be recognised and improved, or people who are in similar relationships for other reasons. The right place to address such concerns is a future Finance Bill, and I hope that the shadow Treasury team will introduce measures to achieve such changes.

Pensions are another concern. I am encouraged by the Minister's remarks that the Government will reconsider the issue, and I hope that in her winding-up speech she will say that the Government will introduce amendments to tackle the problem. If she does not, when the Bill goes into Committee, and if I am lucky enough to serve on it, I shall support measures that require equality provisions in public sector pensions to be made retrospective. That is entirely right and appropriate. If we say that we believe in equality only if it does not come with a price tag, that is not a genuine belief in equality. Equality sometimes has a cost attached to it, and we must recognise that and take it into account.

One of the reasons I am a Conservative is that I believe passionately in the rights of the individual, who should make decisions about their life and the way in which they want to live it. Governments should not become involved in such decisions unless they have a negative impact on other people. We should not be imposing a barrier to other people's happiness—and for what reason? Should we do so because people are living in a stable, loving relationship in which they have chosen to make a commitment for the rest of their lives as far as they can see? For heterosexuals, that arrangement is called marriage, but for same-sex couples, that option is not available. We must ensure through this Bill that such couples have the chance to have the same opportunities and rights.

We are dealing with an outdated restriction that is, at best, unfair and, in respect of next of kin, is barbaric and inhuman. I hope that we can take the issue of sexuality out of politics. I do not believe that there is such a thing as a gay vote. I think that parties can drive away the gay vote just as they can drive away the women's vote, the elderly vote or the black vote—my party has tried to do it quite effectively over the years—but there is no single issue that it can be said will win over the gay vote. However, addressing issues such as those in the Bill will ensure that those who are gay, lesbian or bisexual can look at issues in the round and vote for the party that they believe in because it is advocating the right policies on health, education and the economy, rather than make their choice because they think that sexuality continues to divide the parties.

One of the most important quotes from the memorable speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) is his remark that the Government should intervene to stop people hurting each other, but not to stop people loving each other. Good people have been hurt for too long by the situation under the law as it currently exists. It is time that that was stopped, and this Bill is a chance to stop it.

5.56 pm

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): It is a privilege to be called, even at this late hour, and to follow the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry), whose speech must have given great comfort to the Labour party with regard to the forthcoming election. I am sure that his remarks about driving away voters will be in the headlines.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) is not the only one in the House to have married people. Having done 25 years of parish work, I am possibly well ahead of him. He spoke of love, but we must bear it in mind that there are many types of love, so we must be careful about bandying that word around without thinking of its implications.

The other word that arises is "equality". I was fascinated by the fact that we are all carried away with the concept of equality. I could not help but think of the experience of a Presbyterian colleague of mine in a Samaritan hospital in Belfast, where one of his parishioners was in deep post-natal depression. Psychologists, psychiatrists and doctors were unable to do anything to help her. My colleague spent about 45 minutes with her trying to help. Finally, with a sense of despair, he said, "Well, we'll have a wee prayer before I go; these things come to all of us." At that, the woman started to laugh.

We are not equal. There are different issues, and one of the issues that we are debating is the fact that civil partnership is not merely civil partnership; it is giving recognition of something that some of us hold dear. I happen to be one of those—perhaps I am the only one in the House—who speaks having been put into the den of lions. A medical doctor and I had been invited to appear on the "Kelly" show in Belfast to deal with the question of homosexuality. We understood that two people on the panel would take the point of view of homosexuality, while the other two would take a different line. We thought that the audience would be a normal mixed audience, but it consisted completely of homosexual people. I had the privilege, for which I am thankful, of receiving letters of apology from members of that community, thanking me for the way in which I dealt with the programme and apologising for the way in which some people responded and acted.

When we talk about bigotry, we must remember that it is not one-sided. Even today, certain innuendos have been cast at some who may take a different line. It shows the kind of world in which we live—the real world—when an outside body tries to put pressure on a person who holds different views from it in order to remove that person from a directorship.

The hon. Member for Rhondda may have made one or two mistakes. There are different forms of theology, but I have never believed that penitence comes after repentance.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) (SDLP): I watched the programme to which the hon. Gentleman referred. If we are ever to reach a settlement in Northern Ireland, it must be based on full equality and full justice. How can my political beliefs or those of the hon. Gentleman, however deeply and sincerely felt, prevent full equality and full justice for people because of their sexual orientation?

Rev. Martin Smyth: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but we should bear it in mind that politics represents society. The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) made the point that 86 per cent. of people did not approve of the Bill before it was applied to Northern Ireland, but the Bill was suddenly extended to Northern Ireland on the ground of equality. For years, I pleaded for this House to pass legislation to give equal rights to disabled people in Northern Ireland, but it was regularly kicked into touch. If we deal with equality, we should do so across the board.

I am not convinced that the Bill will provide the rights mentioned by the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry). The financial issues could have been tackled differently, but Governments of both persuasions will always hesitate to introduce legislation that increases expense and makes them unpopular with taxpayers, and we must bear that issue in mind.

The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) discussed goods and services and referred to Sandals. Have we reached the stage at which we introduce legislation that deals not with moral law, but with people's preferences, and that compels people to act in certain ways? If we go down that road, the legislation that we introduce will ultimately prove divisive. I have no time for homophobia, which is prevalent in all societies, but I am not convinced that the Bill will actually advance our response to young folk who hold such attitudes. Thankfully, many young people are beginning to react against the commercial side of sexuality, which is brainwashing our society.

David Cairns: The hon. Gentleman is sliding dangerously close to a view of homosexuality and young people from which I urge him to back off, because it will do his argument no good whatsoever. To return to his point about moral judgments, personal preferences and the law, does he accept that we legislate in a variety of other areas? If I ran a bed and breakfast and decided that I did not want to accommodate black people, it would be against the law, which we accept. Personal preferences and the law cross over, and we are here to make choices and pass legislation. We cannot stand back and say, "We should not get involved", because that is why we are here.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, which concerned a private boarding house.

We may discover that we are turning citizens into criminals and that we are putting people out of business and out of work, which may lead them to draw unemployment benefit.

[Rev. Martin Smyth]

The heart of the argument was expounded in Belfast by a representative of the homosexual community who said that in his opinion there is a difference between marriage, which is a sacrament, and civil partnership. There are those of us who believe that marriage is not a sacrament but an ordinance of God, and we wonder whether the state can continue to try to replicate the pattern that God has ordained.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): This has been an interesting debate. I do not intend to disappoint my hon. Friends the Members for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), for Wealden (Charles Hendry) or for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). I oppose the Bill in principle and feel just as passionately about that as those who have spoken in favour of it. I salute the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow), who made a courageous speech with great dignity, and I respect him for his position. I hope that the House, which has overwhelmingly declared that it is in favour of the Bill, will nevertheless recognise that some of us have equally passionate beliefs on the other side of the argument. I am afraid that simply to throw epithets at us does the House no credit. Serious issues are involved and they deserve to be addressed.

Let me say at the outset that there is no question that any hon. Member would tolerate bullying of any description. The activities that my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden described are unacceptable to anybody, but they are nothing to do with the Bill. The fact that action has not been taken is regrettable, and those who have failed to do so should be upbraided.

Mr. Borrow: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could answer the question that I put to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe): does the Bill contain parts that he can accept and parts that he cannot, or is he opposed to the whole concept? Many right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned specific injustices in the current situation. Which of those injustices would he be prepared to address?

Mr. Howarth: I am opposed to the Bill in principle, because I am opposed to the creation of civil partnerships, but I shall turn later to some of the aspects that I readily understand.

So strong are my feelings about the principle of this matter that I have made common cause with Peter Tatchell, whose name has been mentioned. I supported Peter Tatchell when he was arrested by the Belgian authorities for rightly protesting against Mr. Mugabe when he visited Brussels. I have some wonderful letters from Peter Tatchell on file. The idea that people who are dealt with unfavourably by the police or bullied by their peers is acceptable is wrong and must be resisted with all the passion that we can muster.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howarth: Very briefly, because I know that two of my hon. Friends want to speak.

Mr. Bercow: Of course I readily accept that my hon. Friend is opposed to bullying of, or violence against, gays. He will recall, however, that he is on record as having said on 10 February 2000 that he believes that homosexual relations between consenting adults should be permissible only with the consent of both sets of parents, which is a somewhat difficult state of affairs to achieve. Does he not accept that if the political culture and the law fail to respect the existence of gay couples, it is likely that discrimination against them, potentially including violence, will follow? As the late Enoch Powell would have said, that is so blindingly obvious that only an extraordinarily clever person could fail to see it.

Mr. Howarth: I shall assume that my hon. Friend thinks that I am extremely clever, as I know that he is a very generous man. I do not accept his point, and he is unfair in adducing those remarks to me. I cannot remember exactly what I said on 10 February, but obviously my hon. Friend, with his encyclopaedic mind, can.

Hon. Members, including Front Benchers, are overwhelmingly in favour of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton is a veritable pocket battleship, and he made a very good speech. I did not agree with it, but I entirely respect his right to make it, and I am delighted that he did so in his personal capacity. If the chips were down and we were under fire, I would happily share a trench with my hon. Friend. I hope that he will take comfort from that.

If there is an overwhelming view in this Chamber, I do not believe the view outside to be the same. This is a highly controversial issue, and there are people outside who do not agree with civil partnerships. Furthermore, those people will be astonished that the Bill is being rammed through the House in the space of about 10 days. That is not the way to treat an issue of such major importance. Such people regard this Bill as gay marriage in all but name, and they simply think that that is wrong. They are our constituents, they are decent people—

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howarth: If my right hon. and learned Friend does not mind, I will not, as I know that two of my hon. Friends still wish to participate in the debate.

These are decent people that I am talking about. They are not homophobes, bigots or any of the other epithets so readily thrown about. They are tolerant and generally neither inquire nor want to be told what other people do in the privacy of their own home. However, they recognise that our laws ought to have a moral basis. They also recognise that the law sends a moral signal, for good or ill.

The Government also believe that, which is part of their reason for pressing ahead with the measure. The plan to create civil partnerships was first announced in December 2002, when the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche)—I am sorry that she is not in her place at the moment, although she spoke earlier—who was then Minister for Social Exclusion, indicated that legal change was intended to force cultural change. She said:

> "It would send a powerful message about the acceptability of same-sex relationships and about the unacceptability of the homophobia still far too prevalent in our society."

There is no room for middle ground in that statement: one either regards same-sex relationships as acceptable or one is homophobic.

People often say that one cannot use the law to force one's beliefs on other people, but clearly the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green does not accept that, and nor does her successor, the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality, who is in charge of civil partnerships and responsible for the Bill today. She issued a consultation paper in June last year. In her foreword, she announced that thousands of homosexual couples are > "living in exactly the same way as any other family".

Exactly the same way? That assertion is disputable.

Mr. Alan Duncan: Is it my hon. Friend's view that those who have religious objections to the Bill—the objections are primarily religious—are entitled to and should use the power of the House to impose those same religious views on people who may have no faith and who may not share those same religious views?

Mr. Howarth: My view is that this is a Christian country and that all our laws are grounded in Christian tradition. As my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said quite fairly, there is a difference of interpretation, and as time moves on, perhaps even more so. I am afraid, however, that I take the view that this is an overwhelmingly Christian country, that our laws must be founded on the Christian faith, and that it is right that bishops should sit in the other place. I support that.

There is no doubt that the Government are on a crusade. The Under-Secretary of State for Defence said in a debate on the armed forces that some measure was part of the Government's equality agenda. They want to force a cultural change on our society. To take lightly the deeply held convictions of so many people about the nature of marriage, and to try to force them to recant, is oppressive and dictatorial.

The issue is the nature of marriage, no matter what the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality may say. She has repeated the Government line, which is shared by my hon. Friends, that civil partnerships have nothing to do with marriage. I submit that that assertion has all the credibility of the Iraq dossier. It is gay marriage in all but name. Ministers cited the case in Brighton, where what has been called a "pink wedding list" is apparently being drawn up. Weddings are ceremonies that are associated with marriage—

Mr. Bercow: So what?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend says from a sedentary position, "So what?", but the Government have asserted all along that civil partnerships are not gay marriage. I am sure that he fully accepts the concept of gay marriage, but the Government have said that this measure is completely different, although the Minister quoted with approval what was going on in Brighton. I shall not repeat the various clauses in the Bill that mirror exactly the provisions in relation to marriage, because we have discussed those at length.

All the newspapers call this gay marriage. I rarely quote The Guardian, but I shall at least quote what it said on 30 June 2003:

> "The tabloids may go wild over 'gay marriages' and New Labour will no doubt shrink timidly from the phrase. But in truth, it will be a legal marriage in all but name."

Here in the Chamber, we must pretend that this has nothing to do with marriage in order to perpetrate a deceit on the public, but in fact, not everyone in the Labour party is on message. I gather that in March, the Labour website ran a picture of the Bill covered in confetti to illustrate the similarity to marriage.

It has been said frequently throughout the debate that the case for civil partnerships exists because the current law is unfair, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden and others have rightly drawn attention to people who found themselves in some difficulty and experienced injustice. I understand how they must feel, but as my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain pointed out in the other place, there are other injustices as well. Her amendments were designed to draw to the public's and Parliament's attention the fact that the Bill sought to remedy one set of injustices without remedying another. It is no good certain of my hon. Friends and others who support the Bill saying, "Well, those are separate matters and we will deal with them later." These people feel that their injustice should have been dealt with. They wonder why homosexual couples should be treated favourably in this way, when the problems that they face have not been resolved.

Peers of all parties—despite the Labour party's efforts, I am told, to get their Members in the other place to vote against the amendment—took the view that if the Bill is meant to be about helping people living in co-dependent relationships, it should apply to two sisters and other family members who live together as adults for more than 12 years, as has been discussed. The noble Prelate the Bishop of Rochester said:

> "If the intention of the Bill is really to address unfairness . . . rather than introduce social engineering through the back door, the Minister, the Government and noble Lords will have no hesitation in considering the amendments with sympathy."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 June 2004; Vol. 662, c. 1367.]

I suspect that it is less a case of the amendments being considered unworkable and more a case of their being unwanted. If the Government were serious about dealing with them, they would introduce proposals to ensure that the Bill was changed in such a way as to make the amendments workable.

Of course, certain of the difficulties that have been mentioned by Members from all parts of the House could be dealt with under existing law. For example, on inheriting tenancies, homosexual couples already have legal rights that other co-dependants do not. In 2003, the Court of Appeal held that two homosexuals should be treated as living together as husband and wife for the purpose of a statutory tenancy. The court gave the survivor a right to inherit his partner's flat.

I accept that genuine difficulties exist, and I should point out to the hon. Member for South Ribble that, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), I feel that there are issues that ought to be addressed. But I do not believe that this Bill is the means by which to do so. Setting up an alternative to marriage—or a parallel to it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton suggests—is not the answer.

Let us be in no doubt: we are legislating for what Baroness Scotland accepted in the other place is a tiny fraction—5 or 10 per cent.—of a small proportion of the population. I remind the House of an old adage that may seem harsh, but is not intended to be so: sad cases make bad law. To legislate on the basis of the cases mentioned, and to create a whole new raft of law, consisting of 383 pages—[Interruption.] I repeat: these are sad cases, involving people who are in difficulty. The expression that I use is familiar in legal circles, as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin), who is a lawyer, will know.

Many of the problems in today's society arise from the dysfunctional nature of the family and the breakdown of family life. We desperately need to do all we can to support and sustain marriage. I am opposed to the Bill because it sends out a false signal, particularly to young people, that somehow a homosexual relationship is an equally valid lifestyle. We shall see all the books coming out to support schools in their personal and social education, which will encourage children to believe that. I do not share that view; it is not the right thing to do.

The Bill permits children, whom virtually all the authorities concede should be brought up in a natural household of a man and woman, to be brought up in another form of household. Finally, the Bill creates inequalities to which Parliament should not be party, so I shall oppose it.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I should like to make two points briefly so that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) can also contribute to the debate. I intend to vote against the Bill and I shall briefly explain my two reasons for doing so.

First, the Bill is unfair. It purports to overcome inequality, but it introduces inequality where there was none before. It gives preference and advantages in law to homosexual couples over and above other same-sex couples, which is unjustifiable.

I listened to the opening speeches and noticed that the Minister repeatedly used the term "homosexual", so it is clear that the Bill's provisions are intended for homosexuals, though I cannot remember whether the precise terms "gay" or "lesbian" were used. I cannot claim to have read every page of the Bill, which is rather a weighty tome, but I saw no reference to homosexuality in it. It refers simply to "same-sex couples", so I am left wondering whether platonic same-sex couples are excluded.

The impression was created that two women who have been lifelong friends living in the same home and sharing a life together would not be subject to the Bill's provisions. I hope that the Minister will clarify that point, because she gave the impression that the Bill would exclusively benefit homosexual couples. If that is not the case, it puts a whole different slant on the matter. In any case, who apart from the two involved can possibly know the nature of a personal relationship? Some heterosexual opposite-sex marriages are platonic and two homosexual people can live together and share a home even though they are not involved in a personal relationship with one another. There are other variations on the theme. I therefore ask the Minister how eligibility for civil partnerships will be established, given that it is virtually impossible to know the real relationship between any two people.

The civil partnership provisions, as presented by the Minister, are unfair. Unamended, the scheme will apply only to gays and lesbians, and other house sharers will be excluded. Would two elderly ladies living together for most of their lives have to affect to be homosexual in order to gain the advantages in law as described in the Bill? Would one of two sisters sharing a house over a long period incur inheritance tax when the other dies? Under the Bill, if a homosexual couple registered their partnership, even after a few months, one would inherit tax free if a partner died. That amounts to an injustice where there was none before.

I suggest that the Bill is unnecessary. Let us get back to its purpose. If it is to overcome injustices regarding tax benefits, pensions and so forth, I concede that it is right to deal with such injustices, but I am not persuaded that the Bill is the proper device for doing so. If the purpose is purely to overcome those injustices, civil partnerships per se are unnecessary. If it is to provide legal recognition for civil partnerships by creating a pseudo-marriage, that amounts to an entirely different purpose. The traditional family provides the basis for a stable society and the procreation of children. The Bill rests on the view that marriage and same-sex partnerships are equivalent or the same, but I do not believe that they are.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): It is difficult to summarise the debate from the point of view of the mediaeval wing of the Conservative party. We are accused of many things—of being homophobes and the rest of it—but I believe that we have a point of view that we are perfectly entitled to express. I must admit that I was surprised by the suggestion made by one of my hon. Friends in his closing remarks that the Conservative party as a whole was trying to turn away women, or people who are black or gay. Nothing is further from the truth. We are the party of all Britons. We want people to vote Conservative because they believe in freedom, the nation state, strong defence, deregulation or any of the other things that conservatism is about. We have as much right to speak up as anyone else.

Our present marriage laws discriminate against many people. Our existing law discriminates against gay people who wish to leave property to each other, but it also discriminates against sisters, uncles or nephews and many others who want to do the same. Yet it is not so much that the present law discriminates against those people as that it discriminates in favour of marriage. It is neutral about other relationships, but discriminates in favour of marriage because that is what has happened in every society and nation in history.

On the walls of every register office, it is stated that marriage is about a permanent union between a man and wife, to the exclusion of everyone else. All through history, societies have taken the view that that was necessary, and it was John Locke who said that marriage was mankind's first society.

Marriage is the building block of society. Over the centuries, Parliament has taken the view that we should discriminate in favour of marriage. We do not want to discriminate against anyone else—not sisters, brothers, uncles, nephews, stepsons or grandfathers, grandsons or gay people. We want to discriminate in favour of the building block that is marriage.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Leigh: No, as I have been told that I have very little time.

I have explained my concern about this Bill. We need a corpus of marriage law, and we have one. I have personal views about marriage. For many years, I have said that we must try to sustain it, just as I have argued against easier divorce laws, but that is a subject for another debate.

We must now create another corpus of law, either with this Bill or with a Finance Bill, to relieve the unfair burden placed on people who have lived together a long time and who want to leave pension rights or property to each other, or who want to visit each other in hospital or enjoy all the other benefits that have been mentioned today. Whatever such a Bill might be called—the Sharing of Long-Term Domicile Bill is one possibility—it would allow us to do what the Government want to do with this Bill.

The Government have tried to pull our heart strings on this matter. We have heard powerful stories about people called Chris or Rex, and about people who have been living together for 40 years who want to leave their property to each other but who cannot. We realise that that is unfair in the modern world. It is unfair that sisters who have lived together for many years in a non-sexual relationship should be placed in such difficulty and it is a problem that we must address.

I accept that the amendments passed by the House of Lords may be unworkable in their present form. I am trying to put my argument in an honest way but if the Government are serious about addressing anomalies that hit people who have been living together for a long time, they should use this Bill or the Finance Bill to introduce proposals that could work to help such people. The Bill as it stands does not provide that.

We are not homophobes or anything like that, but we are saying that this Bill does not do what the Government seem to want it to do. We must be honest about these matters. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) made an honest speech, in which he gave a powerful exposition of his point of view. There is no doubt that there are people in this House who believe that gay people should be allowed to go through a form of marriage. If they love each other and have made a commitment to each other, why should gay people be denied something called marriage when the rest of us are allowed it? However, a person would have to be utterly credulous to believe that, by enabling people to register a civil partnership at a register office and by providing that a long-term relationship can be ended only after it has suffered irredeemable breakdown—in other words, by replicating what is contained in our ordinary marriage laws—we are not creating a form of gay marriage.

Why cannot we be honest about it? It will come and the next step will be for the gay community to insist—rightly, in their view—that gay marriage be recognised, that it should be an offence to attack homosexuality and that it should be taught in schools on equal terms. That is the agenda. Let us not be mealy-mouthed about it. That is why the mediaeval wing of the Conservative party, as we have been described, is standing foursquare against the Bill and why we will vote against it tonight. We believe that by voting against the Bill, we send a powerful message that there are still people in this House who are prepared to stand up for traditional values because they believe passionately that such values are the building blocks of a just, fair and right society.

6.30 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Back to reform, now. This has been a fascinating and full debate. It has spoken for itself and will need only reasonably crisp and succinct winding-up speeches. Indeed, there is no time for more.

I shall draw on one or two speeches without, I hope, invidiousness, because they have all been of high quality. I was delighted by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) from the Front Bench. He spoke with great fervour, a round appreciation of the issues and clarity of mind. It was a good start from our side. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) spoke with great authority and commitment to the cause of equality generally and to the elimination of discrimination. She will not be surprised to learn that I agree with many of her sentiments, although not all of them in detail. It is important that we make social progress in this area and that my colleagues recognise that such progress has been made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) made a distinguished speech and I also commend the passion and articulacy of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). As he occasionally admits in public, I can claim to have had a hand in his conversion, but I cannot be responsible for the ongoing consequences in relation to his speech this evening.

The Conservative party will allow a free vote on the issue and I will support the Bill tonight. Those of my hon. Friends who do not share my view of the Bill and will not join us in the Lobby have made progress in the sense that they have admitted that gay people in relationships face problems. However, my hon. Friends argue that others face problems with their tax position and so on, as mentioned in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) quoted John Locke. It may well be that marriage is the building block of society, but that does not mean that we cannot have civil partnerships as a secondary underpinning of society, for those who expect to require them. The two are not mutually exclusive and that is the fulcrum of the differences in this debate.

I have three points to make specifically and I shall then make some more general comments in conclusion. All three points draw on my previous experience of the Gender Recognition Act 2004, which addressed many of the same issues. That Act has not been mentioned today, but if the Bill were not passed it would lead to an invidious situation for persons affected by that Act. I have a constituent who has been married for several years but has undergone gender reassignation. That person may now apply for a gender recognition certificate, but if they do so their marriage is automatically voided. However, they wish to continue the loving relationship that they have had for many years. It would be intolerable not to afford them the opportunity to take out the parallel of a civil partnership to recognise that new position. Indeed, they have lobbied me on that point and have kept in touch with me throughout the passage of the Bill.

We touched on my second point when we discussed gender recognition, and it is also relevant to the Bill, so I hope that the Committee will consider it. It is important to be certain that the Bill is sufficiently alert to developing issues of private international law, especially relating to jurisdiction. As has been said in several quarters, a large number of European and other states have adopted legislation on civil partnerships that is similar to the Bill. Persons in civil partnerships will come to the UK and may establish businesses or work in this country, so it is extremely important that their rights are recognised and to some extent anticipated by our law and that we do not find ourselves in the European Court for non-compliance on the ground of discrimination. I advise Ministers to keep that point firmly in mind.

A third issue that I hope will be probed in Committee is the need to iron out any remaining disparities between civil partnerships and marriage. The two are distinct, but it is perfectly proper that they be parallel and as near identical as possible in terms of what they convey. To my more sceptical friends, I say that I feel strongly that the Bill is about conveying rights and although there may be certain privileges, or consequences in terms of benefits, that flow from those rights, they are secondary to the main purpose. I think that Ministers are aware that if their objective is to secure those rights through a parallel process, they should make clear tonight and in Committee how those rights will be pursued. That consideration applies not only to the points that have been made in many places about occupational pensions, where I have sympathy, but is also true in respect of the financial implementation of those rights. It would be helpful if the Minister could tell the House something about the first convenient or available Finance Bill and the timetable to bring in the validation of those rights.

Those three points have not always featured in debate. What has inevitably featured extensively is the tranche of amendments moved by my noble Friend Baroness O'Cathain, which cause real difficulty for the Bill, so I shall have no problem if the Government want to remove them in Committee. The difficulty is partly practical. For example, what would be the situation of three sibling sisters living together? Could they conclude a simultaneous civil partnership with each other, or if not, which of them would be excluded and on what grounds? The mind boggles.

It is also important to remember that whereas rights can be extended to groups through the civil partnership—indeed, it is part of the essence of the case against civil partnership put by some who have briefed us that it affects only a small number of people—by the same token, if the whole complex of family relationships and carers is included, the cost of any action taken would probably escalate by one or two orders of magnitude. We should be dealing not with a small amelioration of unfairness, or the ironing out that I described, but with an almost unsustainable financial consequence.

It is of course entirely right, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition has indicated in correspondence and as we have said during the debate, that we should look at action to remedy or improve the position of carers and family members through a Finance Bill. That is the right place to argue the point, having regard to the costs and resources available and the precedents for it. Such provision should not be used to obstruct or get in the way of the thrust of the Bill's equality legislation for civil partnerships.

I have some personal comments, which in a sense drive my support for the Bill. The nation, Parliament and society more generally have been on a rather long journey—as have I—and the Bill represents one of the final steps. Alongside the parallel evolution of discrimination and equality law—I have already indicated my sympathy with that broad approach and my continuing interest in it—I would describe what has happened since the Wolfenden report in 1959 through the 1960s and on through the 40 years to today as the conversion of our legal approach from the old prescriptive and even literally penal ways that we practised to an approach based on respect for the individual and the choices that he or she wishes to make.

Perhaps, taking the debate away from the Bill, the single most interesting and encouraging event in recent weeks has been the combined resistance of European Union countries to Turkey's proposed penalisation of adultery, which goes absolutely in the opposite direction and is not acceptable according to modern standards. Slowly but surely in western Europe and more widely in the western world, both among professed Christians and those of other faiths and no faith, we have come to cast off an approach based over the centuries on prescribing what people should do in their private lives and instead we have moved towards providing an acceptable institutional framework to enable individuals to pursue their lives by their own lights and to pursue their own relationships.

There remain entrenched—we have heard them today—overt and, perhaps more interesting, covert beliefs and habits that are hostile to gay relationships. Yet, and I say this as someone who has had 35 years in Christian marriage and has children and grandchildren—I celebrate that—I hope that I can recognise now the validity of the wish of my friends and the friends of my children who happen to be gay to enshrine their loving and faithful relationship in law. That is what the Bill is about. Simply, the time has come for all of us, but for my party as well, to learn to stop frustrating and even demonising individuals and instead to give them the space and encouragement to make their own life choices. That is the basis of my approach as a Conservative and of my support for this legislation tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) on an emotional winding-up statement and one that clearly identifies the journey that he has made in accepting the situation that we are discussing tonight. We have had a valuable debate. Seldom in this House over my short period in it have I heard such a thoughtful and thought-provoking debate. I say that in all sincerity to those people who perhaps do not accept the point of view that the Government are putting forward this evening.

I make it clear from the outset that we are not here to denigrate or undermine anybody's deeply held religious beliefs. We are here to discuss a secular arrangement for a commitment that two people make. I hope that we will gain, if not universal support, then significant support for that in this House. I am particularly pleased with the overall support for the principle of the Bill and the recognition of the inherent value and humanity of committed same-sex relationships.

Throughout today we have heard some outstanding speeches, and I want to comment on one or two of them. My hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) made a brave contribution to the debate today. It is very difficult to describe in the Chamber of the House of Commons in the full glow of publicity our own personal living circumstances, but he did so with great dignity. He also highlighted the fact that we are not talking about anonymous beings; we are talking about real people with whom we live and work.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) on his personal support for the Bill and on relaying the Leader of the Opposition's support. We divide on political grounds in many debates in the House, but I was absolutely delighted to hear about both his own support and that of the Leader of the Opposition. I wish to deal with a couple of points that the hon. Gentleman made and perhaps to give him some reassurance. On the compression of time, there is not a major difficulty. We intend to get the Bill through Parliament; it is a flagship Bill, and we certainly hope that we will have maximum support for it. On the design of premises, we will have a further opportunity to discuss that issue in Committee. I hope that that gives some comfort to him.

I wish to pick up on the comments made by the hon. Members for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley). Although I obviously do not wish to challenge their theological approach—that is not the purpose of my contribution—I hope that hon. Members will agree that very strong equality and social justice imperatives drive the introduction of civil partnerships and that they apply equally to Northern Ireland as to the rest of the United Kingdom. It would be invidious to treat same-sex couples in Northern Ireland differently from same-sex couples in the rest of the United Kingdom even, with the greatest respect to the hon. Member for North Antrim, if there were only 14 of those couples in Northern Ireland.

I also wish to highlight the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche). I congratulate her on her work as a Minister in highlighting the issue when she was in government. She made a telling contribution, and she also highlighted the fact that, in a mature society, we should be able to discuss such issues and to recognise that it is important that, regardless of our background or sexual orientation, we are entitled to equality of treatment and fairness.

I am sorry in some respects to highlight the contribution made by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) because, frankly, it brought a rather sour note to the debate. I can only say that it appeared to be a speech of single transferable family values.

We have heard about other countries throughout the debate. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) certainly identified, in a free-ranging and eloquent speech which brought seriousness to the debate, the range of countries that now adopt a position similar to the one that we speaking about this evening. One of his comments was particularly apposite: we cannot help those who cannot marry by somehow hurting those who can. That comment was very appropriate.

The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) also made a thoughtful speech, and I want to use it as a hook to congratulate him and the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Chris Smith), who collectively, in a cross-party way, sent letters to all hon. Members to say that they should support this important social legislation. I congratulate the hon. Member for Salisbury and other colleagues on that initiative.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), who is in her place, recognised when she introduced her civil partnerships Bill three years ago that she was ploughing a furrow that would end up here this evening on 12 October. She made a valuable contribution to our debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) asked about religious ceremonies. I appreciate that he is an expert on such matters, although he has not been so for quite such a lengthy time as the hon. Member for Belfast, South. My hon. Friend asked whether ceremonies should be involved in civil partnerships. I think that it is fair to say that same-sex couples could have a ceremony in addition to the registration process if they wished, but that would not be a legal requirement. The Government are clear about the route down which we wish to go. The confirmation of the civil partnership will be the signing of the partnership schedule.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin) raised one or two issues relating to Scotland on which I hope that I can reassure her. She asked whether the Government will allow the Bill to grant the legal rights of succession that exist in common law for spouses. We will move amendments in Committee to provide legal rights of succession to civil partners, and we probably would have been able to do that in the House of Lords if we had not been so rudely interrupted. She asked whether the Executive plan to review the law on succession in the light of the Bill, but as she will appreciate that is purely a matter for the Scottish Executive.

I highlight to my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) the fact that it was disappointing that the only contribution to the debate from a representative of the Scottish National party, the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart), was to chunter on about whether the House should be legislating in such a way. It is important to appreciate that some things are better done collectively across the United Kingdom's legislatures. When there is such complexity surrounding reserved and devolved matters, it is vital, as my hon. Friend said, for the Scottish Parliament to have the maturity to realise the importance of giving its powers back to Westminster in this specific case. I reassure Scottish Members—this might well interest other hon. Members—that I met representatives of the Scottish Parliament Justice 1 Committee and explained to them the procedures and the way in which we would implement the Bill.

The right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) said at the outset that she thought the Bill was wrong, so I doubt whether anything that any hon. Member could say would change her mind. With the greatest humility, however, I must tell her that she is not the only person in the House who wishes to defend the institution of marriage. Many of us want to defend that institution, and after 32 years of marriage, rather like the hon. Member for Salisbury, I think that I could defend the institution in most instances. The right hon. Lady should not assume that people who oppose the Bill are the only ones who are willing to defend the institution of marriage.

I shall deal with several general issues before I conclude my speech. As we have heard from examples cited today, the amendments made in the other place frankly left us in a faintly surreal situation. Although I would not impugn the reputation of all those who supported the amendments, the Bill was hijacked for reasons that are generally recognised to be outwith its scope. Many examples have been cited this evening about situations involving divorce or dissolving a civil partnership with a parent. Rather like the hon. Member for Daventry, I would have had grave difficulties with the situation in my family. I have three sisters and do not know whether we could agree about which would enter a civil partnership. When my parents were alive, I doubt that they would have been able to choose between the four of us regarding a civil partnership—my father would have had to divorce my mother first in any case.

We have clearly highlighted the fact that same-sex couples are invisible in legal terms. That is a good phrase, which has permeated the debate. It describes the situation exactly. We all know gay people who are living together in relationships, but in legal terms they do not exist. The Bill goes an enormous way to deal with that invisibility. With the greatest of respect to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald, just because we want to give legal rights to people in that position, that does not mean that we are undermining the institution of marriage. We cannot defend the institution by perpetrating disadvantage and unfairness.

Pensions have been of great interest and were raised by various hon. Members on both sides of the House. My right hon. Friend the Minister mentioned survivor pensions in public service schemes. There has been a significant discussion on that throughout the lead-up to the Bill. I am pleased to report that the Government will follow the approach that we have taken in the tax system. As for tax purposes, for survivor pensions in public service schemes, registered same-sex couples will be treated in the same way as married couples. The change will be achieved by means of regulations, which will be introduced following Royal Assent. There is no need to amend the Bill.

The regulations will provide equality, as they will allow registered same-sex partners to accrue survivor pensions in public service schemes from 1988. That replicates the position for child and working tax credits, child benefit and guardian's allowance, which will be amended so that the rights and responsibilities of opposite-sex couples are replicated for same-sex couples. We have made it clear that we will use the first available Finance Bill to ensure that registered same-sex couples will be treated the same as married couples for tax purposes.

Angela Eagle: I thank my hon. Friend for the progress made since the debate started. She makes a welcome announcement and many people will be happy about it.

Mrs. McGuire: I thank my hon. Friend for her comments. There has been a great deal of activity and campaigning on the issue for genuine reasons, which is why the Government responded as they did. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland was cynical about that, but hoped that at the end of the day we would reconsider our position. I do not think that even he anticipated it would be at the end of this day.

We are looking forward to debating some of the issues further in Committee. I am sorry that I have not been able to address everything raised. At the start of the debate, my right hon. Friend the Minister referred to some of the personal stories of same-sex couples. We heard similar stories throughout the day. The people who will be affected by the Bill are not anonymous. They are ordinary people, going about their everyday lives. They are our friends, members of our families, neighbours and people with whom we pray in church or meet in a supermarket. They are from all airts and pairts of the United Kingdom. Some have shared their lives for decades, awaiting the opportunity to gain recognition for their relationship. In all sincerity, I hope that the House knows that it is now time to offer them dignity, justice and the right to be treated fairly. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

PETITION

Driving Offences

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I seek the leave of the House to present a petition brought to Westminster today by my constituents, Ray and Jane McCabe, and signed by more than 23,000 people in my constituency and beyond in West Sussex, on the first anniversary of the death of their daughter, 21-year-old Natalie McCabe, who was killed in a tragic traffic accident exactly a year ago, together with a second passenger, Vicky Browne. A third young girl was maimed for life. The petition marks the first anniversary of their death at the hands of a driver who had no licence to drive, was not taxed or insured, was exceeding the speed limit excessively, and was well over the drink-drive limit.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons pass legislation to increase penalties for driving offences; to introduce a system requiring the display of a valid driving licence and insurance documents on the windscreen of each vehicle; and to create a separate category of offence—to carry a similar penalty to that incurred by causing death by dangerous driving—for crimes committed by drivers without a licence who maim or kill.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Ectopic Pregnancy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

7.29 pm

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to initiate this important debate in the House tonight.

To commence, I declare an interest as an unpaid trustee of the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust and as someone who suffered an ectopic pregnancy 12 years ago.

Unlike eating and shelter, which are elemental requirements for the survival of an individual, reproduction is a primal requirement for the continuation of our species. If we as a species do not reproduce, we do not continue. It is also a powerfully personal issue. When things go well, it is the highlight of a life. When things do not go well, however, there is a great impact on a life. Within reason, we as a society should do what we can to maximise the number of times that things go right, and to minimise the number of times that they go wrong.

Ectopic pregnancy is one of the things that can go wrong. It occurs when the fertilised egg becomes caught either in the fallopian tubes or outside the reproductive system altogether. As it continues to divide and grow, it then bursts in the place where it is, leading to internal bleeding. If not caught, that internal bleeding can lead to death.

Around 10,000 women a year suffer an ectopic pregnancy. Around 10 die each year, and it is on the increase. Its impact is not just on the women who die and their families, but on those who survive when the ectopic pregnancy is not caught in time, who can suffer an emotional and traumatic time. They lose not only a potential child, but almost lose their life. The impact on the person of such an event is massive. There is a huge impact on their family, some of whom never get over it. There is a huge impact on the national health service, too, which need not happen.

Who is at risk of an ectopic pregnancy? Any sexually active woman of child- bearing age is at risk. An ectopic pregnancy is more likely if one has had pelvic inflammatory disease, endometriosis, any previous abdominal surgery, which does not have to be gynaecological surgery but could be having one's appendix out at a young age, if one has had a coil fitted, if one is on the progesterone-only contraceptive pill—the mini-pill—which is a little controversial in medical circles, or if one has chlamydia. The official view is that around half of all ectopic pregnancies are caused by chlamydia, although there are arguments in the medical profession about that. It is significant, however.

Looking back at the categories of women whom I mentioned, a huge proportion of the female population at any given time may have suffered from such conditions or may have used methods of contraception that might put them at greater risk.

What is worrying is that chlamydia is on the increase. In February 2002, I was able to introduce a debate in the House on sexually transmitted infections, which are often referred to nowadays as sexually shared infections—after all, it takes two to tango—as a result of the dramatic rise in the number of such infections. It is a matter of concern that the level of infections is still increasing.

At the time of the debate, I was promised that there was a Government commitment to extend the national chlamydia screening programme. The screening had initially been piloted in just two places—Portsmouth and the Wirral. It was extended to a further 10 sites in 2002 at a cost of about £1.5 million a year. Two years ago, the Department of Health estimated a cost to the nation of £50 million a year as a result of pelvic inflammatory disease, ectopic pregnancy and infertility as a result of chlamydia. Those costs, I suggest, are likely to increase, particularly as women with infertility problems are now to be offered a cycle of in vitro fertilisation treatment on the national health service. If conditions such as chlamydia continue to increase, infertility will also increase.

As I have suggested, some think that these figures are an underestimate. Compared with this country, there has been a massive campaign in Sweden in the past 15 years to educate and screen the population. Chlamydia in Sweden is now rare—the rate has declined from 15 per cent. to some 3 per cent.—and ectopic pregnancies have reduced at all ages, most markedly in women under 30.

Almost two and a half years ago, I called for a national screening programme for chlamydia, but it has not happened. Since then, the rate of infection has increased, and the number of women suffering ectopic pregnancies has increased. That is not to say that nothing at all has happened. Diagnosis has improved and the death rate is not increasing, although the number of ectopic pregnancies is.

I was pleased to read in the September issue of Men's Health Forum magazine about work carried out by the Men's Health Forum in partnership with Telford and Wrekin primary care trust and six local employers. Testing kits were made available in men's workplace lavatories, which could then be sent to Princess Royal hospital in Telford. The men were notified of the results by phone, post or e-mail, and if they tested positive, they could pick up antibiotics from a pharmacy without a prescription. I was also pleased to note that the scheme has been extended to include another local factory, a military base, a local college and some youth centres.

The importance of this work is shown in a study of young soldiers in Edinburgh undertaken last year. Some 10 per cent. of the men had chlamydia, and some 88 per cent. of those with the infection had no symptoms and no reason, therefore, to seek medical attention. A leading consultant in sexual health says that one would expect to find the same proportion of hidden infection in any group of young men tested, or, indeed, in any group of men who had recently changed sexual partners. That gives us some idea of how widespread the infection is, and how urgently we need the screening campaign.

If my hon. Friend the Minister is unable to announce tonight the nationwide roll-out of the national screening programme, I hope that he will at least be able to indicate further progress towards it. I urge him to encourage the Department of Health to expedite the programme if at all possible.

The Minister may not be aware that some of the sexual health services that were keen to implement the chlamydia screening programme have been prevented from applying for money by their primary care trusts. That is because the Department of Health provides the first year's pump-priming money and covers costs for years 2 and 3, but then requires the PCT to pick up the full cost. The sexual health clinic in Bristol, which is widely acknowledged as one of the leading centres for chlamydia research in Britain, submitted a bid for the most recent tranche of funds in 2003, only to have it withdrawn by its PCT on the ground that the PCT could not afford to pick up the cost in 2006–07. That decision surely beggars belief, given that Bristol's sexual health service problems were highlighted by my colleagues on the Health Select Committee in last year's report to the House. Does the Minister have any suggestions as to how PCTs can be encouraged to support, and given incentives to support, local health services in accessing the screening campaign, instead of obstructing them?

Whatever the cause of ectopic pregnancies, there is a more important change in the way in which services are delivered that could reduce the damage caused by them. As I said, ectopic pregnancy is a life-threatening condition that is on the increase. It has an impact on future fertility, and the emotional and physical trauma experienced is significant. But it is not only screening for chlamydia that can have a massive impact in terms of reducing the number of ectopic pregnancies, and we do not always have to look overseas for best practice. Some hospitals in the UK have established early pregnancy units. Any woman who might be pregnant is scanned to make sure that she does not have an ectopic pregnancy, and the provision of good ultrasound services and blood tests increases the accuracy of diagnosis. If early diagnosis can be achieved and the appropriate facilities provided, less invasive surgery or no surgery at all can be used to manage the condition. That will ultimately reduce the cost to the health service, the unnecessary suffering and the trauma to the woman, and will increase the chance of her future fertility. Medical advisers to the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust are already operating in that way. They have already made the changes necessary to reduce ectopic pregnancy.

What is being asked for is not so much money as training for accident and emergency staff and for obstetrics and gynaecology staff. It is about the way services are organised and about making A and E staff aware of ectopic pregnancy. It is about midwives and nurses being able to refer women who possibly exhibit ectopic pregnancy symptoms to early pregnancy units for an early scan. In many areas, though, that is not possible and it has to be done via a GP. We must accept that midwives are the lead professionals for healthy women and are ideally placed to make referrals. Woman who are perhaps pregnant or at the very least those who exhibit early pregnancy problems should have easy unrestricted access to early pregnancy units across the UK. That will result in a reduced number of hospital admissions.

Where GPs are involved, it is important that they are aware of problems in early pregnancies and have the necessary equipment to deal with them. For example, one of the medical advisers to the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust lectures to GPs across the country on the diagnosis of pelvic pain in women. Two years ago, at a course in Oxford, he found that half of the GPs worked in practices that refused to stock pregnancy testing kits on the grounds that they were too expensive and they were not being reimbursed for the cost. It costs approximately £1 for each test. The medical adviser was astonished to find that those GPs simply referred to hospital all women with pelvic pain that was viewed as severe enough by the doctor.

Those are precisely the circumstances under which women with ectopic pregnancies and mild pain could be missed—and could die. More recently, that adviser found fewer GPs with that attitude, but they still number around 5 to 10 per cent. of the total. Is it possible to ensure that primary care trusts insist that all general practices have pregnancy testing kits, and that GPs have adequate training in the diagnosis of pelvic pain in women to ensure that ectopic pregnancies will not be missed?

I have talked about the importance of chlamydia, screening programmes and the organisational changes that I believe are necessary. One thing that I ask is that the Department of Health meets the senior medical staff already running best practice to learn about what can be done to reduce the numbers of ectopic pregnancies, so that discussions can be held on the theme.

Having said at the start of my speech that I was involved in establishing the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust, I make no apology for ending my speech by talking a little about its work. The Ectopic Pregnancy Trust is the only organisation in the UK that focuses on this relatively common condition that affects around one in 80 pregnancies. Over the last five years, the trust has provided information and support to tens of thousands of women in the UK through a dedicated helpline and website, which receives 50,000 visits per month yet receives no formal funding.

It is very welcome that the Department of Health funded the initial start-up costs and sponsored the information leaflet on chlamydia and the link with ectopic pregnancy, though both those grants have now ceased and much of what we achieve is through the trust's fundraising activities and the good will of volunteers and supporters.

This debate is of particular importance to me. Twelve years ago I had an ectopic pregnancy, and had it not been for my brilliant GP, Dr. Asghar, in diagnosing it, I would not be here now. I had thought that I might be pregnant, but I waited to do a test until after celebrating my birthday over the weekend. On the Monday, I did a test and found that I was pregnant. On the Tuesday, I went to the doctor who said that he would arrange a scan for me as early as possible. He mentioned the possibility of an ectopic pregnancy, which meant nothing to me at the time.

At the weekend I began to feel very ill. Eventually, my then 10-year-old son called out my doctor and my son accompanied me to the hospital, hearing it said that I could die if not operated on very quickly. Confirming the foresight of my doctor, it was discovered that I had an ectopic pregnancy and I had a major operation. A nurse told me that I would have been dead if I had not had the operation within two or three hours. I was off work for several weeks, and received counselling for several months. I recovered fully, but what happened is still with me, as it is with every woman who goes through that. I do not want anyone else to go through what I went through, or anyone else's family to go through what mine went through.

It is very important that we do all that we can to ensure that no one else goes through the experience that I have described and to arrive at a position when no ectopic pregnancies occur, or almost none. That is achievable. With not a lot of money, but a lot of will, my hon. Friend the Minister can make a major difference to the lives of many women and families. I look forward to his reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) on securing today's debate on an important and harrowing subject. I very much appreciate the valuable work that she has undertaken, both as co-founder and now as chairperson of the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust. I also very much appreciate the work carried out by the trust itself in raising awareness of ectopic pregnancies among women of child-bearing age, the medical profession and the general public. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend for sharing her personal experience with the House.

Approximately one in 100 pregnancies is ectopic, sometimes known as tubal. As has been noted, this is a dangerous and potentially life-threatening complication, for which early diagnosis and treatment are essential. I am sure that all hon. Members have the greatest sympathy for all the women who experience this devastating condition and have to cope with the consequences. They have to deal not only with a threat to their own life, but also with the loss of a baby.

Diagnosing an ectopic pregnancy presents particular challenges, as its symptoms present very early in pregnancy, often before the woman affected realises that she is pregnant and usually before she has sought any antenatal care. So, at this point, I should say two things clearly. First, even one avoidable death from an ectopic or tubal pregnancy is one too many, but secondly—and thankfully—a woman is now very unlikely to die from an ectopic or tubal pregnancy.

Successive reports of the Confidential Enquiries into Maternal Deaths in the United Kingdom have highlighted delays in the diagnosis of ectopic pregnancy, sometimes with fatal results. So it is important that the possibility of ectopic pregnancy is considered for any women of child-bearing age presenting with abdominal pain, and that a pregnancy test—and, if possible, an ultrasound scan—is undertaken as a matter of urgency. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East was fortunate in having a doctor who understood that.

The most recent CEMD report covered the three-year period from 1997 to 1999, and identified 13 deaths from ectopic pregnancy in the United Kingdom. It found that a majority of the women who died from ruptured tubal pregnancies and who were known to have sought medical help before death had symptoms suggestive of gastrointestinal or urinary tract disease. The report identified a clear need to highlight the atypical clinical presentation of women with tubal pregnancies to undergraduate medical and nursing students, and to postgraduate trainees in relevant specialties. Those included primary care, emergency medicine, general surgery and obstetrics and gynaecology.

Without the CEMD reports for the UK, which are funded by the Department of Health, it would have been impossible for us to understand why women are still dying as a result of ectopic pregnancies, or from other causes. In February 2001, the chief medical officer reminded all doctors in England of the CEMD's detailed advice. Following the CEMD report, we asked the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists to produce guidelines on the best way to manage a woman diagnosed with ectopic pregnancy. These were first produced in 1997 and have recently been updated. They have been distributed to all members and fellows of the college and are freely available on the college website.

It is encouraging that many hospitals have established early pregnancy units to allow for rapid assessment. However, I recognise that that is not the case everywhere. The maternity standard of the national service framework for children, young people and maternity services, which was published on 15 September, highlights the clear need to enable equitable access to rapid and skilled care for women currently unable to access those services. The maternity standard asks primary care trusts and maternity care providers to ensure that every woman who is experiencing problems in early pregnancy has access to an early pregnancy unit; that every pregnant woman whose unborn baby is found to have a possible problem has access to high-quality, appropriate services in an environment sensitive to her, and her partner's, needs; that as a minimum, early pregnancy units have access to high-quality ultrasound equipment and suitable expertise, other methods of assessment and therapeutic expertise, and provide a suitable environment for worried or distressed mothers and their partners; and that diagnostic guidelines are circulated to all health professionals likely to be consulted by a woman who may have an ectopic pregnancy. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that, with the help of the national service framework, we are making progress in the direction that she set out.

In discussing our efforts to tackle ectopic pregnancy, it is also important to say something about what we are doing to reduce the numbers of people infected with Chlamydia, which my hon. Friend also highlighted in her comments. Chlamydia is the most common sexually transmitted infection in this country. It often causes no symptoms, but if left untreated can lead to pelvic inflammatory disease—the single most preventable cause of infertility—and ectopic pregnancy.

As part of the implementation of the Government's national strategy for sexual health and HIV, the Department of Health is rolling out a chlamydia screening programme across the country. England is the first European country to have such a nationally organised programme and I am pleased to report that, after just two years, it already covers more than a quarter of PCTs in England. We forecast that full coverage will be achieved by 2008–09. I appreciate that my hon. Friend and many other people would like to see the programme available across the whole country immediately, but all screening programmes require time and commitment to implement successfully. Advice from the National Screening Committee is that it has taken at least five years to implement similar programmes successfully, and that our phased approach to rolling out the programme is the right one.

We have also invested funding to enable laboratories to switch to the more reliable and non-invasive type of chlamydia test. Last year, the chief medical officer publicly announced, in response to the Health Committee's report on sexual health, that £8 million would be allocated for 2004–05 to enable the improved test to be available in at least one laboratory in each strategic health authority. That money has now been allocated to those areas where it is needed.

Recently published data from the Health Protection Agency show a 9 per cent. increase in chlamydia between 2002 and 2003. It is encouraging to note, however, that the rate of increase for chlamydia, as with a number of other sexually transmitted infections, has slowed. I was interested to hear about the Telford programme, which—as my hon. Friend describes it—sounds very promising. However, there is no room for complacency and we agree with the Health Protection Agency that the numbers of sexually transmitted infections being diagnosed in sexual health clinics is still a cause for concern. We shall continue to tackle that in several ways. Those include investment in clinics to improve capacity and raising awareness of the risks of chlamydia and other infections through national campaigns, such as "The Sex Lottery" and the teenage pregnancy campaign.

Voluntary organisations, such as the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust, also have an important role to play. I am pleased that the Department of Health has, in the past, been able to support the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust with grant aid towards its core costs and its chlamydia and ectopic pregnancy project. I hear what my hon. Friend says about continued funding. The mechanism by which we fund voluntary organisations is the so-called section 64 grant. Of course if the trust were to put in a bid for further section 64 funding, it would be considered, although my hon. Friend will understand that I am not in a position to make any promises tonight.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that the Government recognise the need to ensure that facilities are available to enable women suffering from an ectopic pregnancy to be accurately diagnosed and treated, and that the maternity standard of the children's national service framework, in particular, will bring real benefits to all pregnant women. It gives us a real opportunity to drive up the quality of care offered to pregnant women, including those who have an ectopic pregnancy. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's comments are carefully considered by all the officials involved in planning those services. I assure her that we shall reflect deeply on what she has told us about a very important subject on which further action is required.

Question put and agreed to.

Laos

1. Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): What recent assessment he has made of the humanitarian situation in Laos. [190355]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Laos has 1.9 million people living on less than $1 a day. This year we provided some £350,000 through the mine action group for de-mining in the Nonghet district of Laos. We funded a number of other non-governmental organisations working there and the British embassy in Bangkok runs a grant scheme. In addition, we provide some £2.7 million to help tackle poverty in Laos through our contributions to the World Bank, the European Community and other multilateral organisations.

Andrew George: I am grateful for that reply, but is the Minister aware of the alleged persecution of the Hmong people in Laos and, in particular, of the recent harrowing tape brought out of the country, which includes evidence of the rape and murder of four teenage girls? It was publicised on CNN and by the BBC last month. What assessment have the Government made of the veracity of the evidence about the persecution of the Hmong people and what assessment have they made—both within the UK and the EU—of the wider implications? If they have made such assessments—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Questions must be brief.

Mr. Thomas: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I am aware of the report to which he refers. We continue to be concerned about human rights abuses in Laos in general. Our ambassador to Laos, who is based in Bangkok, visited in June to discuss the issue with the Laos authorities. We continue to monitor the situation carefully, but I will bring the hon. Gentleman's question to the attention of my colleagues in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Coop): It is now almost 30 years since the end of the Vietnam war, during which the CIA sponsored a guerrilla army in Laos, the remnants of which are still active, but have been surrendering in recent months. Third parties have said that the brutal and repressive way in which the Vientiane regime is dealing with the problem is tantamount to ethnic cleansing. Does the Minister agree and does he think that we should treat the matter rather more seriously?

Mr. Thomas: As I said in response to the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George), we take any allegations of human rights abuses extremely seriously. That is why our ambassador visited Laos in June to discuss our concerns with the Laos authorities, and it is why we are continuing to monitor the position extremely carefully.

Liberia

2. Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his Department's activities in Liberia. [190356]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): Over the past year, DFID has contributed £3 million to the United Nations trust fund for disarming and reintegrating ex-soldiers in Liberia, and £1 million to UNICEF for education programmes for former child soldiers. We have also provided £10.6 million in humanitarian aid focusing on community-based services, including for the large number of internally displaced people and for refugees as they start to return. In addition, our share of the European Union's programme in Liberia is £7.5 million.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I thank my right hon. Friend for that excellent response, which shows that we do not abandon states that desperately need us. However, there are people in my constituency who have fled Liberia and have protected children there, whose main concern now is that the UN will not be capable of disarming the various counties by the accepted date of 31 October. What assessment has my right hon. Friend made of that disarmament? Will he look again into the classification of Liberia as a safe state in order to ensure that if these people choose to return, it will be safe to do so?

Hilary Benn: The latest figures reveal that 87,000 ex-combatants have been disarmed and 25,000 weapons collected. The disarmament and reintegration process is organised on a regional rather than a county basis, and of the eight regional cantonment sites, four have completed their work and the UN is working hard to complete the rest of that process by the target date of the end of October, though there may be some slippage.

In order for a county to be declared as safe for return, the UN and the Government make an assessment of security, rule of law and basic services. To date, six of Liberia's 15 counties have been declared suitable for return and the UNHCR has started a strictly voluntary return programme to those counties.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that there is unlikely to be enduring stability in Liberia until Taylor is brought to trial and that it is disappointing that Nigeria is still giving him asylum? Can we do everything possible to impress on a fellow Commonwealth country and leading member of the New Partnership for Africa's Development that it really is time for Taylor to stand trial? He is wanted on a UN-backed warrant to stand trial in a war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone.

Hilary Benn: I share the hon. Gentleman's desire that Charles Taylor should face justice. The Government of Nigeria have said clearly that they will respond to a request from an elected Government in Liberia to return him. The British Government's position is very clear. We support the special court—and the hon. Gentleman will be only too well aware that we do so in very practical ways—and we think that he should return to face justice. However, we must also recognise that Nigeria played a part in getting him out of Liberia, and that that has partly contributed to the relative stability that now exists in that country.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh) (LD): The Secretary of State mentioned that six out of Liberia's 15 counties have been declared safe. He will know also that hundreds of thousands of refugees over the border in Guinea remain very reluctant to return because they consider Liberia unsafe. To have six safe counties out of 15 is not very good when the target date is the end of October. What discussions has the Secretary of State had with his colleagues and counterparts to try to accelerate the process and to bring comfort and security to those refugees?

Hilary Benn: When I was in Geneva recently I met Ruud Lubbers and we discussed this matter. Progress will depend on the extent to which security, basic services and the rule of law are assessed to apply in those counties. I think that everyone wants to make further progress but, as the hon. Gentleman's question made clear, the situation is difficult and fragile. Liberia has suffered a great deal and the work of the UNHCR and other bodies, with our support, must be aimed at maximising the rate at which parts of the country can be rendered safe so that people will want to return. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to imply in his question that, in the end, the real assessment will be made by the refugees when they decide whether they feel that it is safe to return.

Former Soviet Union

3. Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the Department's strategy of working with non-governmental organisations to support the development of civil society in the countries of the former Soviet Union?

[190397]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): The Department works with many NGOs in Russia and the countries of the former Soviet Union on a range of issues including improved governance, reducing the spread of HIV/AIDS, land reform and delivering better public services. Our approach is to encourage civil society to work alongside Government and businesses in comprehensive national programmes to reduce poverty.

Mr. Marsden: In thanking my hon. Friend for that answer, may I emphasise how crucial I believe DFID's role to be in raising the level of civil society in the countries of the former Soviet Union? That is especially important in those countries that are covered by the new European near-neighbourhood policy. One of those countries is Armenia, and I hope to visit one of DFID's projects there next week. Will my hon. Friend assure me that the Department will look closely at the operation of NGOs in the countries of the former Soviet Union, and that those bodies have a strategic plan to ensure that they are embedded locally? Success in those countries will be achieved only if we adopt a bottom-up approach to tackle matters such as corruption and the improvement of civil society.

Mr. Thomas: I wish my hon. Friend well on his visit to Armenia next week. He is right to say that civil society needs to develop much more in the countries of the former Soviet Union. That is one of the reasons why we are giving money to social development funds in Armenia, Moldova, Ukraine and Tadjikistan. Those funds support the development of NGOs in those countries, with the aim of getting communities better represented and more engaged with Government organisations.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): There is a distinct possibility that Turkey will join the EU in the short-to-medium term, and that means that bordering countries such as Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia are set to be the EU's immediate neighbours. What specific projects is the Department supporting as part of the EU's near-neighbourhood policy to secure peace, prosperity and democracy in the south Caucasus?

Mr. Thomas: The EU is working in a variety of ways in the countries to which the hon. Gentleman referred. In Armenia, for example, it is supporting a regional development programme that is helping to develop the capacity of civil society, along the lines of what I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden). We are also working with the EU on support for the extractive industries transparency initiative in the region. The aim is to get more transparency about how the resources from the extractive industries are generated, and to help to prevent the possibility of corruption in those countries.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): Freedom-loving people the world over will celebrate the growth of independent trade unions in central Asia. What support do the Government propose to give to those independent trade unions in the future?

Mr. Thomas: I congratulate my hon. Friend on continuing to raise the matter of trade unions in that part of the world. The social development funds in Armenia, Georgia and Moldova to which I have referred already also provide support to trade union activity in those countries. My hon. Friend is right to say that we need strong trade unions and other civil society organisations if communities in those countries are to be better represented, and better able to engage with Government.

Trade and Development

4. The Reverend Martin Smyth (Belfast South) (UUP): What recent discussions he has had on the effects of trade on development. [190358]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): I regularly talk to developing country Ministers about how we can make trade work for the poor. I have also recently talked to the director-general of the World Trade Organisation and the EU Trade Commissioner designate about the need for progress on more open and fairer trade to help developing countries lift their people out of poverty.

We also discussed trade at last week's meeting of the Commission for Africa in Addis Ababa.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that response. Does he agree that while aid is helpful, fair trade is better? What progress has been made in helping developing countries to promote trade when developed countries hinder them?

Hilary Benn: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The World Bank estimates that opening up world trade could help to lift 300 million of our fellow human beings out of poverty by 2015. In one sense, it is the single most important step that could be taken. As for progress, after the disappointment of Cancun, a framework agreement was reached just after midnight at the end of July this year, which sets the scene for the WTO ministerial meeting that is due to be held in Hong Kong in December. The real challenge will be to demonstrate, by what we do collectively in reaching an agreement, that we are prepared to take the steps that give the poorer countries of the world the chance to earn and to trade their way out of poverty, because that is what they want. In the end, it will be economic development that will be the real engine for lifting people out of poverty around the world.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that those who lobbied the Labour party conference, including aid agencies such as CAFOD, were impressed by what he and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had to say about economic partnership agreements? Will he therefore seek to continue to influence the Government to ensure that trade is at the heart of negotiations, especially during our European presidency?

Hilary Benn: I thank my right hon. Friend for his remarks. The economic partnership agreements, which are in the process of being negotiated, provide an opportunity to do what the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) seeks to do. I am sure the whole House also seeks to do that. We should not write them off, as some people have done, when the negotiations have only just begun. There are big issues to be addressed in terms of market access and rules of origin. EPAs are intended to be tools to promote development. The negotiations between the EU and the five regional organisations will have to result in agreement, and it is the deal that will demonstrate whether those objectives have been met.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): While I endorse everything that the Secretary of State has just said, I urge him to have early discussions with his colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry on export credit guarantee cover. In particular, does he really think that it is right that businessmen who are willing to risk their lives trying to build trade with Iraq and to reconstruct that state are turned down for ECG cover on the ground that it is too risky?

Hilary Benn: I will happily raise the hon. Gentleman's point with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): On behalf of the trade justice lobby in my constituency, I ask my right hon. Friend to recommit himself and his fellow Ministers to pushing forward trade. Despite the fantastic achievements of this Government in doubling our aid commitment and promoting the international finance facility proposals, it is trade that will be the single most effective means of development. Bono described my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor as our Lennon and McCartney. Where would my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State put himself and his Department in the fabulous four?

Hilary Benn: I am tempted by my hon. Friend, but I am not sure that I should go down that road. Lennon and McCartney will be remembered for their achievements, and that is also true of my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

We have made some progress. Export subsidies were a real cause of concern, but EU subsidies have more than halved in the past 10 years. The question is whether we will make further progress, and that is what we must work towards.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): On a recent Oxfam-sponsored visit to Ghana, it was made clear that the livelihoods of Ghanaian farmers are seriously threatened through EU and US-subsidised produce. They also experience difficulties due to tariffs on goods that they want to export. Will the Secretary of State set out how DFID's agricultural strategy will ensure that when developing countries' markets are opened it is not done in a way that threatens food security and the livelihoods of rural farmers?

Hilary Benn: Principally, by pressing for special and differential treatment in the negotiations. Why? Because everybody recognises that it is important that developing countries have particular protection, especially for the commodities to which the hon. Gentleman refers, when they are dependent. That is one thing we need to do. Another thing we need to do—as the hon. Gentleman raised the question of Ghana—is to enable those countries to extract more value from their raw materials. For example, they can export cocoa quite happily, but if they try to turn it into refined chocolate themselves, they face a big tariff. That is the sort of case that we need to change in the negotiations.

Sudan

5. Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Darfur province in Sudan. [190359]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): May I first express what I am sure are the condolences of the whole House to the families of the two Save the Children staff, Rafe Bullick and Nourredine Issa Tayeb, who were killed by a land mine last Sunday in north Darfur?

The humanitarian situation in Darfur remains precarious, and it was discussed with the Government of Sudan by the Prime Minister and myself during our visit last Wednesday. The United Nations estimates that 2 million people are in need of assistance, including 1.5 million who have had to flee their homes. A further 200,000 refugees have fled to Chad. Security in the camps has improved but outside, displaced people remain vulnerable to attack. More humanitarian assistance is getting through; the World Food Programme estimates that food was distributed to more than 1.3 million people in September, but the needs are still enormous. The UK has pledged £62.5 million since September 2003, and we will sustain our commitment through the allocation of £100 million for humanitarian and development assistance next year.

Mr. MacDougall rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to be fair to hon. Members who are listening; it is far too noisy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Those who are cheering are the ones who will be able to help me.

Mr. MacDougall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his response. I also thank the Government, the Prime Minister and the Department for their recent visits to Sudan where there is indeed a crisis. I am sure that their support is most welcome. I thank other people throughout the country for their efforts, such as the head teacher from my constituency—Ian Macaulay—who visited Sudan recently and made his contribution.

Will my right hon. Friend tell us whether the Government will back the efforts that have been made so far by considering some form of pre-emptive strike in terms of teacher training, so that the efforts of people who go to Sudan to make a contribution will be much more worth while and will make the best use of taxpayers' money?

Hilary Benn: I add my congratulations to those my hon. Friend offered to all the people who are contributing to the humanitarian relief effort in Darfur, by giving money and by being part of non-governmental organisations that are working there. He raises an important point about the long-term development prospects for Sudan. Let us be very honest: unless there is peace in Darfur, the chances of getting children who are currently huddling in refugee camps with their mums and some of their dads—those who have not been killed—to go to school will be extremely difficult. That is why, as well as the humanitarian aid effort, we need a political settlement, and in the meantime we need security for those people, so that in due course, when there is a settlement, they are able to return home. We have made it very clear that the prize at the end of the process, if there truly is peace in Sudan, is the prospect of development assistance for that country, where there is enormous poverty, high levels of maternal and infant mortality and very few children go to school. Only with a settlement can the hope that my hon. Friend expresses actually come to pass.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I join the Secretary of State in paying tribute to the two workers who were killed. They were unfailingly selfless in the help they gave others.

The Secretary of State is aware that the situation in Darfur is deteriorating—let us face it. According to the UN, 200,000 people have been driven from their homes in the past month, while the UN humanitarian co-ordinator has said that security is now the main constraint on humanitarian assistance and that attacks on civilians have actually increased. Is it not now undeniable, as the United Nations has made clear, that the only organisation that can make a material difference on the ground is the African Union military force and that the time has now come for it to stop watching events unfold and instead become more actively involved in preventing them from doing so?

Hilary Benn: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the current situation, but he is a little unfair to the African Union because it has played a leading role in trying to find a solution to the crisis. It has deployed the ceasefire monitors, and I hope that, in the next week, it will take a decision substantially to increase the size of the monitoring force—people who can supervise the police in Sudan and Darfur. It has also played a leading role in the only thing that will provide a solution to the crisis—a political settlement—because it is hosting the talks in Abuja. When I was there three weeks ago, I had the opportunity to meet Mr. El Ghabid, who is brokering those talks. It is very important that we put pressure not just on the Government of Sudan to reach a political agreement, but on the rebels who are in part responsible for the attacks to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Duncan: Any attention that we can give to Sudan has to be welcome—paradoxically, I welcome the Prime Minister's recent visit to Sudan—but if we are to overcome the continuing disaster, there needs to be universal condemnation of those who are guilty of atrocities. Will the Government now echo the language used by Colin Powell and call what is happening there "attempted genocide", so that any politician or militia member knows that they will never be able to escape the fullest possible punishment for their sub-human crimes?

Hilary Benn: I agree entirely that those who have been responsible for what has gone on in Darfur should be called to account. The purpose of the commission of inquiry, which has been set up under the new UN resolution, is precisely to try to find an answer to the question: is it genocide; is it ethnic cleansing? There is no doubt that it is a crime against humanity. The honest truth is that, whatever description one gives to what has gone on, the most important thing that can be done is to take the right steps to bring the conflict to an end. In that respect, the undertakings that the Government of Sudan gave to the Prime Minister when we met President Bashir and Vice-President Taha last week—including immediately to implement the humanitarian protocol to identify the location of Government of Sudan forces and to co-operate with the expanded AU mission—are the right steps; but, once again, the Government of Sudan will be judged not by what they say, but by what they do.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the immediate priority is obviously providing humanitarian aid to stop the suffering of many people in Darfur and Sudan, but that the long-term aim involves the issue that he has just been talking about: so many of their problems are self-inflicted? We must seek an end to the continuing problems that that country has experienced, not only now but over many years, if it is to solve the problems that it faces.

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend is right because the tragedy of Sudan is that the conflict in Darfur has exploded at the very moment when a peace deal has been reached to bring to an end the longest-running civil war in Africa between the north and the south. Sudan will have the prospect of development and a better life for its people only when there is peace across the whole country. That is why its Government need to use the framework that they have agreed under the north-south peace deal as a way to solve the conflict in Darfur.

Grenada

6. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): If he will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Grenada. [190360]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Fifty per cent. of the population of Grenada is currently homeless; 90 per cent. of housing has been either damaged or destroyed; and as the House will already know, tragically, some 37 people lost their lives when the hurricane hit. Details of our support to Grenada and the other Caribbean countries that have been seriously affected by the hurricanes was provided to the House in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's statement on 14 September and the two subsequent written statements, the most recent of which was published yesterday.

Mr. Heath: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his right hon. Friend's very full and comprehensive written statement to the House yesterday, which I found very helpful. However, the one area where I would perhaps part company is in the description of the law-breaking in both Grenada and, more particularly, in the Cayman Islands as sporadic and opportunistic. Eye-witness reports suggest that it was anything but—organised crime was involved, possibly from Jamaica or otherwise, and it was on a very serious scale. Is there a case for building into contingency plans for operations of that kind some form of immediate support for the law and order operations, particularly in those territories for which we have direct responsibility, such as the Cayman Islands?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman makes a particularly interesting point that I will consider after this session of questions. I should provide him with the reassurance that colleagues in government have sent a prison adviser to Grenada and provided £30,000 worth of support to enable the prison to be repaired. In addition, we have provided funding to enable the Royal Bermuda regiment to help with relief and reconstruction efforts on the Cayman Islands. Its presence will also help with law and order issues.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [190339] Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 13 October.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before listing my engagements, I know that the whole House would want to join me in sending our profound sympathy and condolences to the family of Ken Bigley. Throughout their ordeal, they have conducted themselves with the greatest dignity, courage and strength. Furthermore, I know that the whole House will join me in sending our condolences to the families of the two British soldiers who have lost their lives in Iraq since the House rose on 16 September. They were doing an extraordinary and heroic job. We can be proud of them.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As we have not heard a great deal recently about policy on the single currency, will the Prime Minister say whether it is still the policy of Her Majesty's Government to seek entry, subject to tests? If so, in the event of his being re-elected, when would the referendum be held? If there were a clear no vote, would he accept that absolutely as a decision for the foreseeable future?

The Prime Minister: The position on the single currency remains unchanged and, for once, the hon. Gentleman accurately describes it. In principle, we favour joining, subject to economic tests that have to be met. Were a referendum to be put to the British people on such an issue, the decision would, of course, be binding and would be accepted. He must be delighted that, after years of being a lonely campaigner on the Conservative Benches for withdrawal from Europe, he now finds himself in the mainstream of his party.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): Last October, P&O Ferries announced the sacking of 600 British seafarers in Dover. This October, it wants to sack another 1,200 seafarers and shore staff and it wants to threaten swingeing cuts to on-board manning, which will impact on safety. What help can redundant workers in Dover and other parts expect from Government, and what action will Ministers take to ensure that P&O is not allowed to compromise safety in the interests of profit?

The Prime Minister: We will, of course, make sure that P&O, as all others must, abides by its health and safety obligations. We are sorry about the number of my hon. Friend's constituents who will lose their jobs as a result of this announcement, but the Department for Work and Pensions stands ready to help anyone who is made redundant. I can speak from experience in my constituency. Emergency programmes that the Department for Work and Pensions has put in place have been very successful in finding redundant workers alternative employment. I assure him that we will do everything we can in Dover to make sure that that happens.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in expressing my deepest sympathy to the family of Kenneth Bigley and my great admiration for the enormous dignity with which they have borne their dreadful ordeal. I, too, join the Prime Minister in expressing my condolences to the families of the British soldiers who lost their lives in Iraq.

I support the war; it was the right thing to do. Will the Prime Minister realise that, before he can move on, there is one matter that he must deal with? He did not accurately report the intelligence that he received to the country. Will he now say sorry for that?

The Prime Minister: I made it abundantly clear—and do so again—at the time of the Butler report that I take full responsibility and, indeed, apologise for any information given in good faith that has subsequently turned out to be wrong. That is entirely proper; I have already done that. I do not accept in any way that there was any deception of anyone. That has been looked into by four separate independent inquiries, and in each case the allegation has been found to be wrong. I will not apologise for removing Saddam Hussein. I will not apologise for the conflict; I believe that it was right then, that it is right now and that it is essential for the wider security of that region and the world. I wish that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would stop playing politics with the issue—that is precisely what he is doing. He should remember that he and his party supported the war for precisely the same reasons as we did. It would be more helpful if he would back our troops out in Iraq rather than doing what he is doing now.

Mr. Howard: We back our troops wholeheartedly. I did not ask the Prime Minister to apologise for the war, because I support it, and neither did I ask him to apologise for what he describes as "the information". I asked him very specifically about the way in which he misrepresented the intelligence that he received to the country. Why can he not bring himself to say sorry for that?

The Prime Minister: I cannot bring myself to say that I misrepresented the evidence because I do not accept that I did. What is more, in the light of some of the comments of the UN chief weapons inspector, Hans Blix, it is worth pointing out what was unearthed by the Foreign Secretary—he told the House this yesterday, but it deserves repeating—about Hans Blix's view of the September information that we gave to the House at the time. I hope that the House will permit me to read from the report by the UK United Nations mission about Hans Blix's view of the dossier. He said that he felt that "it did not exaggerate the facts, nor revert to rhetoric".

Blix thought that

"the section risked understating Iraq's indigenous capacity to produce WMD".

In other words, it was the case that everyone at the time accepted the evidence on weapons of mass destruction. It is correct that some of that evidence, although not all of it, has subsequently turned out to be wrong, but that is a very different matter from deceiving the House, so I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will withdraw that allegation.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister has just asserted that he accurately conveyed the intelligence to the country. The intelligence that he received made it clear that little was known about Iraq's chemical and biological weapons work since late 1998. The Prime Minister told the country that the intelligence had established beyond doubt that Saddam had continued to produce chemical and biological weapons. How can he maintain that he accurately reported the intelligence to the country? Why will he not say sorry for that?

The Prime Minister: As we explained when we had the debate in July, the intelligence was precisely that Saddam Hussein continued to produce WMDs. We know from the Iraq survey group that he indeed had the intent and capability and retained the scientists and desire, but that he might not have had stockpiles of actually deployable weapons. We have accepted that and I have already apologised for any information that subsequently turned out to be wrong.

Everyone knows what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is trying to do. Having supported the war and urged us to go to war, he is now attempting to capitalise on anti-war sentiment to try to give himself credibility. I have been through what he has been saying over the past few months, and at the last count he had no fewer than four separate positions on the Iraq war—three too many for anyone who seriously aspires to be Prime Minister.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): In the light of the revelations concerning the intelligence documentation in the autumn of 2002, will the Prime Minister explain why, in the January before the war started, Britain and the United States prevented Hans Blix and the weapons inspectors from going back into Iraq to confirm their suspicions that there were no WMDs?

The Prime Minister: Hans Blix and his inspectors were in Iraq before the war began. We had no option but to go to war in the end because it was plain that Saddam Hussein had no intention whatever of complying with UN resolutions. Those people who want to pray in aid the Iraq survey group in respect of stockpiles of weapons must also accept the other part of what the Iraq survey group said, which is that Saddam retained the intent and the capability—the teams of scientists and so on—and was in breach of United Nations resolutions. That is what Mr. Duelfer expressly said. It was the breach of UN resolutions and their enforcement that was and is the reason for going to war.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): I associate the Liberal Democrats again with expressions of sympathy for the family of Mr. Bigley and the two United Kingdom members of the armed forces who have lost their lives since we last gathered.

On a point of accuracy, when Sir David Manning, then the Prime Minister's top foreign policy adviser, minuted him on 14 March 2002—one full year before the war—that he had told the American Government that the Prime Minister

"would not budge in" his

"support for regime change",

was he accurately reflecting the Prime Minister's views?

The Prime Minister: We always made it clear that if the only way of enforcing the UN resolutions was regime change, there had to be regime change. If the right hon. Gentleman looks at that minute as a whole, he will find that the basis for our argument throughout the entirety of that period was that we had to go back to the UN and we had to enforce UN resolutions. That is why we went back to the UN in November and got the further resolution. Had it been a case of us supporting regime change, rather than the enforcement of UN resolutions, we would not have gone back to the UN.

Mr. Kennedy: Now that we know that the 45-minute claim was unfounded and has been withdrawn, and now that we know that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, regime change becomes the only remaining argument, but the Prime Minister knows that regime change is contrary to international law. Where does all that leave the status of this war? Is it not the fact, and should not the Prime Minister accept it, that he led us into an illegal war?

The Prime Minister: No, I am afraid that I do not accept that. Let me put on the record again what was perfectly obvious from the debate in the House on 18 March. I looked at the debate—all of it—again the other day and the 45-minute intelligence was not mentioned once by anyone on either side of the House, although I shall leave that to one side.

We went to war because we took the view that we had to enforce the United Nations resolution because we could not continue—not post-11 September—with a situation in which a country was in breach of United Nations obligations in respect of the production of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons. That was the reason given at the time. That is the reason for the war now. I simply draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to this: he has accepted the Iraq survey group's report, has he not?

Mr. Kennedy indicated assent.

The Prime Minister: In full, presumably.

Mr. Kennedy indicated assent.

The Prime Minister: Right. If the right hon. Gentleman accepts the report in full, he has to accept, just as I must accept, that the evidence indicates that there were not stockpiles of weapons, that there were breaches of UN resolutions, because that is what the report says—[Interruption.] So he accepts the report; he just disagrees with its conclusions—except the conclusion that suits him.

Let us make one thing abundantly clear. It was a difficult choice. I took the choice. I stand by it. But let us be clear about this also: if the right hon. Gentleman had had his way, Saddam Hussein and his sons would still be running Iraq. That is the case and that is why I took the stand that I did. I take it now, and I, at least, will stick by it.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Prime Minister agree that although safe use of the internet opens up worlds of learning and adventure unknown to previous generations of children, it also opens up new dangers of cyber bullying, cyber stalking and cyber grooming, to name but a few? Will he welcome the work of WiredSafety in supporting Teenangels, a group of young people teaching themselves the safe use of the internet? Will he also welcome the launch of their UK activity in Portcullis House tomorrow?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree about the importance of the issue that my hon. Friend raises and with what she said about the need both to help children use the internet safely and to combat child pornography. As she probably knows, the UK has perhaps the world's best regime for tackling child pornography, the Internet Watch Foundation, and we continue to work closely with the industry, law enforcement agencies and children's charities to seek ways of protecting children from abuse. The internet obviously bestows enormous opportunities and benefits, but it also creates the dangers to which she draws attention, so it is important that we make sure that we do everything possible to protect our children, who may be gaining access to unsuitable material.

Q2. [190340] Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): At the Labour conference a couple of weeks ago, the Prime Minister said that after November he would make revival of the middle east peace process "a personal priority." Yesterday, an 11-year-old Palestinian girl was shot and critically wounded. About 100 Palestinians and many Israelis have died in the latest offensive, and Israel plans to purchase 500 bunker busters, the intended target presumably being Iran's nuclear installations. Does the Prime Minister believe that the Palestinian and Israeli people can wait until after the US presidential elections in November for the peace process to be revived?

The Prime Minister: I would like the peace process to be revived now, but the reality is that it is only after the presidential election that the President of the Untied States will be able to focus on that. I am determined, as we have done over the past few years, to do everything that we can to get the parties back into negotiation again. I credit the hon. Gentleman for mentioning the appalling death of the Palestinian girl and the fact that many Israelis die in terrorist acts [HON. MEMBERS: "That is what he said."] I have just said that he mentioned it. It is right to approach this in a balanced way. There is huge suffering on the Palestinian side, but there are also wholly unacceptable acts of terrorism that kill innocent Israeli citizens, which is why the only way of resolving this is to get back into a proper process of negotiation. As I said, I will make it my personal priority, but the reality is that it will be after the presidential election in the next few weeks before we can make progress.

Q3. [190341] Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may have seen reports that the Fundación Hospital Alcorcón near Madrid, the model for the Government's foundation hospitals, has proved to be a disastrous failure, and that the Spanish Socialist party now plans to take it back into the state sector. Will he look at the Spanish experience and consider abandoning plans for foundation hospitals in Britain?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that I have not seen those reports, but I shall no doubt study them. However, the reason for establishing foundation hospitals is to give hospitals greater freedom to operate within the NHS, because they treat NHS patients. Many hospitals want foundation status because they recognise that in a modern NHS it is important to have a strong measure of devolution, and that is what such hospitals represent.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): The Prime Minister said on Monday that he wants consensus on pensions policy. Age Concern, Help the Aged, the National Pensioners Convention, the National Association of Pension Funds, the CBI, the Institute of Directors, the Conservative party and many of his own Back Benchers all want means-testing to be reduced through a substantial increase in the basic state pension. Will he therefore join that consensus?

The Prime Minister: We have increased the basic state pension, and we have not merely introduced higher basic state pensions but the £200 winter fuel payment, which is awarded on a non-means-tested basis, free TV licences for the over-75s and the £100 payment for all over-70s to help with council tax bills. We have done many things, such as introducing concessionary fares and abolishing hospital downrating, on a non-means-tested basis, but the pension credit—I assume that that is what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is referring to—is necessary to tackle existing pensioner poverty. It is worth pointing out that the amount of money that the Government have spent on pensions is almost double what linking the basic state pension to earnings would have cost in the time that we have been in office. We have—and we make no apology for this—been trying to focus on the poorest pensioners first.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister dismisses out of hand the possibility of joining the consensus that on Monday he was keen to establish. Does he not accept that, after seven years with half of all pensioners caught by the means test—a number that is rising—£35 billion taken out of pension schemes by the Chancellor's pension tax, two thirds of final salary schemes closing to new members and more than 10,000 pension funds winding up since 1997, it is time to stop talking and start taking action? Does the Prime Minister accept, as Adair Turner does in the report that he published yesterday, that means-testing discourages saving?

The Prime Minister: It is correct that the pension credit is calculated on a means-tested basis, but that is the only way in which we are able to get help to the poorest pensioners first. However, we are dramatically increasing the amount of money that is going into pensions, and not only the poorest pensioners but all pensioners have gained advantage from the provisions that we have introduced. We are also doing things for people currently in work who will be pensioners at a later time.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to talk about action. Of course, the Conservatives did act when they were in office. Let me tell him how they acted. When the Tories left office, one in four pensioners lived in poverty. The Tories broke the link with earnings. Today, the Tories go on about linking the basic state pension with earnings as though that had always been their great crusade. The fact is that they broke the link. In 1997, the poorest pensioners were expected to live on only £69 a week. The Tories twice slashed the value of SERPs, introduced VAT on fuel bills, and presided over the pensions mis-selling scandal; and occupational pensions fell, not rose, under the Conservative Government. And who was a Cabinet Minister for 10 of those years? The right hon. and learned Gentleman was. I agree that we need a consensus in taking this issue forward, but he will forgive me if we do not pay too much attention to what he says about it, given his record in government.

Mr. Howard: Pensioner poverty has not in fact declined under this Government. I will tell the Prime Minister what our policies would do. Conservative policies would commit us to taking specific action to deal with the pensions crisis by introducing a bigger state pension, abolishing compulsory annuities, letting companies promote their pension schemes, and operating a proper pension recovery programme.

If the Prime Minister wants a verdict on what he has done, I suggest that he refers to his first Minister for welfare reform, who said:

> "When Labour came to office we had one of the strongest pension provisions in Europe and now probably we have some of the weakest".

If the Prime Minister calls for a consensus but does not build one, and commissions a report but does not act on it, what prospect is there for pensions in this country?

The Prime Minister: It is precisely because we intended to take the final recommendations of the report very seriously that we set up the Adair Turner commission. That came about as a result of a decision by Government. It is not correct that we are doing nothing for people currently in work who will be pensioners. There is the state second pension, which is helping millions of low-paid people to build up a second pension; there is the pension protection fund, including the £400 million that is being paid out to those who have lost their pensions; and there is the Pensions Bill that is going through Parliament, which will simplify the rules and allow people greater flexibility in retirement. We are doing a whole series of things, and we will do more once we get the final recommendations of the Turner commission.

We do not need the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give us his forward policy on pensions, or a crystal ball to tell us what he will do on pensions—we simply need to study what he did on pensions during his years in government. The fact is that the Tory record on pensions was abominable in terms of pensioner poverty, mis-selling and provision for the future. Yes, we will build a consensus, but I rather suspect that it will be without the Conservatives.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) (Lab): The Prime Minister tries to justify the illegal war against Iraq to those of us who opposed it on the ground that if we had not gone to war Saddam Hussein and his two sons would still be in charge of Iraq. How, then, does the Prime Minister explain his statement to this House on 25 February 2003, in which he said:

"even now, today, we are offering Saddam the prospect of voluntary disarmament through the UN. I detest his regime . . . but even now, he could save it by complying with the UN's demand."—[Official Report, 25 February 2003; Vol. 400, c. 124.]?

The Prime Minister: Exactly. We have been saying that the reason for war was the breach of the UN resolutions. That is perfectly consistent. The reason we had to change regime was that it was obvious that Saddam was not going to comply with UN resolutions, and that is what the Iraq survey group found, but it is not correct that we said that the regime was irrelevant. If my hon. Friend goes back to the debate of 18 March 2003, he will see that I described in detail what the regime did. It would be good, perhaps, if we got the same amount of publicity for the report today on the mass grave found in northern Iraq. I will read the details to the House. The person who—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Price, you had better calm down or you will be expected to leave the Chamber.

The Prime Minister: The person who uncovered the mass grave said:

"It is my personal opinion that this is a killing field . . . Someone used this field on significant occasions over time to take bodies up there, and to take people up there and execute them . . . I've been doing grave sites for a long time, but I've never seen anything like this, women and children executed for no apparent reason".

Let me make the position clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing). As we said at the time and as we say now, the legal case for war was breach of UN resolutions. Those breaches have been found specifically by the Iraq survey group. But I said then and say now that the regime was relevant in this sense: such a regime should never have the possibility of having WMD. I said that before 18 March 2003, I said it in the debate then and I say it now. The mass grave is the latest proof of what an appalling regime that was. Just as I have to accept the consequences of the difficulties in Iraq today, having taken the decision to go war, my hon. Friend, Liberal Democrats and others must accept that if they had their way that type of mass murder would still be going on.

Q4. [190342] Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Regularly, before March 2003, the Prime Minister told us that he had plans for post-conflict Iraq, and until recently he believed that there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Did those plans include securing the sites where WMD were kept? Did they include the nuclear sites that have now been looted? Why did those plans not work?

The Prime Minister: They did, of course, include that, which is precisely the work that the Iraq survey group was due to do. They also included plans for humanitarian assistance. I do not believe there was no proper plan for the post-conflict situation. Now, however, outside terrorists and others are trying to disrupt the march to peace and stability that the vast majority of people in Iraq want.

Q5. [190343] Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that businesses in Milton Keynes are right to value the benefits to the British economy of our active membership of the European Union, and that employees are right to value the benefits of the social chapter? In that context, how would he respond to my constituent, Mr. Alex Swanson, a Conservative party member, who wrote that in relation to Europe the Tory party leadership "seem to have suffered a collective failure of nerve so that . . . principles are regarded as an inconvenient impediment to office"?

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): In a remarkable debate on Monday on a Bill that has much to commend it, the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) make an incredibly powerful and important speech. She raised concerns about the Bill, pointing out that it is possible that people in hospital who would otherwise live can have food and water—fluids—withdrawn from them. She also pointed out that the Bill does not sort the problem out. I believe that we in the House should deal with the issue, not leave it to the courts. I do not know the Prime Minister's view—he may want to give us his personal view—but it surely cannot be right in this day and age that the most vulnerable people can be starved or dehydrated to death simply because they cannot speak for themselves. Labour Members do not have a free vote on the issue. Could the Prime Minister please insist that they be given a free vote, so that all of us who share those concerns can resolve the issue in the House?

The Prime Minister: I will carefully examine the issue raised by the right hon. Gentleman, but the Minister made it clear that the Bill does not have that effect. I know that he accepts that the Bill is important, and I will get in touch with him on that specific point. I will re-examine the matter carefully, but the Minister disagrees with that interpretation.

Tenant Obligations and Vetting Arrangements

12.31 pm

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish minimum obligations to be imposed on new tenants; to make provision about the vetting of such tenants; and for connected purposes.

It is fashionable in some quarters to try to paint a picture of our society as one in which crime is out of control. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe it, and it is certainly not the case in my Hall Green constituency—if anything, the reverse is true. All the main indicators show that the men and women of West Midlands police, which is responsible for the operational command unit that covers my constituency, are achieving spectacular results—burglary is at an all-time low, vehicle crime is down, theft is down, and street assaults are down. The truth is that Hall Green has never been safer, but the fear of crime rides high.

Why is that? Antisocial behaviour is the factor above all others that fuels the fear of crime, and it is a constant daily event in the lives of decent ordinary people. The perpetrators have no regard and no respect for others. They include those who destroy property without regard to the cost; those who damage other people's property without regard to the impact on the victim's life; those who threaten and intimidate; those who use loud music as a weapon; those who rev their cars and motor bikes at all hours of the day and night; those who fail to control their children's behaviour; those who hold wild parties night after night; and those whose actions bear no relation to the normal decency that we are entitled to expect in a civilised community. Those people are responsible for the fear of crime and the damage to our communities.

Fear is a terrible thing: it contorts and diminishes people's lives; it makes people afraid to go out and use local facilities; it makes people uncomfortable in their own homes, which they have worked hard for; and sometimes it makes people think that life is not worth living. It takes a huge toll on decent families' daily lives, and nowhere is the problem of antisocial behaviour more acute than in the case of a neighbour who constantly and deliberately behaves so badly that they make their neighbours' lives intolerable.

I am delighted that the Government have introduced legislation that allows tough action to be taken. Such action should, of course, receive cross-party support, and I am saddened and disappointed by the Liberal Democrats' hostile approach.

There are many good landlords in this country, including local authority landlords, housing associations, charitable trusts and private landlords, but there are also landlords who pay far too little attention to the misery that a bad tenant can cause. Those landlords give the impression that, as long as the housing benefit is paid, they do not give a damn. I believe that it is time for all landlords to make it clear that they do give a damn.

The Bill proposes first, the imposition of a minimum set of obligations on all tenants by statute. They should include a signed agreement to pay rent regularly and to maintain the property and any garden in good condition. They should prohibit dumping rubbish that is likely to attract vermin. They should include a requirement to refrain from damaging another neighbour's property or right to enjoyment of their property through antisocial behaviour. Those obligations should be subject to a simple, legal, contractual process, whereby a breach can provide automatic grounds for eviction. They should apply to all tenants, irrespective of the landlord.

Good landlords already insist that tenants should agree to a basic set of obligations. Good landlords have nothing to fear from my proposals because they are already doing their job. If they choose to go further than my basic requirements in the interests of protecting their property and all their tenants, I have no problem with that. My request is for a minimum set of tenant obligations: a basic contractual agreement that a tenant must sign and will have the force of law.

My second request is even more straightforward. When tenants have been evicted because of antisocial behaviour, it is preposterous that they should be rehoused next to a fresh and unsuspecting set of neighbours only to begin again a campaign of abuse, harassment and intimidation.

It is common on many housing estates to come across former council properties that were originally sold under the right to buy but that are often, because of mortgage default or other financial pressures, in the hands of private landlords. Those properties are regularly used to provide houses for people whose previous bad behaviour has led to the loss of a tenancy. Surely the time has come to require all landlords to vet tenants. Surely it is right that some effort should be made to establish where people have come from, their previous tenancy history and the reason for their being in need of accommodation. Would that not be in every landlord's interest? Would that not increase the chances of finding of a tenant who was likely to pay the rent and maintain the property? Above all, would it not reduce the ability of people with a history of bad behaviour to move around different agencies and different areas, leaving in their wake a trail of broken lives and distraught individuals?

I have met some of the people who have been left behind—people who live on anti-depressants because of the constant fear of their neighbours; people who have lost their jobs because they cannot concentrate through lack of sleep; people who are denied the simple pleasure of sitting in their back garden, and, in the worst cases, people who end up with a criminal record because they finally snap and take the law into their hands. That cannot be allowed to continue. Surely the time has come to place a statutory requirement on all landlords to take reasonable steps to vet prospective tenants and ascertain their previous history.

That would prevent the absurd position in my constituency and that of almost every hon. Member whereby people are evicted after a long battle but acquire a new property only a few doors or a few streets away. Imagine how it would feel for people to go through agony, believe that they are rid of an antisocial neighbour who has destroyed their lives for months if not years, only to find that person living four doors away in the full knowledge that their testimony was instrumental in the earlier eviction. Just as the Home

Secretary has responded to the Bichard inquiry[1] by calling for a common-sense approach and sharing of central information, a similar requirement must be imposed on all landlords to share known information about tenants with a bad history. It is time that the Data Protection Act 1998 was used to exchange information sensibly and safely rather than, as is all too often the case, used as an excuse and a shield to hide behind, to prevent information sharing and to evade responsibility.

Finally, if a person has been the victim of a horrible and abusive neighbour, we owe it to that person to ensure that that never happens again. I therefore believe that as part of the vetting process, when an individual or group of neighbours have been the victim of antisocial tenants, those people should be consulted as part of the vetting process before a new tenant is put in place.

Those are simple requirements. They are designed to help good landlords and decent people who want to live in a civilised community. No one who intends to behave in a civilised manner has anything to fear from them; only those who believe that it is their right to abuse and destroy the peace of others should be fearful. Those who need to learn now that we are here to protect the ordinary decent majority and those who do not abide by the rules cannot expect to be accommodated alongside decent, hard-working people.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stephen McCabe, Mr. David Amess, Mr. Adrian Bailey, Mr. Liam Byrne, Mr. Tony Clarke, Mr. Ivan Henderson, Andy King, Siobhain McDonagh, Ms Gisela Stuart, Mr. John Taylor and Mr. Anthony D. Wright.

TENANT OBLIGATIONS AND VETTING ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Stephen McCabe accordingly presented a Bill to establish minimum obligations to be imposed on new tenants; to make provision about the vetting of such tenants; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 15 October, and to be printed [Bill 161].

Point of Order

12.42 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware of comments made by Sir Jackie Stewart this morning to the effect that the 2005 British grand prix will not take place. Given that that will affect hundreds of thousands of fans of the sport, and 40,000 people who are directly employed in the industry, and that it will have a knock-on effect on our chances of hosting similar international events in the future, have you received an indication from the Minister for Sport and Tourism that he will come to the Chamber to make a statement, as he has been commenting at length in the press on the subject?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has put the matter on the record, but I put it on the record that that is not a matter for the Chair.

Opposition Day

[18TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Pensions and Welfare Reform

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the debate on the Opposition motion. I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

12.43 pm

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's continued failure to bring forward proposals to strengthen pensions and savings or to reform the welfare state; takes note of the deeply worrying interim findings of the Turner Commission and of the contrast between the Commission's detailed analysis and the Prime Minister's empty and inadequate rhetoric on pensions and welfare reform; further notes with concern the high levels of economic inactivity; condemns the lack of incentive to make private pension provision and the failure to help 1.7 million people, including many of the poorest pensioners, who are entitled to the Pension Credit but do not receive it; regrets the failure of the Government to address the crisis in state, personal and company pensions; observes that the Pensions Bill is still widely regarded as poorly drafted and that the Pension Protection Fund does not provide the 'guarantee' claimed for it by Ministers; and urges the Government to join the growing consensus of organisations representing pensioners, pension providers, employers and trade unions that the basic state pension needs to be significantly improved and that the spread of means-testing should be reversed so that older people can be assured of dignity and security in retirement.

I draw the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

It has been an extraordinary 10 days, even in the history of this Government's attempts to reform the welfare state and to tackle the pensions crisis. The week began with eager anticipation of what we were told would be a major speech by the Prime Minister on the subject. It was heavily trailed in advance by No. 10. We were told by the The Times that

"Tony Blair will on Monday promise to transform the welfare state in a Labour third term".

The Independent said:

"Tony Blair will set out plans for radical reform of the welfare state today . . . Mr. Blair is likely to announce a far-ranging reform of incapacity benefit."

The Daily Mirror said:

"Tony Blair will signal his return to the political fray next week by launching a 'war on welfare'."

That is what we were told in advance of the speech, so of course the loyal troops of the left-wing think tanks all marched up the hill to hear this great pronouncement, accompanied by the long-suffering lobby, who had been told to expect something big. What they got was

"a vision of a true opportunity society."

That was the great new programme for reforming welfare. I guess that we do want an opportunity society, and 10 years ago the Prime Minister could have got away with just giving us another of his visions, but in the past 10 years we have had "a decent society", "a creative economy", "a stakeholder economy", "a new age of achievement", "a partnership economy", "the third way", "a giving age", and of course my favourite,

"This is no time for soundbites."

We have had pledges and vows and covenants. Notice how the currency gets devalued and these commitments have to get ever more intense. What we have not had, and we did not get on Monday, are any practical policies either to reform welfare or to tackle the pensions crisis. An interesting question is: what went wrong? Why did this much-trailed speech fail to deliver? Explanations are already flying around.

The Blairite explanation is that the Prime Minister was about to deliver a very good speech but the Chancellor got at it. He was just about to do it, but sadly it was copied to the Treasury over the weekend and all the stuff on incapacity benefit was removed by that guy at No. 11. The Brownites say that the Prime Minister does not have the faintest idea what to do, that their man knows what to do, but the Prime Minister has no substance at all.

I welcome the new Secretary of State for what I think will be his first speech in the House in that role, but I tell him that he will have a grim few months of being fought over by the Chancellor and the Prime Minister. It all goes back to that ancient international treaty known to political journalists as the Granita pact, which reserves economic and social policy for the Chancellor. The Secretary of State and his Department are in the position of one of those sad colonial outposts with two great imperial powers clashing over who controls it—one day it is the Chancellor and the next it is No. 10, and the poor Secretary of State is caught between them. The Kremlinologists will want to know when he speaks today whether he does so as the voice of No. 10 or of No. 11.

Meanwhile, as the Government are paralysed in this endless argument between Nos. 10 and 11, what is happening in the real world with the problems of people trapped on incapacity benefit, outside the labour market or worried about the security of their pensions? I shall turn in a moment to the pensions crisis, but as we are also talking about reform of the welfare state, let me refer the Secretary of State to the labour market statistics out this morning, which show that the Government are failing not only on pensions but on the reform of welfare and on tackling the problems of economic inactivity.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that today's figures show that the number of young people under 25 who are not working or studying or training has now risen above 1.1 million? Seven years after the introduction of the new deal, the number of young people out of contact with the labour market and neither working nor studying is as high as it was when Labour came to office in May 1997. The Government have made no progress whatever.

At oral questions on Monday, the Minister for Work—it is good to see her here today—seemed baffled when we cited these figures, and did not seem familiar with a table that Conservative Members have studied closely: table D4 of "Labour Market Trends", which is published monthly. —[Interruption.] I see my hon. Friends nodding. If the Minister studied that table every month, she would see clear evidence that, whatever the Government say about the new deal, it is failing to deliver.

Today's figures also contain new evidence on the number of people who are economically inactive—the number of people outside the labour market altogether. That figure has also hit a record high: 7.93 million, which is the highest figure since 1983, so we do need welfare reform. Even though the Government are bringing down official unemployment as measured according to the number of people claiming unemployment benefits, they are making no progress whatever in tackling the problem of those who are not participating at all in the labour force. If anything, as they reduce the number of people on unemployment benefits, the number claiming other benefits goes up. For example, the number of people on incapacity benefit is going up. That is why it would have been so good to hear some practical proposals from the Prime Minister on Monday.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Should not the hon. Gentleman tell the House the whole story behind these figures? Is it not true that fewer people are now claiming the very benefits that he is talking about? The problem is that the people who ended up on those benefits under the tenure of his Government have lost confidence and it is now very difficult to place them in jobs. The hon. Gentleman should tell the whole story. Is it not true that fewer people are now claiming such benefits?

Mr. Willetts: The whole story is that the number of people on incapacity benefit fell from its introduction in 1995 until 2000. We know what happened in 2000. The Prime Minister had another one of his welfare reforms: he introduced means-testing of new claims for incapacity benefit. We warned at the time what the consequence of that would be. Such claimants, who are vulnerable and on the margins of the labour market, are reluctant to leave the benefit because they fear that if they have to re-claim, they will do so on less favourable terms than before. As a result, the length of time that such people spend on this benefit is going up. That is the problem—the stock of people on the benefit. It is no good simply focusing on the flow on to the benefit if people are remaining on it for longer—or for ever—once they are on it. Under this Government, the average length of time that people spend on incapacity benefit has gone through the five-year mark. That is a scandal. This is why everybody hoped that on Monday, the Prime Minister would offer some practical measures to tackle the problem. He failed to do so.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Adam Price.

Kevin Brennan: I am Kevin Brennan, Mr. Speaker; he is the naughty one.

The hon. Gentleman mentions past warnings that he has given, which presumably include his saying that raising the basic state pension in line with earnings is a wild and uncosted policy. He is a man of logic and he has mentioned the Turner report, which states that the implication of raising the basic state pension is that either taxation or the retirement age will have to go up. Which of those alternatives is the Conservative party proposing?

Mr. Willetts: Let me now turn, then, from the Government's failure to reform welfare to their failure to tackle the pensions crisis. [Interruption.] I will touch on the issue raised.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I give way to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood).

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): I understand political foreplay when I hear it, and the hon. Gentleman is obviously enjoying himself. Now that he has got it off his chest, will he not recognise that the Adair Turner report is a rather special moment in time? It is the next best thing to a royal commission in terms of setting out the extent of the problem, so is this not a sober moment at which we should try to deal with the issues and the context in a more deliberative way, rather than exciting all this party political clap-trap?

Mr. Willetts: Spoken like a true Liberal Democrat! They are so superior, so above the rest of us. I think that it is part of the real Opposition's job to hold the Government to account for what they have done on pensions, and that is what I am doing.

I want to remind Ministers of what they have said in the past, as set against the conclusions of what is indeed a very sober and important report. In the days of the Soviet bloc, one east European country had a law that made it a criminal offence to keep old newspapers. That made it very difficult for people ever to hold any Government to account for what they had promised or done in the past. Fortunately, in this country we can hold Ministers to account for what they have said or done, and I want to remind the Secretary of State of what we have heard from this Government on pensions since they took office in 1997.

In March 1998, a document entitled "New Ambitions for our Country: A New Contract for Welfare" rather rashly set out—I am sure that the Government would not risk this now—what they called their "success measures" for pensions. Success measure 1 states:

> "At the end of the process of reform, there should be a guarantee of a decent income in retirement for all."

Success measure 2 is:

> "An increase in the amount of money going towards savings and insurance, but without increasing the proportion borne by government."

Six and a half years later, we are entitled to ask Ministers how they are doing. Adair Turner's report states:

> "Current state plans and private savings patterns . . . will only deliver a small increase and contrary to the government's stated aspiration, the balance of provision will not shift from state to private savings."

The Government have completely failed to deliver on what they said in March 1998.

[Mr. Willetts]

We then had another attempt, in December 1998: "A New Contract for Welfare: Partnership in Pensions", with a foreword by the Prime Minister. He said:

> "This Green Paper sets out our plans for radical reform of the whole pension system, to rebuild trust and ensure that everyone can look forward to a secure retirement."

He continued:

> "These reforms mean that the total income of pensioners will rise in years to come, mainly fuelled by rising private contributions. Public spending on pensions will rise too in real terms, but less sharply, and will fall as a proportion of national income. This will ensure that the pension system remains both fair and affordable.
> This is our New Insurance Contract for pensions. This Contract will deliver the security we all want, now and for the future."

Six years on, what do we now have in the report that the Prime Minister himself commissioned? We have a completely different picture. It states:

> "In the Green Paper on Pension Reform of 1998"—

the very document from which I quoted—

> "the Government projected that government expenditure on pensions would remain constant as a percentage of GDP, and set a target that the balance of pensioner income should shift from 60 per cent. public: 40 per cent. private to 40 per cent. public: 60 per cent. private. This aspiration is extremely unlikely to be met".

That is what Adair Turner now says about what the Government promised.

It gets worse for Ministers. I do not know whether the Secretary of State has ever read the pensions documents previously produced by his own Government, but I hope that they would cause him at least one or two blushes. The Turner report states:

> "Britain's funded private pension system is in serious decline. The percentage of the workforce covered is not rising and the average level of pension provision is declining."

Yet as recently as December 2002, we had another of these outrageously optimistic documents. It stated:

> "Overall contributions to pension funds increased by nearly 40 per cent. in real terms between 1997 and 2001".

I should tell the Secretary of State that I have a nice collection of letters of apology from previous Secretaries of State. His two predecessors had to write to me to apologise for their mistake in claiming that we are saving more than we really are. Adair Turner's report finally shows that all those assertions were false. It shows that the December 2002 assertion, on which rests the policy that is still being defended, was also false.

What they also said in December 2002 was that > "it has been reported that around a third of FTSE 100 companies have recently moved away from defined benefit provision".

They go on:

> "But this trend should not be overstated. The latest figures suggest that . . . only just over 1 per cent. of defined benefit schemes reported as having closed to new members. And only 0.5 per cent. closed to existing members."

That is what Ministers were saying. What do we now find? It is exactly the opposite. Adair Turner's report published this week states that

> "active membership of open DB schemes in the private sector has fallen by 60 per cent. since 1995."

At last, a dose of reality.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: I see a former Minister wanting to enter the debate. Perhaps he is about to accept some responsibility—it would be a nice change—for some of those extraordinary assertions of the past. I am happy to give way to him.

Mr. Denham: I should like to remind the hon. Gentleman of two points. The first is that the Turner commission clearly concluded that the current problems that we face arise from the "cumulative impact" of the decisions and commitments made, often with unintended consequences, by Governments over "several decades". People outside the House would be interested to know whether the hon. Gentleman accepts his party's share of responsibility for what happened. In particular, will he now accept that when he stood in the 1997 election on the Conservative policy to phase out the basic state pension over the coming years, he and his party were completely and utterly wrong? [HON. MEMBERS: "What?"] Those hon. Members who shouted out "What?" should have read the policy that was advocated by the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) when he was Secretary of State, which was to abolish the basic state pension. They were wrong, and Conservative Members should accept responsibility for it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Willetts: If the right hon. Gentleman wants to debate pensions and the 1997 election, it is about time that we received an apology from Labour Members for the way that they shamelessly misrepresented our views. Pensioners throughout the country thought that they were about to lose their pensions under the policy proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), but that was absolutely not his intention, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows.

I accept, of course, that the serious pensions crisis that we currently face arises from a range of factors. The right hon. Gentleman is quite right about that. Not everything is under the Government's control and not everything is the responsibility of the present Government. I accept that. The evidence in the Turner report shows that it is a complicated story. The fact that Governments cannot control everything makes it even more important that the factors that Governments can control and influence are got right. The trouble with the present Government is that they have made a complete mess of the factors that they do control—the tax regime on pension and the benefit regime on pensioners. That is the case against the Government and the challenge that they face.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: I shall continue, as I was about to tell the House how much I enjoyed reading the new book on the Chancellor by Mr. Tom Bower. It is very illuminating and I strongly recommend it to Labour Members, especially on account of its passages on the pensions crisis and the notorious pensions tax.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): On the subject of commitments given by parties, I seem to recall an interview recorded on Sunday night—I cannot quite remember the punch line—in which the hon. Gentleman was asked to confirm that the only pensioners who would benefit under his proposals were those who did not claim tax credit. Can he please remind me of the conclusion of that interview?

Mr. Willetts: I am afraid that I am not wholly clear about what the hon. Lady is referring to. Is she talking about the Chancellor and the tax credit or the Secretary of State and his pension credit? The Prime Minister gets confused between the two, so I would not be at all surprised if the hon. Lady is confused.

I was talking about the tax credit that people used to enjoy in the pension funds, whereby dividends from British companies did not bear tax, and the Chancellor's decision in 1997 to withdraw it. That is what I am talking about. The discussion about that policy in the book that I mentioned is fascinating. For Labour Members who have yet to decide whether they are Blairite or Brownite, I strongly recommend it. I particularly refer them to pages 222–23, where this crucial incident that affected our pensions so badly is discussed. Under the heading, "The Chancellor and his Tax", it states:

> "To those who warned that his policies would cause permanent damage to savers and pensioners, Brown retorted that the stock market was booming and the funds were now richer than ever"— precisely what Adair Turner describes in the report as "the fool's paradise" of the past.

It continues:

> "'Many pension funds are in substantial surplus', he repeated. It was 'the right time to undertake a long needed reform.' He dismissed any contradictory opinion . . . Blair was urged to restrain the Chancellor."

We learn from the book that the Chancellor originally wanted £8 billion. The report continued:

> "Blair told Brown that everyone agreed that taxing pensions 'was not a good idea.' 'It is a manifesto commitment', replied Brown inaccurately."

We now know that the tax increase was got through by the Chancellor, despite the Prime Minister's concerns, by claiming inaccurately that it had been a pledge in the manifesto.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: Is the hon. Gentleman going to defend that policy? I will be interested to hear it if he is.

Mr. Cunningham: I do not know about defending the policy and I am not going to engage in fairy stories. I do recall that period and I recall going into the House of Commons Library for an independent assessment of the taxing pensions policy. If the hon. Gentleman wants to do his homework, he could get a copy of that document. The argument in favour of the tax was that the profits made from pension schemes were being paid out in dividends rather than being ploughed back into the schemes. How does the hon. Gentleman answer that one? I repeat that it was an independent report.

Mr. Willetts: That was the argument that companies had to be stopped from distributing their dividends because it was bad for investment. It amounts to the constipation theory of investment—the idea that the only way to acquire investment is for companies never to distribute any cash. The whole purpose of having a modern financial system is that companies with a large amount of cash flow can distribute dividends, while others that want to invest can secure funds from the financial markets to do so. There is absolutely no reason to stop companies distributing dividends in order to encourage investment.

Mr. Tom Harris: The hon. Gentleman has previously made clear his opposition to the abolition of tax credit dividends in the past. Can he therefore tell the House when the next Conservative Government will reverse the move? Will it be in the first week, the first month or the first year? I would be most grateful if the hon. Gentleman could tell us that.

Mr. Willetts: We will be publishing our consultation document on tax reform in the near future. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that when it comes to tackling the burden of tax under the Government, we are spoiled for choice in identifying the areas requiring reform. Taxes on pension funds are one of many candidates for reform.

Mr. Tynan rose—

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: I shall give way to the hon. Lady, but then I want to make some progress.

Helen Jackson: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman for nearly half an hour [HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."] and it does not really surprise me that he has made no comment on chapter 8 of Adair Turner's report, which relates to the huge discrepancy between women and men when they reach pensionable age. One thing that the pension credit has done is to help overcome that discrepancy. Failing to acknowledge that aspect of what the Government have achieved in their pensions policy is, I would suggest, a gross mistake from the point of view of any of the women pensioners—or women about-to-be pensioners—who might be watching or listening to the debate.

Mr. Willetts: I accept that that chapter, like every chapter of Adair Turner's report, is well worth studying and I accept that there is a problem about women and pensions. However, I remind the hon. Lady that 1.7 million pensioners who are entitled to the pension credit do not claim it, and many of those are the women whom she fondly imagines the pension credit is helping. The problem with the means tests is simply that many people do not get the help to which they are entitled. That is one of the biggest single objections to the policy.

I now want to make some progress. What have we had from the Government? On Monday we had a grand vision, and on Tuesday a grim reality. What we lack are any policies to connect the Government's vision with the reality contained in Adair Turner's report. It is at this point that we all turn to the Secretary of State. It is his responsibility to be the missing link—

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): The weakest link.

Mr. Willetts: No, not the weakest link. I thought about calling the Secretary of State that but refrained from doing so. He may become the weakest link, but let us hope not.

The Turner report contains some very grim evidence about the seriousness of the pensions crisis. The Secretary of State has that report and a vision from the Prime Minister. His job is to come up with the policies that tackle the problem. For the past 24 hours, he has been using some rather colourful turns of phrase. For example, he said that there is no "fairy dust" or "silver bullet" in this matter. It is as though we all live in a fantasy world and that the Opposition have a fairy-dust policy manifesto. What we want are good, solid, practical policy proposals. That is not too much to ask for, and it is why we produced on Monday our eight-point action plan aimed specifically at tackling the pensions crisis.

In contrast, the Government have asserted that the question is so serious and difficult that they will produce their policies after the next election. Am I right to be just a little suspicious about that approach? I thought that a party put its policies in its manifesto in order to get elected. The idea that a party tries to get elected and then launches policies when in government is not the conventional way of doing things in a modern democracy.

I do not know whether the Government's approach strikes the Secretary of State as a bit odd. Does it mean that he has no idea or policies at all, or that the policies that he has are so unpopular that he dare not reveal them to the electorate before people are able to vote? After seven and a half years of this Government, it is not unreasonable for the Opposition to ask him to put some policies on pensions before the electorate in advance of the next election. That is all that we are asking for, and it would be extremely helpful if the right hon. Gentleman felt able to do so.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: That is especially important as on Monday the Prime Minister had the cheek to say that the Tories did not dare fight the next election on policy or on what they would actually do in government. What about the Prime Minister's own Government, who say that the problem is so difficult that they cannot be expected to produce any policies until after the next election?

Kali Mountford rose—

Mr. Willetts: I will give way to the right hon. Member for Newport, East (Alan Howarth).

Alan Howarth: Does the hon. Gentleman admit that his action plan, which would link the basic state pension to earnings but the guarantee element of pension credit—the old minimum income guarantee—to prices would damage the interests of people on low earnings, most of whom are women? Would not his action plan have the effect of widening inequalities and redistributing wealth from the poor to the better off, and from women to men? Is not that one more example of the modern Conservative party's willingness to let the devil take the hindmost?

Mr. Willetts: I am in a very odd position in this. I understand the arguments about what should happen to the pension credit and whether it should be uprated according to prices or earnings in the next Parliament. I have regularly asked successive Secretaries of State to set out clearly and authoritatively their plans for uprating both the guarantee credit and the savings credit by prices or earnings. As yet, I have never received an authoritative answer and I should be interested in doing so.

I am trying to get the Secretary of State to give us some policies today. Even if he will not do that—and I must say that I think we are entitled to expect some policies—I invite him to accept that there is a serious problem in our pension system and that the successive, complacent assertions made since Labour came into office in 1997 are now "no longer operative", as the former US President Nixon once said of his previous statements. Is the right hon. Gentleman going to abandon all those claims that everything is fine and that there is no need to worry because people are saving so much, and dump them in the bin? If he were to withdraw all the assertions made in previous policy documents and say that there is a serious problem, that in itself would bring a breath of fresh air to the debate.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: I will give way to the hon. Lady, provided that I am not criticised for speaking at too great a length; it is because I am accepting so many interventions.

Mrs. Humble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he accept that the Turner report acknowledges that the problems being described existed 20 years ago? Those include demography, savings and levels of pension. What was the plan of the previous Conservative Government who were in office at that time? Turner makes it clear that the policy changes should have been implemented 20 years ago. Where were the hon. Gentleman and his Government then?

Mr. Willetts: Of course, these are long-term issues. The Government have been in office for seven and a half years now. They have told us endlessly that either there is no problem or that they have marvellous policies on pensions, but Turner makes it clear that there have been significant mistakes since 1997. One of those mistakes has been the mass spread of means-testing, of which the report is very critical.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: No, as I want to make a little more progress.

Even if the Secretary of State is not going to give us any policies today, will he say to the House that he recognises that assertions by previous Secretaries of State in previous policy documents simply no longer apply? Does he accept the overwhelming evidence in the Turner report that we have a serious problem? That is the first thing that I want the Secretary of State to do. The second thing that I want him to do is to accept the need for reform. Does he accept that there is a need to change the current direction of policy?

The evidence about the effects of means-testing contained in the Turner report is very powerful. Turner states:

> "Means-testing within the state system both increases complexity and reduces, and in some cases reverses, the incentives to save via pensions which the tax system creates. The scope of this means-testing would grow over time if current indexation approaches were continued indefinitely."

That is the warning over current policy. Where does the Secretary of State stand in the great argument about whether the pension credit should stay? Does he recognise that we need a different approach in the long term? I am not asking the Secretary of State to abolish the pension credit. We do not propose that: we want the basic state pension to rise in value so that fewer pensioners need to claim the pension credit. However, I am asking whether the right hon. Gentleman recognises that, in this territory, the tectonic plates are shifting. We believe that there is a debate going on in Government about carrying on with mass means-testing. It would be very much appreciated if the right hon. Gentleman were willing to share his thoughts on that subject with the House.

Mr. Heath: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in the real world, the pensioners who are most unhappy are those who receive a modest private pension? They do not qualify for the pension credit, but the state pension is a significant part of their income. Does he agree that they feel neglected and ignored? My concern about the Opposition's proposals is that although they would restore the earnings link with the state pension—which a previous Conservative Government abolished some time ago—the level that is being proposed would be too low. As a result, such a link could never represent the fair deal that many of us want for the pensioners to whom I have referred.

Mr. Willetts: We could try to increase the basic state pension so as to reverse the spread of means-testing in a variety of ways. There are various thoughts about that, and the Liberal Democrat spokesman on these matters, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), has put forward his proposals. We could have a serious discussion about how far and fast we should go, and about whether we should start with older pensioners. My view is that, given the existence of the pension credit, the best way to make progress is to try and increase the basic state pension—especially as there is clear evidence that most pensioners have very modest incomes. There are not large numbers of very affluent pensioners, on whom such a policy would be wasted, so to speak. Only the top 20 per cent. of pensioners have anything like real affluence.

I recognise all the arguments, but the point is that a consensus exists. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition made clear in Prime Minister's questions only an hour ago, that clear consensus is shared by the CBI, the TUC, Age Concern, Help the Aged, the National Association of Pension Funds, the Association of British Insurers and the Opposition. We believe that the way forward is to reverse the spread of means-testing. The Turner report provides further evidence, if any were needed, that that is what needs to be done.

Turner criticises widespread means-testing, and I am asking the Secretary of State whether he believes in mass means-testing or not. It is clear that an argument is going on about this inside Government. For Kremlinologists, the most significant moment in Monday's Work and Pensions questions came when a rather unusual figure arrived. The former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), was in his place, which was a rare honour for Work and Pensions questions. I wondered what he was doing there, but then I realised that it was because of those tectonic plates. The right hon. Gentleman turned up to give a robust defence of pension credit and means-testing. Why on earth would one of the Chancellor's new friends do that?

In fact, the right hon. Gentleman gave a far more robust defence of means-testing than the Minister of State was willing to give at the Labour party conference. The Daily Telegraph said:

> "Malcolm Wicks, the Pensions Minister, has said the controversial means tested pension credit, which tops up the incomes of the poorest pensioners, was 'a short to medium term policy only'".

The exit routes are being prepared. We are now in the extraordinary position that a former Cabinet Minister, who resigned from the Government because he did not agree with the Prime Minister's policies, comes along to Question Time to defend the Government's policies, and meanwhile the Minister responsible for those policies will not even defend them at the Labour party conference. That is a mad way to formulate pension policy.

We want to hear from the Secretary of State whether he agrees with his Minister that means-testing is a short to medium-term policy only. That is the hint we need—a recognition that they cannot carry on like this. We need a different and better approach. The Opposition believe in more incentives for saving, a higher basic state pension and reversing the spread of mass means-testing, which is the belief of the majority of right hon. and hon. Members. I am confident that it is also the belief of the majority of pensioners and other people, and that is why I moved this motion today.

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

> "welcomes the Pensions Report commissioned by the Government; notes that it reinforces the conclusions of the 2002 Green Paper identifying the need for all to work longer or save more; commends the Government's commitment to face the challenges of an ageing society and to tackle inactivity by helping those who want to work; welcomes Pension Credit, benefiting over 3.1 million people, and the state second pension, helping millions build decent second pensions; further welcomes new tax credits making a huge difference to saving incentives for 3 million lower earners; commends steps to restore confidence in pensions through the Pension Protection Fund and the £400 million Financial Assistance Scheme; notes the Government's commitment to tackling age discrimination, and to rewarding those continuing to work after state pension age; believes both main Opposition parties' policies are unaffordable and do nothing for the very poorest; notes that Conservative policies would create a £500 million deficit within four years and be unsustainable in the longer term; commends proposals building on the Government's historic success in tackling pensioner poverty, which will continue to build a pension system with the basic state pension at its core, while still helping the poorest and offering saving incentives for hard-working families."

I was enormously disappointed by that contribution from the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), given the importance of this issue. It was gossip and innuendo. I had some knock-about stuff and I discussed with my officials whether to use it in the debate, but it would be inappropriate. The hon. Gentleman is a competent politician and he can be proud of his experience on these issues. I respect his long record in the area. However, as he was speaking, the old Scottish phrase came to mind, "If he was chocolate, he'd lick himself." There was so much of the clever sixth form debating society approach, which is totally wrong in the context of the report that we received yesterday from the commission.

I welcome the first report of the Pensions Commission. It is probably the single most comprehensive piece of analysis and evidence on the British pension system that has ever been produced. I want to place on record my thanks to Adair Turner and his fellow commissioners for all the work that they have done. I hope that I can say that with the support of the whole House.

I intend to concentrate on two areas. The first is the position that the Government have reached in tackling the problems that we inherited in 1997. The second is the difference that this Government are making now and intend to make in the future through an evidence-based approach, building consensus where we can, to meet the long-term challenges that we face as a society. I am happy to do that not just for pensions, but—in the spirit of the propositions before us—in the wider context of our welfare reform agenda.

In 1997, there were 2.7 million pensioners—almost 30 per cent.—living in absolute poverty. Many were on an income of no more than £69 a week. In addition, one child in every three lived in poverty; numbers on incapacity benefits had trebled; 585,000 adults and 85,000 young people were long-term unemployed; and there were huge barriers to work for disabled people, single parents and older workers. The cold shadow of poverty had been cast across the generations. Disadvantaged children became unemployed adults who eventually entered an impoverished retirement.

The eradication of poverty has been at the heart of our approach to government and nowhere has that been more important than on the issue of pensions. We have lifted 1.8 million pensioners out of abject poverty. The fact that pensioners were in that situation in the first place was the real and immediate pensions crisis that we faced.

We believe that we are also making a real difference to the lives of the 3.2 million individuals who receive pension credit. I accept the points made by the hon. Gentleman about ensuring that those who are entitled to it receive it. That is a different point from saying that the way to tackle that problem is to take pension credit away from everybody. The average pension credit is more than £40 a week, with average arrears more than £1,000. All told, compared with the 1997 system, on average the poorest pensioners are now £1,800 a year better off in real terms. That is a record to be proud of and we should defend it on every occasion.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree with the Minister of State that the pension credit is a short to medium-term solution?

Alan Johnson: I have been invited to comment on that by the hon. Member for Havant and I will get to that question in due course. Hon. Members will have to wait with bated breath.

Mr. Tynan: One of the major issues that has been raised by the Opposition is the fact that 1.7 million pensioners do not claim pension credit. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the longer we continue to talk about means-tested benefits, the more difficult it will be to encourage people to take up their entitlements? Should we not develop a consensus that pension credit is an entitlement, not a means-tested benefit?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Applying for the pension credit is a world away from people's experiences under the previous Government, let alone back in the 1920s and 1930s. People can make a free telephone call. At the other end of the line, a member of the Pension Service staff will do the work. There is no reassessment every week. Indeed, once the settlement is made it lasts for five years, and no prying questions are asked about irrelevant details of pensioners' incomes. We have to get the message across to all pensioners that it is an easy process. However, we should not talk in euphemisms. It is a means test. We want to target resources at the poorest. Our argument is that we could not tackle the terrible crisis of pensioner poverty that we inherited when we came to government without such an approach, and we should not be ashamed of that.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): The Secretary of State mentioned the situation that the Government faced when they came to office in 1997. However, he will be aware that after seven years of a Labour Government one in five pensioners in Scotland still lives in poverty. Does he accept that the only way to end that scandal is to move away from means-testing and to introduce a decent basic state pension?

Alan Johnson: I do not accept that at all. In a sense, it is the response to the question from the hon. Member for Havant about how long means-testing should continue. It is a fair question, but in my view we have to target resources at the poorest pensioners, precisely because some still live in poverty, as the hon. Lady points out, in Scotland and the other parts of the UK. However, to suggest that the solution to that is a higher basic state pension is a delusion. It is a delusion mainly because 50 per cent. of women do not have the national insurance contributions that would get them even to the level of the basic state pension. I shall say more about the basic state pension, which is important, but to suggest that it can provide a simple answer to abject pensioner poverty is a delusion.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): Given the centrality of the means-testing issue, it is perfectly reasonable that we discuss it, but does my right hon. Friend agree that it is also fair that we judge the comments of the Opposition by their record in office? Will he confirm my understanding that the decision to break the link between earnings and pensions in 1980 resulted in the basic state pension being £26 lower in 1997 than it would otherwise have been? Is not it reasonable to use that point to test the validity of Conservative criticisms?

Alan Johnson: It is wholly reasonable to point that out. It is also reasonable to point out that the hon. Member for Havant said that a return to the earnings link had not been properly costed and would leave a hole in the public finances.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The Secretary of State made the perfectly correct point that simply putting up the state pension, while it continues to be based on contributions, will be prejudiced against women. The weekend newspapers reported that the right hon. Gentleman was rather positive about the idea of a citizenship pension based on residence rather than on contributions. Can he give us a sense of his approach to that? Does he have an open mind? Is he positive about it or does he rule it out?

Alan Johnson: I have an absolutely open mind, veering towards being very positive about it. That is as much as I can say at present.

The issue is how to tackle the problem that we want women to undertake caring responsibilities while their national insurance contributions cannot possibly match up, bearing in mind the fact that retirement age for women will move from 60 to 65. There is a real argument for me to look carefully at that matter—

Mr. Willetts rose—

Alan Johnson: But first I shall listen to the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

Mr. Willetts: I just wanted to check on what the Secretary of State said when he talked of going from an open mind to being positive. Is he saying that he no longer believes in contribution additions and the contributive principle and that we shall be going over to a different basis for pensions? He has just said something very significant.

Alan Johnson: Of course I said something significant. This is a policy debate and I try as much as possible to give straight answers to straight questions. The universal pension idea is really interesting and deserves much closer examination, which is, incidentally, why, during the passage of the Pensions Bill, my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions accepted the suggestion that we have a separate report on women next year, to supplement the chapter in the Turner report.

As I said to the House on Monday, we have not merely helped the poorest pensioners. There seems to an idea that lots of money is going to the poorest pensioners and that pensioners who are not as poor receive no additional help from the Government—a point made in an intervention. That is unfair criticism. We have helped all pensioners. Compared with the 1997 system, the average pensioner—not the average poorer pensioner—is £1,350 a year better off, with an extra £5 billion being spent this year on universal benefits. Let us consider, for example, a single pensioner, over 80, living alone but with a very good private pension and a full basic state pension, who would thus not be entitled to any means-tested benefits. To return to the point that putting the earnings relationship back into the basic pension would solve the problem, such an uprating would give her £9.90 extra a week. Instead, this year, as a result of our reforms, she has a basic state pension that has increased in real terms by 7 per cent. since 2000, a £300 fuel allowance—tax-free, of course—and a free TV licence worth £121 a year. That adds up to a gain of £13.55 a week, so even that pensioner, who would not qualify for pension credit, has set aside some savings and receives a full state pension, would be £3.55 a week better off than if we had simply restored the earnings link.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that by proposing to increase the basic state pension, but not extending the increase to other pensioners, and retaining the means-tested minimum income guarantee, the Opposition would in fact be retaining means-testing, with all the pressures that involves for the poorest and most vulnerable pensioners, especially women? As he said, the real issue is the universality of pension entitlement and that is clearly reflected in the report.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is right. I shall come on to some other aspects of the policy of Her Majesty's official Opposition, but that point is important. If we were to go down the route they suggest, the poorest pensioners would start to fall back again—from 21 per cent. of average earnings to 16 per cent. In the main, those people do not have a hugely influential voice in society and sometimes that is the problem in debates such as this. However, they are individuals, they live in all our constituencies and they are entitled to continue the advance in addressing poverty that we have begun.

Helen Jackson: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the pensioners we are talking about often make some of the greatest contributions to society and to the health of their neighbours and families? Part of the reason why they are left at pensionable age with no proper means of support is that they have had caring responsibilities, perhaps for more than one person.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is right. It is healthy that we are spending some time talking about such individuals. In the main, they are elderly widows who depend on their husband's national insurance contribution record. It was impossible for them to put in the full number of pensionable years. They have not been left in poverty because they were frivolous or because they did not try hard to put money to one side; it is due to the circumstance that they were bringing up our generation. That is a really important point.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Although it is clearly true that large numbers of poorer women could not achieve the full insurance record because they were caring for others, many other women took the married women's option when they could have paid a full contribution, so would not my right hon. Friend's life be easier if we had had a little more compulsion in those days? If everyone who could have done so had paid those contributions, he would not have to make the judgment of Solomon by trying to decide which groups are more deserving.

Alan Johnson: I accept that if some decisions made in the past had been different my life would have been easier. However, my life is not easier and I am in the current situation.

Even those people who are not receiving targeted support can be significantly better off through our help for all pensioners than they would be through the simple earnings link. The proposals of the hon. Member for Havant to restore that link are unfair to the poorest pensioners, for the reasons I have stated, and their relative position would worsen. His proposals would also impose an unsustainable burden on future generations. Even on his own figures, which I got straight from Conservative central office, a £500 million funding gap would develop in year 4, if there were a four-year Parliament; by year 5, the situation would be worse. That is another reason to question the policy.

How would a future Conservative Government—if there were one—pay for those proposals? The hon. Gentleman said that he would abolish the of the new deal. That is the new deal which has helped nearly 1 million people to find work and increased our gross domestic product by £500 million a year. That includes the new deal for young people, without which, according to independent evaluation, youth unemployment would be almost twice as high as it is at present.

We believe that work is the best benefit that Government can provide. As this morning's labour market statistics show, we have a record number of people in work, with a further increase of 220,000 in the last quarter. Also germane to the debate and the Turner report yesterday is the fact that those statistics show that the growth in employment among people aged 50 and over—a crucial part of the equation—has been faster than average. Since 1997, employment among older workers is up by nearly a quarter, and 1 million people are already working beyond the state pension age. This morning's statistics bring good news in relation to the messages that Turner gave to us yesterday.

We have increasingly focused support on the most disadvantaged groups: lone parents, those previously written off to become the passive recipients of incapacity benefits, and disabled people. We have removed the barriers for disabled people in particular, with much resistance from Conservative Members, especially in respect of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. That Act, together with the measures that will be included in the disability discrimination Bill, will radically address the great emancipation issue of our time: civil rights for disabled people.

Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend has just discussed the plans of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) to finance his policy, but my right hon. Friend did not mention that, in abolishing the new deal, the hon. Gentleman would of course abolish the new deal for lone parents. Is the hon. Gentleman not planning to discriminate against women three times over? He would freeze the guarantee element of pension credit, which mainly benefits women; he would concentrate the resources on the basic state pension, from which all too many women do not benefit; and he would fund the increase in the basic state pension by abolishing the new deal for lone parents, which is the policy that helps women into work and to build entitlement to a pension.

Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friend makes an absolutely superb point. Incidentally, the latest figure for single parents in work is up to 54 per cent., whereas, in 1997, unlike any other European Union country, we had a deep-seated problem with lone parents stigmatised by certain elements of the previous Government—not the hon. Member for Havant, who apologised for the stigmatisation of lone parents under the previous Government.

We should also acknowledge the fact that we have seen the first small reduction in the number of those who have received incapacity benefits for a long time. The figure is down by 4,000 on last year. That decrease is probably statistically insignificant, but the number has levelled off for the first time in many years. If the trend for people to go on to incapacity benefit under the previous Government had continued, 4 million people would now be claiming incapacity benefit—1.3 million more than the current figure.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the pathways to work pilot shows an increase in the number of people who are coming off incapacity benefit and going into work? If the Government are allowed to continue with that project and it is not put at risk by the Conservative party, there will be a big downturn in the number of people who receive incapacity benefit.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. On Monday, I announced to the House the very positive early findings of our groundbreaking pathways to work project. We are already seeing improvements in recorded job entries for people in pathways to work areas throughout the country. The number of people going into jobs is twice the average. There is also a sixfold increase in the number of people taking up new deal programmes and training for work. That is another significant development.

In fact, the pathways to work project is proving so successful that, as I also mentioned on Monday, people who have been on incapacity benefit for more than a year—the experiment relates to that cohort—are knocking down our doors to take part in the project.

They are saying that they have been left for years with no help, and they view the project as a significant step forward. So the Government have made a huge difference to millions of lives across the country, by acting across the whole welfare reform agenda, to tackle the pernicious problems that we inherited in 1997.

We are proud of the fact that we have lifted 700,000 children above the poverty line, virtually eradicated youth unemployment, transformed disability rights, halved unemployment and cut pensioner poverty by two thirds, but we need to go further. There is no bigger long-term challenge for domestic policy than that highlighted by yesterday's Turner report. There is no area of domestic policy in which there is a better case for examining the evidence in detail, avoiding knee-jerk reactions—as Adair Turner virtually pleads with us to do, as politicians—and working towards a plan for the long term. I hope that there is at least consensus on the approach urged on us by the Pensions Commission.

I want to concentrate on what the Government are doing to meet the challenges set out in the commission's report and to talk about how we intend to move towards a long-term, evidence-based approach that seeks to attract the consensus for which the commission pleaded. The report builds on the analysis of our 2002 Green Paper, which showed that many people ought to be saving more or working longer if they want to realise the kind of lifestyle to which they aspire in their retirement. Although the report deliberately does not draw conclusions at this stage, it emphasises that more people choosing to work for longer must be a crucial part of the response to longer lives. That is a difficult message. There were many difficult messages for politicians on both sides of the House, individuals and employers, but it is right that we address the issues that Turner raises in that analysis.

We believe that, given our age discrimination legislation, we are already committed to giving people greater opportunity to work for longer if they wish to do so. Crucially, in the Pensions Bill, we are increasing the rewards for working beyond state pension age. Our policy of state pension deferral will increase the increments for deferring to 10.4 per cent. a year, which will produce a basic state pension of about £120 for someone deferring until 70. Under measures in the Finance Bill, for the first time people will be able to continue to work while drawing an occupational pension from the same employer. That is an important contribution as well.

Of course, part of any increase in average retirement ages can come from increasing employment rates before state pension age. Our problem at the moment is that two thirds of men are out of the employment market by the time they reach 62, let alone 65. The report shows that those employment rates are rising, so there is cause for optimism. The rates have increased by 8 per cent. in the past 10 years, but the report says that they "could rise significantly more". So the Government are already taking steps to maximise the possible impact of people choosing to work for longer. Helping people to build up pensions is the other half of the equation.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Alan Johnson: I will give way in a second.

A crucial reform that has been barely mentioned in any of the coverage that I have seen is that, under the state second pension, for the first time women, carers, the long-term disabled and others with incomplete contribution records—to return to the problem that we were talking about earlier—are no longer losing out on building up rights to the state pension. The state second pension is up to twice as good as its predecessor—the state earnings-related pension scheme—so 20 to 30 years down the line, pensioners could retire with double what they would get under the basic state pension.

Mrs. Lait: I interrupted the right hon. Gentleman when I did because I thought that he might move on to the private pension sector. Before he does so—I accept entirely both Adair Turner's point about not rushing into hasty decisions and the right hon. Gentleman's agreement with that statement—will he say whether he is considering whether to raise the state pension age above 65 and, if so, whether that will happen before 2010, or after 2020?

Alan Johnson: I have said—my predecessor said this, but I will say it again—that Government policy is not to insist that people have to wait until they are 70 before they draw their state pension. We will have the debate, but our view is that people should have the choice. We should offer the inducements in terms of the increment to the weekly pension and the lump sum of between £25,000 and £30,000. However, if we insisted that people had to wait until they were 70 before they got their state pension, many people—who had spent their lives in heavy industry, who are not as healthy and fit as the rest of us and who cannot look forward to the longevity that, as Turner pointed out, actuaries underestimated in the past—would have short lives on their state pensions. The choice agenda may unite us in consensus. It is important not to introduce a level of compulsion in the age at which one draws the state pension.

Kali Mountford: Choice is better made when informed. Given the announcement that my right hon. Friend made at the Labour party conference, would he inform the House further on his ideas about how people can be better informed about the choices that they make and at a much earlier stage in their employment, so that their retirement can be comfortable?

Alan Johnson: I will come to my hon. Friend's point in a second. It is crucial to what will be the major aspect of the second report from the commission, which is whether there should be compulsion. Informed choice is important to that.

We believe that there is real potential—in fact, I come to my hon. Friend's point straight away—in revitalising the voluntary private approach. The newspapers erroneously said last weekend that I had ruled out compulsion in respect of whether to contribute to private pensions. I did no such thing; I have an open mind on the issue. I will wait for the Turner commission report. However, it would be strange to move to compulsion without properly exploring the voluntary private approach. It must be right to consider that further.

[Alan Johnson]

To that end, we are already pursuing policies that seek to restore confidence in private pension saving, create greater incentives for people to save and activate people to take advantage of the provision that is already there, making decisions based on clear, tailored information. The informed choice agenda and trying to wipe away the complexity that Adair Turner rightly identified as inherent in our pension system are issues that we must approach.

I would like to finish by saying a few words about each of those three aims: restoring confidence, creating greater incentives for people to save and activating people to take advantage of the provision that is already there.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The Secretary of State has said that he likes to try to give straight answers to straight questions. He also promised to answer before he sat down the question that I asked him earlier about whether he agrees with the Minister for Pensions that the pension credit is a short to medium-term solution.

Alan Johnson: I try to give straight answers to straight questions, but that does not mean that I always succeed. My view, which I mentioned earlier, is that the pension credit and means-testing should be there until we have solved the problem of abject pensioner poverty. It should not be the only part of our solution and divorced from a decent basic state pension, but it must remain a part of it. My hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions rightly asked, as Adair Turner asks in his report, whether we are planning to continue the policy indefinitely. I can say that there are no such plans to continue it indefinitely, but it has a role to play. I do not think that it has solved the problem of pension poverty yet. That is why we need to do more.

I return to the three aims that I mentioned earlier. First, it is critical that pensions are secure and it is crucial that they represent good value. Having cleared up the mess of mis-selling that we inherited, we went on to develop a groundbreaking approach to bringing security to members of final salary schemes who were losing their pensions when their company became insolvent and their pension scheme was wound up. I refer to the pension protection fund.

Next we had to act to protect employees whose accrued rights had been cut while working for solvent employers by introducing full buy-out regulations so that trustees can require a solvent employer who wants to wind up their pension scheme to buy out members' rights in full. We also need to implement the new Sandler pensions, which can be bought without expensive advice and with fees cut by one third compared with the old personal pensions. These and other changes in the Pensions Bill, which is currently in the other place, are crucial contributions to the pensions challenge. They will make a real difference, both now and in the future, to restoring confidence in pension saving and ensuring that pensions are secure and represent good value.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that issues such as the Turner and Newall pension fund are highly complex, but such events shatter confidence in pensions generally—both public and private. Although we should consider ways to ensure that such things do not happen again and protect those funds, is not the key long-term aim ensuring that those funds do not stand a risk of failing in the first place? Will he ensure that that message is taken forward not just for the individual cases that we seen so far, but for the totality of pension provision in the public and private sectors for the future?

Alan Johnson: I will, indeed. I understand my hon. Friend's concern about Turner and Newall. We picked up the recommendations in the Pickering report on the regulator's role, and that is another central element of the Pensions Bill.

As well as greater confidence, we need a revitalised voluntarism, and that means people need incentives to save. We are therefore, first, radically simplifying the taxation of pensions by replacing the existing eight separate taxing regimes, which are placed on top of each other, with one single lifetime allowance. That measure appears in the Finance Bill and has been widely welcomed. Secondly, we are also giving firms tax exemption on up to £150 worth of advice for each employee each year. Thirdly, for about 3 million lower-income working adults who are on the new tax credits, our reforms mean, as Adair Turner has pointed out, that they get 37p extra tax credit for every pound that they contribute to a pension.

Revitalised voluntarism means activating people to take advantage of what is already there. On this, we appear to have unanimity and consensus with the two Opposition parties. The commission pointed out that 4.6 million people work in companies in which the employer makes a contribution to their pension, but they have not joined the pension scheme. I cannot believe that that is a matter of informed choice. If it is, that is fine, but it is not and we need to find measures to deal with it. For example, auto-enrolment was one snappily titled approach. Its name does not send the blood pulsing through the veins, but it is an important contribution to that debate. We set out other issues that we think are essential to take forward in our Command Paper on informed choice. We are also taking steps to give people clear, tailored information about the choices they face today in relation to their prospects for retirement.

As a society, we need to end the head-in-the-sand culture, and the Pensions Commission report, uncomfortable as some of its evidence is for all of us, provides a major contribution. I will take the rap for the phrase "a pouch of fairy dust", but I believe that Adair Turner needs to take the rap for the phrase that there is no single magic bullet to solve the longer-term pensions challenge. However, the Government will build on the difference that we have already made in tackling the pernicious evil of pensioner poverty. We will build on the differences that we are making now in increasing the opportunity and rewards available from working longer, radically bolstering confidence in pension saving, enhancing incentives to save and empowering people to be able to make informed decisions about planning for retirement.

Just as we have evolved the state system in the past, so we will in the future. However, this evolution will be based on evidence and consensus where possible, and it will ensure that we strike the right balance between tackling pensioner poverty, helping all pensioners and ensuring the right incentives to save. I believe that yesterday's Turner report has really helped us with that debate. I look forward to engaging with the issues further over the weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The new Secretary of State is a breath of fresh air and I hope that his candour will not diminish in direct proportion to his length of service in office. He said something important and significant this afternoon, as the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) pointed out, and his contribution raised the tone of the debate from an argument about whose fault it is that we are in such a mess to one about how we will sort it out, which is what the focus of today's debate should be. I salute him for performing an important service for the House by taking us away from the puerile debate about who said what to whom and whose agenda we should pursue towards a consideration of how we will serve the needs of today and tomorrow's pensioners. I shall engage with him on the citizenship pension because it is an important way to reflect on where we might go from here.

The Conservative party initiated the debate and its motion outlines some of its proposals for reform, so it is appropriate for me to begin by examining what it says. We tabled an amendment to the Conservative motion because although we did not object to anything in it, there was an important omission. The Conservatives consistently and repeatedly fail to recognise the problems of women in the pension system. If hon. Members read the motion, although I trust that they have better things to do, they will discover that it makes no specific reference to the pension position of women.

I suspect that I am alone in the House in that I listened to the entire conference speech made by the hon. Member for Havant, but I heard no explicit reference in it to women's pension problems. Perhaps the most damning thing of all is that although the Conservatives have come up with an eight-point plan to tackle the pensions crisis, and despite the fact that the majority of pensioners are women and a greater majority of the poorest pensioners are women, that plan makes no mention of women's pension problems. When challenged on the issue, the hon. Gentleman says, "Yes, we must have a think about that." The problem is important, so he should not think that something should be done about women after the plans have been drawn up. The problems for pensioners will not be solved unless the problems facing women pensioners are tackled, so the Conservative party's consistent failure to address the matter represents a glaring omission. I think that the hon. Gentleman is aware of the problems, so I am disappointed that he has not come up with any concrete solutions.

The right hon. Member for Newport, East (Alan Howarth) highlighted the fact that simply linking the present national insurance contributory pension to earnings at its present inadequate level in proportion to what people are already getting is a policy of giving less money to women. We would start from a position in which women get less and reinforce our plans to tackle that problem with a link to earnings. I hope that the Conservative party will come up with proposals to tackle the problems, but they have been sadly lacking from the debate so far.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that a link to earnings will not solve all the pension problems. Where do the Liberal Democrats stand on the link? Do they believe that it should be made, or will they omit it from next year's election manifesto?

Mr. Webb: I can give the right hon. Gentleman a clear answer to that question. The first point in our first Parliament plan is a proposal to link the pension for over-75s to earnings. We intend to do that on the basis of a pension paid to citizens, rather than a contributory pension, as a result of which women will benefit equally to men rather than in proportion to their contribution records. When we extend that pension from the over-75s to all pensioners, it is our intention that the citizenship pension will be linked to earnings. It is almost a quarter of century since the earnings link was broken and the state pension has become devalued to such an extent that increasing it to a credible level and linking it to earnings in one go would simply not be plausible, so we have reluctantly had to prioritise people. We will start with older pensioners, who tend to be women and the poorest pensioners.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): The hon. Gentleman says that the pension will be paid regardless of contributions. Would that not lead to the anomaly that women who had worked and opted to pay the full contribution would be no better off than those who opted to pay the lower married woman's contribution? Would that be fair?

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman makes a perfectly fair point on which I can reassure him. One of the advantages of our phased approach is that women who retired today would receive an enhanced pension for the next 15 years because of their additional contribution. By the time that we extended the pension from over-75s to all pensioners, the married woman's stamp would have worked its way through the system because as he will know, no new women have been able to opt to pay that stamp since 1977. There would be a transitional problem with the system, albeit one that would last for perhaps a decade or more, but women who paid the full stamp would continue to benefit from that. We think that we must begin to end the penalty on caring that is inherent in a contributory system.

The Secretary of State referred to the funding hole in Conservative proposals. Just as the electorate will not accept the Government saying, "Mr. Turner will come up with the answers next summer, so vote for us and we'll implement them", they will not accept the fact that the Conservatives promise money for pensions without being clear about where it will come from. To be fair to the hon. Member for Havant, he has produced a document including tables and figures to show how the money will be found. One of my colleagues asked me the other day how the Conservatives were being allowed to get away with such implausible costing of their policies, so I thought that it was about time that we had a little look at them—believe me, I know something about that subject. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will contradict me at each step if I make a mistake.

[Mr. Webb]

The Conservatives propose that £7 will go on the pension on the basis of a real earnings growth of 2 per cent. The hon. Gentleman has costed his proposals and said that if real earnings grow at 2 per cent throughout the next Parliament, he will be £180 million short, although that is actually a gross understatement. However, as the Secretary of State said, there would be a cumulative problem. When the hon. Member for Havant scraps the new deal, he will give himself £600 million in year 1, which is far more than he needs, but although he will still receive £600 million in years 2, 3 and 4, the cost of the policy will rise every year. Although he will have nearly £500 million more than he needs in the first year, he will have £500 million less than he needs in the fourth year. His policy suffers from a structural lack of funds. He would be £180 million short over a Parliament at the very least, but in the final year of a four-year Parliament, he would have introduced a structural deficit of £500 million. Where would the money come from? I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman would intervene on that point.

Mr. Willetts: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was being rhetorical, although come to think of it he is never rhetorical. We have set out clear figures on offsetting savings through means-tested benefits, on savings involving the new deal and on savings from changing the rules on income support for lone parents, which would enable us to finance our policy throughout the first Conservative Parliament. I set out in the document—no one has challenged any of the figures in it—that as long as we can continue to identify savings, which I am confident that we can, we will keep on going. I think that that is a more serious attempt to cost a policy than his proposal of simply abolishing the Department of Trade and Industry. If we are talking about who has bitten the bullet on what must be done to finance a policy, the pot is now calling the kettle black.

Mr. Webb: It took a moment to get that response from the hon. Gentleman, but I note that he did not query the £180 million shortfall—perhaps I should call it the pots and kettles black hole. He did not do that because the Conservatives admit to that deficit, but the figure is far too small. He says that he will offset savings through means-tested benefits, of which I have taken account, but there are two other ways in which he will pay for his policy, although that will leave him £180 million short.

First, the hon. Gentleman will scrap the new deal, which will provide £600 million every year, but I thought that the Conservatives said at their conference that they would replace it with a scheme through which charities and private companies would help people to get jobs. Will they do that for nothing? Where will the money come from to pay for that after the new deal is scrapped?

Mr. Willetts: A year ago, we set out in a document our policy on pensions and how that will be financed. I stand by the figures and no one has shown that they are wrong in any way. In the past few weeks, as a result of the exercise conducted by the James committee, further savings in the Department for Work and Pensions budget have been identified, so we will use some of those savings to finance the work-first policy that I launched at the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Webb: Such as?

Mr. Willetts: If it is not on our party's website, I am happy to send the hon. Gentleman the James committee report, which investigated the Department for Work and Pensions and identified further and different savings from the one that I used a year ago to finance our policy.

Mr. Webb: It is good to hear that the Conservatives are not going to use savings in other Departments to pay for their spending plans.

We have the new deal proposal and will have a closer look at where the alleged savings will come from, but another line has received almost no scrutiny whatever. The hon. Gentleman will say that there will be £100 million in the first year, £200 million in the second year, £300 million in the next year and £400 million in the year after that—nice round numbers—by requiring the lone parents of teenagers to look for jobs.

I suspect that most of us would not have a problem with the idea that lone parents whose youngest child is now a teenager should be thinking about the labour market, but where will the £400 million come from? It is necessary to make—dare I say it—heroic assumptions. The hon. Gentleman is assuming that half the lone parents whose youngest child is a teenager will get jobs. I do not know whether he has assumed that they will not get tax credits, or whether he has allowed for that. I do not know whether he has assumed that when they get a job, the person who would otherwise have got that job then goes on to benefits. Has he netted any of that off, or are they fantasy figures?

It is one thing to say that the Conservatives will give £7 a week to pensioners—although less to women—but it is another thing to make the figures up as the hon. Gentleman goes along. They are far less plausible than such documents give us reason to believe.

Mr. Willetts: The figures are cautious. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the evidence on the distribution of lone parents on income support by age of child, he will be surprised, as I was, at the number of lone parents on income support who have older children of secondary school age. I expected to find the figures bunched, with most of the lone parents on income support being parents of young children. That is not the case.

The labour force participation of lone parents is still much lower, even when their children are older, than mothers in couples. There is clear evidence from research at the London School of Economics that the best outcomes for the children of lone parents, especially the daughters, are if the parent is in contact with the labour force when the child is of secondary school age. We have made relatively modest assumptions for the savings once we take into account the large number of lone parents who have secondary age children.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Although I am enjoying the interchange, I remind the hon. Gentleman that it is an intervention.

Mr. Webb: It was an interesting intervention, which highlighted the extent to which the numbers behind the Conservative pension plans have not been explored—apart from by me, of course.

In a sense, I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman. There are good reasons to think about whether the lone parents of teenage kids should have closer contact with the labour market, but if it is in their interests, we must ask ourselves why the lone parents are not already getting jobs. Is it because there are barriers, such as child care, which simply requiring them to look for jobs does not overcome? Is it because some of them are in parts of the country where the labour market does not work well, so requiring them to look for work does not give them jobs?

Many lone parents of teenage children are probably in the wake of relationship breakdown. That may be a significant number of people. Do we want to put pressure on people who have just got divorced or separated and who are finding life difficult by telling them that we will take their money away unless they start looking for a job on day one? There are many unanswered questions and assumptions that have not been probed. I hope that we will have the chance to do that nearer to the election.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I am listening with interest and the hon. Gentleman makes a powerful point about Conservative policy. In terms of lone parents, will he also bear it in mind that the labour force participation rate is 54 per cent.? Most lone parents are women. The labour force participation rate of women is approximately 72 per cent., so there is not much room for pushing up participation and there will be costs associated with it, as he points out.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman raises a fair point about how far we can go with such a policy. One gets the feeling that the figures have been plucked from the air. I almost wonder whether the £400 million was the difference between the two numbers and was what was required.

Let me make just a couple of other observations on the Conservative approach. I listened in full in a studio to the speech by the hon. Member for Havant. The rhetoric was credible and convincing. He gave a realistic description of the problems. He has likened the pensions crisis to global warming and the war on terror. He is trying to tell us how serious he thinks it is. However, it is clear from the eight-point plan that it is a good job that we are not relying on him to deal with global warming because we would already be flooded. It is so limited in scope. There is a huge problem and what are the Conservatives going to do? They are going to give people £7, if they are lucky, by the end of a Parliament, still leaving the basic state pension £18 below the poverty line. How does that address the scale of the problem?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has spent about a quarter of an hour mainly analysing the Conservative proposals. We are meant to be discussing Adair Turner's commission, which warns us all that the proportion of people aged 65 or over will double between now and 2050. As I understand the Liberal approach, it is to abandon the contributory principle on pensions, extend pensions entitlement wider than it is now, raise the value of the basic pension for everyone as soon as possible, and link it to earnings thereafter. Does he think that that is facing up to the difficulties of the challenge we face? Has he given any thought at all to the appalling level of unfunded obligations that he proposes to land on our children and grandchildren if the Liberals are ever let loose on the subject?

Mr. Webb: One of the ways in which the world has moved on since the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a senior Minister is that in those days future liability was a price-linked unfunded basic state pension and a price-linked unfunded means-tested system. We have moved to a situation in which, on current policies, we have an earnings-linked means test, which will apply to between three quarters and four fifths of all pensioners. If that is the current projection—

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Which is unaffordable.

Mr. Webb: That policy is projected to involve a modest increase in the share of national income going to pensioners. That is the projection of the Government's policy. If we are to have a system in which four fifths of all pensioners have to jump through a means test and have an earnings-linked income at the end, a policy of one decent earnings-linked pension—perhaps thought incredible at the end of the '80s—becomes a mainstream sensible approach, which as the Conservative leader said at Prime Minister's questions is becoming part of the wider consensus.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose—

Mr. Webb: I have huge respect for the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but he has criticised me for spending too long on his party and I want to make one further observation.

The hon. Member for Havant makes the proper point that as well concentrating on state systems, we have to think about incentives for private savings. He proposes the lease of a lifetime savings account. As I understand it, he is saying that the answer to the problem of people not saving enough for pensions is an instant access savings account. In other words, the Conservatives would establish an account that people can use in any way they like—to put money in or to take money out—and that that will solve the pensions crisis.

As someone who is just under 40, the idea that folk in my age group would put money into such an account and leave it in the hope that it will one day become a pension is implausible because without a tie-in we could take the money out at any time. The hon. Gentleman says that the carrot is that the Government will put money in if we leave the account untouched, but where would that money come from? Are the Conservatives going to touch pension tax relief? No. Are they going to touch rebates in the short term, because this is a short-term policy? Not as far as we know. So where would the money come from for the incentive to save? The hon. Gentleman stands up and says, "Buy one, get one free" and tells us to bog off—he said that to me mainly—but he has never said where the Government money would come from. It is another uncosted implausible Tory pension proposal.

The hon. Gentleman is an expert in these matters. We share many platforms and agree on many things. He carries great credibility with him. However, when one examines what he says, it is full of holes. The House and the country deserve a better alternative, which I shall set out, to the Government's policies.

Miss Begg: Before the hon. Gentleman moves on, in the light of what he said about providing a basic state pension for everyone regardless of their contributions, how much does he estimate that that will add to the global sum paid out to pensioners in future?

Mr. Webb: We have costed our policy, including the citizenship component, the earnings link and the £25 for the over-75s, at roughly £3 billion year. The cost of the citizenship component is relatively modest, although it would increase over time as we extend it to more people. On the other hand, as the Turner commission says, some trends in women's pensions are going the right way, which means that in the medium term women's contribution records will improve anyway. The additional cost of filling the gap in the citizenship pension will therefore fall. The cost of the citizenship component is not huge, but it is an important way of valuing carers' work and so on. It is important to increase the £80 weekly pension to £105, as a huge shortfall has been allowed to develop.

Kali Mountford: I have enjoyed the hon. Gentleman's speech so far, and am glad that he is moving on to his own proposals. All pension proposals depend on a high proportion of people earning money, and pension contributions, whether state, personal or private, depend on people working. How do his party's proposals for the Department of Trade and Industry help that policy?

Mr. Webb: Interestingly, we propose that the DTI would not do some of the things that it does at the moment, such as subsidising arms exports. Some of its worthwhile responsibilities would be transferred to other Government Departments, and my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) has estimated in our published spending plans that the amount spent on DTI-related activities by other Departments would be the same in real terms as in 1997, when the Government came to power. The suggestion that such activities would be decimated is therefore quite untrue.

Turning to the important issue of citizenship as the basis of pensions, coverage and commentary on today's debate will focus on the Secretary of State's interesting and encouraging response to our proposal. Previously, I feared that the Government's response to citizenship-based pensions was not warm. On 14 September, before the Secretary of State took up his post, the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) said:

> "At a stroke, the Liberals plan to scrap the national insurance scheme, which is the bedrock of pensions as they operate today . . . People who have contributed, in many cases for an entire working life, towards their national insurance pension would find that it was swept away."—[Official Report, 14 September 2004; Vol.424, c. 1231.]

In fact, that pension would still be there. However, I am heartened that a new broom has swept through the Department. Barely a month later, the Secretary of State has an open mind—indeed, he said that he was "veering towards the very positive"—on our proposals.

Annabelle Ewing: I am obviously a big fan of citizens pensions, as the Scottish National party came up with the proposal in the first place. However, having listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said about the scope of his party's policy, how many pensioners in Scotland will be excluded from the citizens pension, which he proposes to introduce on a targeted basis, unlike the SNP?

Mr. Webb: As the hon. Lady will be aware, our proposal will initially benefit pensioners aged over 75. She will know better than me how many pensioners under 75 there are in Scotland. She will know that our plans to scrap the council tax—I do not know whether the SNP has a similar proposal, as I sometimes lose track of its policies—would benefit pensioners under 75. The House attaches great importance to the credibility of Opposition promises, so it is regrettable that a fringe Opposition party should promise the earth on pensions.

The notion of a pension based on citizenship is an interesting one. I am sure that the Secretary of State has encountered the category D retirement pension but, if not, he can be forgiven. To refresh his memory, it is a citizens pension in the British pension system payable to people over 80 who do not have a pension or who have a very poor one. It is not means-tested and is paid regardless of contribution record to 23,000 people, three quarters of whom are women. It is based on a citizenship or residency test. Provided people have lived here for 10 years of a 20-year period they can draw the pension. Should the Secretary of State have to do battle within Government over a fundamental breach in the national insurance principle, I hope that he will remind his colleagues that we already have a pension that is based not on contributions but on a residency test. Admittedly, it is paid to older pensioners, and we propose that it should be paid to the over-75s, not just the over-80s. However, our proposals are not radically different from current arrangements, but are more generous. I hope that the Secretary of State is emboldened by the fact that the principle that some people claim is sacrosanct has already been breached, I assume by the Government who set up the national insurance system 50 years ago.

The Secretary of State asked why people do not make more of the state second pension that, he said, benefits carers. I would not want him to be under the impression that it benefits them to the extent that he believes. Although it is true that parents with children aged five or under receive credits, as soon as the children go to primary school they do not receive anything. A young mother, for example, whose children start at primary school, may work part-time, but if she is under the lower earnings limit she does not pay national insurance. She therefore does not receive credits for the state second pension, so that category of women is still excluded. Likewise, if carers work for 35 hours a week and draw carers allowance they receive help, but if they work for 30 hours a week they do not receive anything. Even with the improvements brought about by the state second pension, large numbers of carers continue to be excluded. The basic pension and the state second pension are still so limited in value that someone retiring on a full pension from both schemes, which are price-linked, will typically end up receiving pension credit. The Secretary of State is therefore right that there has been a marginal improvement for women, but it is much more limited than he realises.

Sir John Butterfill: If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, is it his party's policy to get rid eventually of the national insurance contribution system altogether that, presumably, would be subsumed by the tax system? Would that be welcomed by pensioners who continue to work, one advantage of which is that they will not have to pay national insurance?

Mr. Webb: We propose that revenue from national insurance contributions will be ring-fenced and spent on the NHS. It will be levied in exactly the same way and on exactly the same people as at present, so pensioners will not experience any difference in their liabilities. However, once we have got rid of contributory pensions it would be quite inappropriate, as the hon. Gentleman said, to levy a national insurance contribution to pay for them. We therefore advocate spending the money instead on the health service and using general taxation to pay for retirement pensions.

I shall conclude shortly, but first I want to ask the Secretary of State about the position of people who lost their occupational pension rights before the introduction of the pension protection fund. He will know that, after pressure from Members on both sides of the House, the Government introduced a financial assistance scheme of £400 million over 20 years, or £20 million a year. It is widely accepted that that sum will not meet the scale of liabilities, especially as pensions operated by Turner and Newall fall within its scope. However, there is an ambiguity about the scheme, which I hope the Secretary of State can resolve. Some people say that individuals who have lost their occupational pension since June this year, when the priority order on winding up changed, will not be covered by the financial assistance scheme. Some Government officials have intimated that when a scheme winds up the workers' position is slightly better than it used to be so the financial assistance scheme does not apply. That has created great anxiety among people who know that their firm is going to wind up its pension scheme before the pension protection fund is introduced. Will the Minister clarify whether they will be in or out of the financial assistance scheme?

The general stance of the Liberal Democrats is well known and well respected, so I shall say only a few words about our alternative approach to such issues. At our conference, a motion on a detailed package of proposals to deal with the pensions crisis was carried almost without opposition. At its heart was reform of the state pension system by making the pension universal and basing it on citizenship. It will be paid without means-testing and will be earnings-linked. We are the first to admit that we cannot do everything in one go, so we will phase our reforms, starting with our proposals to increase the pension for the over-75s by £25, lifting 1 million people out of means-tested benefits at a stroke. We believe that that is the right way to start.

We also have proposals to encourage private saving. Clearly, the higher the pension, the less the means-testing and the bigger the incentive to save. We propose an opt-out system for occupational pensions. I am glad that the Secretary of State mentioned that, and I think that it was the subject of an initiative by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell). Under such a scheme, the presumption is that people are in a scheme unless they actively opt out, although they can still make an informed choice to do so. That would improve coverage and make a significant contribution, and I believe that it offers some scope for agreement.

Another suggestion that I want to put on the table—I hope that hon. Members will refer to it—is that of a National Savings pension. Whenever I talk to people about pensions, they tell me that they simply do not trust them. They have more trust in company pensions because of the pension protection fund and the opt-out rules, but they do not trust private pensions. They are worried about Equitable Life, and Standard Life is getting itself a bad reputation at the moment. They want a brand that they can trust—a company that is not going to rip them off with commission, try to make a huge profit out of them or go bankrupt. Why not have a personal pension whereby people can make a long-term investment through National Savings? They will not be ripped off with commission charges, the provider will not go to the wall, and they will know that their pension has a secure organisation behind it—to the extent that the Government can be regarded as such.

I think that the public would warm to that innovative idea. When I put it to the pensions industry, the principal criticism was that it might be too successful. I am regularly criticised for Liberal Democrat policies that have the potential to be too successful, and that certainly applies to this one in particular. The people in the pensions industry were afraid that such a product might undercut the market. However, the more I talked to them, the more they said that it would appeal to a section of the market to which the private sector cannot deliver—that it does not reach because it is not economic to do so. If people could go to their post office, if they can find one, to put money into a pension with a brand that they trust, that would help to provide security in old age.

The debate did not start on a positive note, but it has developed one. The Secretary of State gave an encouraging response that indicated some fresh thinking and openness to ideas. I have said in the past day or so that after seven years in office it is a bit late for the Government to start a national debate, but I withdraw that comment. If the Secretary of State is genuine and is willing to debate our ideas for a citizenship pension, we will accept that invitation. We will meet him privately, publicly, wherever and whenever he wants to, to take forward these positive ideas to benefit women and pensioners as a whole. Opposition and Government should engage in such dialogue in partnership, and I look forward to working with the new Secretary of State.

2.32 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I congratulate the Liberal Democrats on adding new ideas to our debate, particularly their proposal on selling pensions at post offices. As the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr.

[Mr. Frank Field]

Webb) probably knows, Mr. Gladstone advocated that policy in this Chamber but was not successful in delivering it. I wish him luck where the grand old man failed.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to be careful in extending his goodwill to the variety of proposals that are advocated, particularly by Opposition Members. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) quickly exposed the fallacy on which the longer-term financing of Liberal Democrat proposals is based. The hon. Member for Northavon suggested that because Labour is committed to a means-tested pension credit that will rise with earnings, and because that will encompass an ever-growing proportion of the pensioner population—our Green Paper said that some 83 per cent. would eventually receive it—it is fair enough to transfer those funds into his citizenship pension.

The reason why today's debate is so important is that the pension credit, which we have committed on to the statute book, is not sustainable in the long run. In presenting it, the Government said that when 2050 arrives an 11p increase in the standard rate of tax will be required to pay the bill. I have never seen a shorter political suicide note. Although the pension credit is a valuable tool to help poorer pensioners now, it is not the basis for a long-term policy.

I want to make three short points arising from the Adair Turner commission's report, which was published yesterday and which I welcome, not only because it is written in very good English but because it helps us to centralise our ideas on where the debate should go.

My first point is a warning about the desirability of basing pension policy on evidence-based research. I challenge any hon. Member to stand up and say, "What new evidence is there in that report that we did not have before?" Let me go back to the Tom Ross report that the Government commissioned, which listed areas on which we need information if we are to take an evidence-based approach to pension policy. For example, we know how many people are in company pensions, but we do not know who is paying what contributions or, therefore, who will get what out at the end of the day. The report says that we cannot yet link people who happen to be paying contributions to a company scheme to any other wealth that they may have. It says, above all, that we cannot link knowledge about occupational pension rights and other wealth to housing ownership; nor can we produce a breakdown of the distribution of housing ownership in a way that is valuable in advancing the debate on pensions.

It is wonderful to have research—let us have it by all means—but nobody should kid themselves that if we only waited a little bit longer for even better research that would excuse us from having to make hard decisions, because that is what politicians are paid to do. As we go into the election, we will have to make a political judgment about what we advocate to the electorate in respect of pensions reform.

Now that I have heard it, I fundamentally disagree with the Liberal Democrats' idea of a citizenship pension. While no single measure will help to shore up our society, which is fast falling apart in too many of our constituencies, we cannot unthinkingly abolish the contributory principle, which gives ordinary men and women the right to build up a stake in society in respect of their pension. We cannot cast all that aside and advocate a system that says, "Irrespective of what you do, how worthy you are, how much you have worked or how effective you have been in putting your shoulder to the wheel, because you are a citizen you will get a pension." That is directly opposite to the way that we need to go when we consider how people earn their entitlements and subsequently draw them. The electorate will be very disturbed to hear about that proposal.

That is not to say that we do not want to help people who should be gaining a pension entitlement but have been unable to do so in the past. However, in reforming the state pension we must ensure that the contributions of people who do valuable work for the community, such as caring for young children and frail elderly people, are paid for them, and that we thereby salute them for their role. We must not demean what they do by saying, "Roll up, roll up—anybody who happens to be around can have a pension paid for by other people who have to work jolly hard."

Mr. Webb: We all want to salute the work that carers have done in the past, but saluting them is not enough if they are now retired and drawing a pathetically inadequate pension. Nor is it enough to increase the basic state pension, because they get a reduced percentage of it. The right hon. Gentleman does not want to means-test them, so what would he do for them?

Mr. Field: Quite a few of those people will have had carers allowance, so we have the records and we could check them. Some flexibility is possible, depending on who they cared for and how. That seems a more appropriate approach than the suggestion that the whole national insurance system should go because we have not yet devised a way of justifiably paying additional pensions to those who have grown weary looking after other people.

There is no dispute about that anywhere in the House. It is just that some of us baulk at the idea that under the guise of helping a moderately small number of elderly women who have carried out caring functions, we should overthrow one of the real successes of the welfare state—the contributory principle. People do not think of it as taxation. They think it is being earmarked for them and they think it is their duty as citizens to contribute to the national insurance system when they can, and that they thereby have a right to draw from it. The electorate would not be keen that we should put that system aside without thinking.

Kali Mountford: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way on the contributory principle. In his thinking on the matter, has he considered what would happen if we moved from a pay-as-you-go scheme, which we currently have, to a funded scheme, which could be developed under the national insurance principle?

Mr. Field: That will be my third point. It is the scheme about which I hope the Government will be thinking. My hon. Friend is right to highlight it. We cannot go into the election without laying down some outline plans for reforming pensions in the next Parliament. It would mean that almost 10 years had elapsed since we were elected, yet we still had not got on to the major subject of long-term reform of pensions.

It was a clever wheeze last year to set up the Pensions Commission and to toss the pensions time bomb into the long grass. We have now had a report from the Adair Turner commission, which has mowed the long grass. The pensions time bomb has not only been found, but it is ticking and people want to know what sort of approach each of the political parties will have when they go into the election.

It is an important call for the Government to make. If they continue to say that Adair Turner's commission will not make its final report until June next year, they will soon be trapped in that timetable. The timetable did not come down from Mount Sinai; it is the timetable that the Government gave the report in the first instance, and what Governments lay down, they can revoke. I suggest that they ask Adair Turner to make his report by the end of February next year so that all the political parties can study the detailed proposals and shape their election manifestos accordingly. I do not want us to go naked into the next election without putting before the electorate the main outlines of the kind of programme that Labour will support if it is returned in the next Parliament.

I come to that alternative and to proposals associated with the pension reform group, which tie in with the point just made by my hon. Friend. There are three main areas of policy within which the Turner commission says we will have to work if we are to have a viable long-term policy. First, I do not believe we can maintain the present retirement age. It was not Mr. Gladstone but that other great Liberal, Lloyd George, who first introduced old age pensions. He introduced pensions for those over 70, although life expectancy was 48 years. Since then, life expectancy has increased and we have endlessly brought down the retirement age. It is not sustainable.

As the Secretary of State said, and as we all know from work in our constituencies, there are a number of people—not just those who worked in heavy industry, but those who cared for their parents as the parents became increasingly frail and then died—who are simply knackered and who cannot work to the current retirement age, let alone to one that we raise. That is why proposals to reform incapacity benefit are crucial.

The original proposals for an old age pension came in when the trade unions, the friendly societies and the mutual aid societies realised that they were going bankrupt because there was no retirement income and people were claiming sickness benefit until they died. They therefore dropped their objection to a state retirement pension. If we are to raise the retirement age in the longer term, we must have a robust system of incapacity benefits for people who are genuinely worn out by the worries of this world and who can rightly draw an income from incapacity benefit. But the electorate will not buy that if we do not reform incapacity benefit. So we must raise the retirement age and link it with a workable and robust new incapacity benefit.

Secondly, the Turner report asks what we will do with the state pension. I do not believe that people will be prepared to accept, as the Institute for Public Policy Research is proposing, that we use the contracted-out rebate to put into a pay-as-you-go scheme so that we can immediately and substantially raise the state pension. That would mean transferring considerable sums that go towards a funded or investment-based pension scheme to a pay-as-you-go scheme, without any certainty that when those workers who were losing that substantial contribution to their funded or investment pension would get the same deal from taxpayers, many of whom are not yet born, so goodness knows how we can judge what their views would be.

Although there is a role for a pay-as-you-go scheme, that must be double-backed by a funded scheme. It needs to be a simple scheme and one that everybody is in. It should be looked after by trustees who are at arm's length from the Government. There would therefore be no possibility of the private market mis-selling, as everybody would be in the scheme. People who were in an additional form of provision would keep all that provision on top of the guaranteed minimum pension that they would get from the combined pay-as-you-go and funded scheme. I hope the Government would consider ways of accommodating the Conservative Opposition, who are very keen that in addition to making the minimum compulsory contributions, people should save.

If we are thinking about how the national insurance collection system can meet the future, rather than justifying its past record, then as well as collecting the contributions for the new funded scheme which in the first instance will be the contracted-out rebate, I hope the Government will start discussions with the private sector. If the private sector is successful in selling policies to those who want income additional to the new guaranteed minimum pension, I hope the Government will be prepared to collect those contributions through the national insurance scheme and pay them over to the companies, so the national insurance scheme would become a collection point servicing both the new funded scheme and the private sector.

That raises the big question, which no party has yet faced: what is the legitimate role of voters through their Government and of voters as individuals in providing for their retirement income? Labour has had a noble illusion—but it has been an illusion—that somehow we can use a collective state scheme to model the best of the private company pension schemes, and that we can deliver the resources that will give people an income of two thirds of their income before retirement. That is not on.

We must be much more modest about what we can do collectively. What we can do collectively is try to deliver that minimum guaranteed pension made up of a pay-as-you-go and a funded scheme. That goal is modest, but we have never achieved it in this country. The private sector's role will be to persuade people to make additional savings. It is not in taxpayers' interest either to legislate or to use huge amounts of taxpayers' money to try to bribe people to make additional savings. We know that the richest pick up the bribes—this is the first year in which more than half of all tax concessions on pension savings have gone to those who pay higher rate tax.

[Mr. Field]

I want to make three points. First, although it is cosy to say, "Labour's approach to pensions reform rests on evidence-based research", at the end of the day we must make a political judgment about the policy on which we want to campaign. Secondly, it is highly dangerous for us to go into the election without suggesting the main direction of our reforms, if the electorate return us. Thirdly, in making such proposals, we must answer the three questions that the Adair Turner commission addressed to all political parties. What role will raising the retirement age play? What role will a modernised state pension play? What role should funding provision play in seeking, for the first time ever in this country, the approval of the electorate to guarantee a minimum but adequate pension for all those who have played their part. Whether people work or undertake other functions that we value, we should salute them not by giving them credits, but by saying that this year's workers must pay this year's contributions for those people who carry out vital functions on our behalf.

2.51 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): I congratulate Adair Turner and his commission on producing a substantial body of work. I also congratulate them on their optimistic assumption that it will oblige politicians of all parties to concentrate their minds and turn to the difficult problems that future generations will face unless we start tackling the pensions problem. I wish that I could say the same for the Government, whom I congratulate on having set up the Pensions Commission. However, the Government are losing control of the process because they did not think through the timing.

As the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said—as usual, I fear that I agreed with rather a lot of what he said—the commission has not told us anything terribly new. We all knew that we face a demographic time bomb, which we in this country tend to assume will hit us rather later than it hits some of our continental colleagues and the Japanese. However, the commission's authoritative work tells us that unless we make some difficult and tough decisions in the near future, future generations will not be able to finance the level of pension provision that we all think people should enjoy in retirement, if they have behaved with reasonable common sense and responsibility.

The Government's track record on pensions is poor. The situation has deteriorated through neglect and some bad decisions over the past six or seven years. The report says that something must be done soon on what the Secretary of State acknowledged in his speech as probably the biggest single social problem that the country currently faces. The Government's problem is that they have nothing new to say.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead—he did not prompt me, because I had decided to start with this point before he made his speech—that the Government cannot put the report on the desk just before an election and say to the public, "We will decide our response to the report after the election. Vote for us, and shortly thereafter we will begin to enunciate some policies on the pension problem that will save future generations from difficulty and, incidentally, make every pensioner better off." No member of the public should believe that. It is absurd that we are meant to go through a period of purdah until just after May next year, when, having faced the electorate, the Government, if they are returned to the office, will say what they propose to do. In interviews this morning, I said that that point strikes me as today's oddest feature.

At moments during this debate, I thought that it might be best if we all went into purdah and did not start floating ideas until after the election because, as Adair Turner himself warns in his foreword to the report, the pre-election period is dangerous because politicians start committing themselves to some rather curious things. Those of us who have debated these matters for long enough know that politicians are never more prone to making incautious promises than in the run-up to an election and on the subject of pensions, and we heard a bit of that today.

The Secretary of State, whose appointment I welcome, can be excused because he is new to his post, but I was astonished when he cheerily hinted with a smile that he is tempted by the idea of abandoning the contributory principle. Has he read Adair Turner's report? Has he consulted the right hon. Member for Birkenhead, who probably knows more about the contributory principle than any other hon. Member?

The Liberals immediately pre-empted the Government. They offered us a vision in which the declining number of working-age people in this country paid for utopian pension provision for their elders. The vision included abandoning the contributory principle, much more generous pension provision for absolutely everybody and pensions rising in line with earnings, year by year. I sometimes wonder whether silence might be better until we all sober up and return to this House to face our responsibilities.

No Treasury spokesman from any party is present in this debate. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) rightly says that times have moved on since my day, and since the days, to which neither he nor I will confess, when the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and I first started debating these questions, but the rules of arithmetic are one thing that has not moved on. The new Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Northavon should talk to whoever is supposed to be responsible for costing their parties' future programmes. I am neutral—I have never aspired to the leadership of the Labour party and am neither a Brownite nor a Blairite—but the Chancellor should be alerted to what is being said.

I participated in a debate this morning with the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), the shadow Treasury spokesman for the Liberal party, who tried to persuade me that the Liberal party's programme for the next election is carefully costed. He only mentioned the proposals for pensioners over 75 and concealed the wider vision that has been unveiled today. I will send him a copy of the speech by the hon. Member for Northavon and ask him how on earth it squares with the responsible restraint that he tried to impress on me this morning. Today's contributions by Labour and Liberal Front Benchers failed to address the issue that Adair Turner has asked us to examine, and it behoves us all to do something about that.

The time bomb keeps ticking, and the situation has become more urgent over the past six or seven years because the Government's record is at best patchy and at worst damaging. Like the public, I am already fed up of hearing the mutual recriminations about who made which mistakes, but we should remind ourselves of some of the recent events in the Government's record.

With hindsight, the Chancellor's changes to the tax treatment of pensions were plainly scandalous. I was not the only Member who criticised the Chancellor's first Budget on social grounds, because it was bad social policy to take away the tax advantage from pensions. The cumulative effect has been disastrous and, as far as I am aware, nobody is paying attention to how we can deal with it. Tax incentives to get people to provide for themselves on pensions are essential, and that therefore includes tax concessions for those who manage pension funds.

The Government have also greatly damaged the climate for savings generally. One of my criticisms of Adair Turner's report—to the extent that I have managed to get through it—is that I do not believe that we can consider pension provision wholly apart from savings provision. When examining the wider question of how to enable as many people as possible to take some personal responsibility for matters such as social welfare, health and care in old age, we must consider the extent to which a section of society can be encouraged to build up a stock of savings as well as providing pensions entitlement to give them income in old age.

The Government's record on savings is disastrous. I do not want to stray too far outside pensions, but let me remind hon. Members that the previous Government spent much time trying to encourage savings and spread the idea of savings throughout a much wider section of the population. Nowadays, not many people argue with Mrs. Thatcher's doctrine of, "Every man a capitalist, every man a saver."

We had personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts and we gave tax concessions to those who were prepared to make some savings each year. The Government's record is dreadful. They replaced both schemes with individual savings accounts, which were never as attractive as PEPs and TESSAs, and the Chancellor continues to squeeze out the tax concessions available to ISAs and ISA holders. He proposes to reduce the amount of tax-protected savings that people can make each year. In that and in other ways, the climate for savings has worsened.

The fact that the savings ratio has sagged so badly in the past seven years poses a serious economic as well as social problem for the country. In 1997, the savings ratio as a percentage of gross domestic product was 6.8 per cent.; it is now 4.2 per cent. The figure has been falling steadily, especially in the past three to four years. At the same time, household liabilities—household debt as a proportion of GDP—has risen year in, year out throughout the Government's lifetime. It has increased from 73 per cent. of GDP in 1997 to 95.7 per cent. now. My guess is that the figure continues to rise. Although that may have helped the growth of our economy in that people spending rather than saving keeps the economy going in the short term, it is not sustainable—and not good when viewed alongside the demographic time bomb and general pensions problem that we are discussing. The Government's record is, therefore, not good.

The Prime Minister said at Question Time that he inherited a calamitous situation. We have heard various descriptions of what happened in 1997, when the problem started. None of us perceived it in that way then. I admit that it is obvious now, when considering the position that the seeds of the problem were there, but I suspect that no hon. Members realised that. We did not know what would go wrong with company and personal pensions. Indeed, we were rather complacent as British citizens about the fact that we had licked the problem while the feckless French, Germans and others would have to keep trying to solve it. My Eurosceptic friends even said that we would have to pay for German pensions if we stayed in the European Union because when other countries realised that we had solved a problem that they could not, the British taxpayer would find himself paying for German pensions. I hope that the German pensioners listening to the debate are not waiting for the money because we now have our own problem.

In 1997, we all worked on the principle of a basic state pension that was reasonably affordable—that is why we broke the link with earnings; heaven knows what the fiscal position would have been if we had not broken it in 1979—and placing emphasis on encouraging the growth of funded occupational and private pensions to give people the living standards that they expected in later years. That was perfectly sound and I do not regret it.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): My right hon. and learned Friend refers to breaking the link with earnings. Surely the Administration prior to 1979 paid no attention to that link. They paid heed to it when it suited them and neglected it when that suited them.

Mr. Clarke: That Administration kept altering the rules of what they linked to, according to the financial crisis they faced. Interminable debates about whether one acted on forecasts of inflation or by looking back at inflation are buried in Hansard. My hon. Friend is therefore right.

We did not strictly stick to tying pensions to prices. The basic pension was worth more in real terms when we left office than it was when we started. However, we tried pretty doggedly to stick to prices. The Government have also doggedly tried to stick to that, but it is to their credit that they have not altogether stuck simply to linking with prices. The pension has increased a little more than that in real terms. However, no one in the past felt able to move to an open-ended commitment to continue to increase the basic pension in line with earnings. We all believed that the problem would be solved provided that we facilitated the growth of occupational and private personal pensions.

We know what went wrong and shattered that complacency. First, everybody underestimated the rapid growth in life expectancy of those drawing pensions. Of course, we all blame the actuarial profession more than anybody else, but everybody shared the delusion that life expectancy could not increase so quickly. We all overestimated the returns that could be got on investment. That was the flaw in the plan of my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) to move the state pension to a funded scheme. We were considering that in 1997. Even my right hon. Friend was rather carried away with the idea that as long as the scheme was funded, the sky was the limit in terms of the growth of the funds each year.

We also slightly scuppered the funding of corporate occupational pensions by getting rid of inflation. I played a part in that, which I should like to claim. It was amazing how the finances of occupational and corporate schemes worked provided that the wages of those who contributed kept going through the sky and therefore kept up the nominal value of the fund while it was paid out to pensioners. All that has gone wrong and we realise that we now face a considerable problem.

Sir John Butterfill: My right hon. and learned Friend said that none of us foresaw the problem. If he refers to speeches that I made in 1995, he will realise that I severely criticised our Government for the component of the minimum funding requirement. The operation of MFR meant that we did not get the returns on the investments that we thought that we might.

Mr. Clarke: I had already prepared a favourable reference to my hon. Friend for introducing a private Member's Bill, which I supported, two or three years ago. His expertise is considerable but he was a rare voice. Not many were heard in the Chamber casting doubt on our ability to proceed on the basis of private pensions.

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): I am following the right hon. and learned Gentleman's analysis with great interest and respect, but in fairness for the record, what weight would he give the Tory mis-selling of private pensions, which affected some 2 million cases and helped to undermine people's confidence in the system? Where is that in his analysis?

Mr. Clarke: The mis-selling of pensions was a sad story. It is rather harsh to describe it as Tory mis-selling. Introducing personal pensions was an important proposal, which Lord Fowler carried through. No one will unravel the personal pensions provision. When the scheme was introduced in the brave new dawn, I regret that many companies and their salesmen who sold the new personal pensions were careless. A scandal occurred, and I agree that it has helped to damage confidence in financial institutions generally. That is one of the problems in increasing the savings ratio now. However, I would defend with considerable vigour the policy of moving to personal pensions as an alternative to occupational pensions. It was far-sighted and one of the policies, of which we had several, whereby we did what elected Governments rarely do: look to the future and try to anticipate what our children would like bequeathed to them. Obviously, I do not dismiss the seriousness of the mis-selling scandal that ensued. It was an unfortunate incident, and I trust that protections against it now exist.

Following the interesting remarks of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), we must accept that the state pension will be the most important pension for a high proportion of the population. When talking about encouraging people to save—even worse, compulsion to save—the House should bear in mind that for the foreseeable future quite a large proportion of the population would be ill-advised to save in any significant way over and above the state pension for their own provision. They will not accumulate a big enough fund to make it worthwhile, whether or not we get rid of means-testing. People mostly do not go into a pension or save because they cannot afford it. That will not change, as we discovered with the abortive attempt to introduce stakeholder pensions, by introducing new and attractive schemes to encourage people to save if they do not have the money. That scheme got nowhere. The state pension is therefore important.

The state pension will from time to time be increased modestly in value. Like every other Member of the House, I hope to [illegible] elected in the not-too-distant future, so who am I to stand in the way of the almost universal agreement that the basic state pension is now due for a bit of a surge forward? For the sake of my taxpaying constituents, I hope that the bidding match going on between the parties does not get carried away, but of course it must go forward a little. Therefore, I am happy with the idea, which is part of the eight-point plan put forward, that we restore the link with earnings for a time. I am extremely glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant has not extended that into the future indefinitely. He will be criticised for saying that at the moment it is only for this Parliament, and that he will find the savings thereafter to do so. In times gone by, I have spent 18 years defending that difficult line, so I look forward to seeing how we finance it more than three or four years out. I caution everybody against timeless commitments, which we heard the Liberal Democrats giving, to earnings-related state pension for ever, which is complete nonsense; the future pattern of demography makes it wrong. A little surge, however, would be welcome.

Some means-testing is therefore required because, for as long as I can remember, we have not expected those for whom the basic pension is their only pension to live on that. We used to have, for instance, the supplementary pension, which was means-tested, and that is still a requirement. On occasions, for older people in particular who had no opportunity to make provision, or for some of the women carers who have been rightly mentioned, some means-tested and even some non-contribution-linked addition is perfectly justified if it is worked out carefully.

Means-testing is one of those ridiculous issues that get batted backwards and forwards across the entire welfare field, usually from one extreme to another. All three main political parties have been on both sides of the issue at various stages over the past few years. The means test is the obvious way of targeting the poor, and it also seems one of the most obvious ways in which to destroy incentives to save, work or doing anything else if taken too far, when it becomes unfair. Some means-testing is called for. I have the impression that the Minister for Pensions agrees, as he has a valuable quotation in his record—that the Government have realised that they have taken means-testing much too far in what they are contemplating for pension credit. They have completely and utterly overdone it.

I am still not wedded to the tax credit system: it is expensive to administer, it has an appalling record of take-up, and it is mainly contrived to improve the presentation of the public accounts compared with the means-tested benefits that we used to give. The Government have not made as big a mess of pension credit as they made of child tax credit, working tax credit and various other things that they have tried to administer, but there are still many people who have never taken it up and never will. Some modest means-testing is called for, but we really must unravel the current excessive means-testing because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant rightly said, it is acting as a disincentive to save.

My main point is that when considering Adair Turner's three alternatives—I accept that we probably must do some of each of them—as a Tory, I find myself most instinctively drawn to doing everything that we can voluntarily to improve people's ability to make their own provision through private pensions and to encourage them to save. We are a more prosperous country, and the range of the population that can do that quite sensibly is greater, but they will not do it unless we create the right climate and enable and encourage them to do so.

I do not see a short-term solution to the occupational corporate pension problem. It is not corporate wickedness that has caused people to bail out of defined benefit pensions that tie everyone's pension to their salary; it is a realisation that their actuaries have been up the creek, that the market has collapsed and that pensioners are living longer. When we step back, we are able to see that it is absurd for a company and its pension trustees to give an absolutely open-ended guarantee of such substantial commitments in the future, which they claim to be able to finance out of a fund whose performance can be variable and which has no guarantee of meeting them. We have seen the dangers of the risk being carried by employers and their pension funds. It is inevitable that the risk will be transferred to employees in most cases, and I know of no easy solution that will reopen that. We are therefore talking about personal saving and personal pensions.

One of the things in which the Government are interested is compulsion, and the Secretary of State plainly hinted that after the election, compulsion will be on the their agenda: compulsorily joining one's occupational pension or making some provision. It is in the terms of reference of the Pensions Commission to consider in particular whether voluntaryism is defensible. I have at times been attracted to the idea of making compulsory saving or compulsory pension contributions part of our system, but I always come down against it. One reason is that voluntaryism is more flexible, and leaving people to make their own provision as they choose takes more account of the huge variety of circumstances in which people will bring themselves to save.

People are saving at the moment. We should therefore ask ourselves: what is happening at the moment? They are saving by buying a house or flat. They think that they are saving by going into property. They do not trust pension funds, the stock market and investment funds. They do not trust insurance companies. They do not trust Governments. They do not think that they can rely on the state for a pension when they get older. An awful lot of young and middle-aged people think that their bricks and mortar are their pension—it is the only thing that they can think of which is bound to go up by at least 10 per cent. each year, which can be sold when they wish to dispose of it, and which will somehow look after them in old age. That is a real danger, and I think that it is the principal reason why we have a housing bubble at the moment, why housing is 20 or 30 per cent. over-valued, and why we are in danger of seeing values fall back. What we need to do, first, is to hope that that bubble is deflated by the Bank of England in a comfortable fashion, without too much disaster, and get back to deciding how on earth we encourage people to save properly.

Not all people would be well advised to put X amount into pensions each year. The Turner report says that if we are 40, we should be paying 20 per cent. of our income to provide a pension. I would not put 20 per cent. of my income into my pension were I a 40-year-old. I would examine my career expectations and how one maps things out. We are trying to encourage the middle classes and middle-income groups to save, and they have a much more complicated outlook in looking after their financial affairs. Most sensible middle-income people are not at their most broke when they are elderly. They are at their most broke when they are married, have young children, and one of the partners must give up work for the first time. That is when they go through a period of being really broke. They should not be piling vast proportions of their income into pension funds when they are bringing up children with a wife and trying to pay off the mortgage. Most of them expect to start really saving for their retirement in their 50s. An awful lot of people do that.

I will not go into the endless other varieties of provision that sensible people can make, but if we opt for compelling them to put a staggering amount of money into their pensions, it is not always in their best interests, and it is an inflexible form of saving. If we want people to save more than they would of their own volition, and if we want to tie it into pensions—which is one of the most unattractive forms of saving if someone is 30, because he can never touch the money until he is old, and he might die young and never see it at all—we have to give pretty attractive tax concessions to pensions. What we have now is inadequate.

Of all the ideas that have been suggested for extending tax relief and more favourable treatment for private and personal pension provision, getting rid of the annuity purchasing requirement is one of the most attractive and overdue. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) had a private Member's Bill advocating that three years ago, and I was pleased to be one of the sponsors from various parties who helped him with it. I am astonished that the Government have not changed the rules on annuity purchase, which would plainly get rid of one of the greatest deterrents to people putting up their pension provision to the full extent of the tax relief if that fits their personal requirements.

Our response to the Turner report should be a modest increase in the basic pension, some means-testing for those who have no chance to provide for themselves, but mainly incentives to save and make pension provision across the whole area, which can be done only through tax concessions.

Instinctively, I am against changing the retirement age. There are many men in heavy manual occupations who will not be able to make it to 65, and there will be personal and financial problems if we say that people cannot get the state pension until they are 70. We may be driven to it, and there are four western countries that have now raised the state retirement age from 65 to 67 in response to exactly the problems that we face, but I would like to see how they get on in Norway, the States and elsewhere before we go in that direction ourselves.

Those are my provisional views, but we must all have clearer views by the election. We should try to reach consensus. We nearly got consensus on the Castle Bill in the late 1970s, when I was our party's spokesman on pensions and we prevented Barbara from destroying private pension schemes altogether. Lord Fowler tried to get consensus when he introduced personal pensions in the 1970s. It is in all our interests to get consensus now, but it cannot be reached through a crazy bidding match in the run-up to the election. I think that the electorate will respond to a responsible reaction to the Turner report. They know that the parties cannot deliver the earth. If we do not grapple with the problems now, people in this Chamber in 20 years' time will curse us, because they will face a really, really serious crisis as a reduced number of working people try to maintain probably half the Members of this House in their retirement at a level that is unaffordable.

This is a serious matter that deserves a serious response, and it seems to me, in my unbiased way, that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant, with his eight-point plan, has come much nearer to the reality of grappling with the problem than the rival spokesmen from the other two parties.

3.23 pm

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): I apologise for my brief absence earlier in the debate. I was required on other duties elsewhere, on the Committee Corridor.

I am delighted to follow the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), for whom I have great admiration, as do many of my colleagues. He has the dubious distinction of being the only person here to have served for the whole length of Conservative government, from election day in 1979 until election day in 1997. For political anoraks, there is only one other former Member to have achieved that feat: Malcolm Rifkind.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman can therefore hardly avoid any criticism or responsibility for the dreadful pensions mess that that Government made. He started by suggesting that the debate should centre around the general election campaign and that our proposals should be in our manifestos. Similar comments were made by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts). I disagree with them. This is too important a subject for us to turn our backs on the possibility of cross-party consensus, which will surely be best found in the aftermath of a general election and not in the few months leading up to one, if indeed we have one next spring.

The hon. Member for Havant made a valid point, for which he was barracked by some of my colleagues. I have to confess that his claim that some people in the Labour party tried to suggest in the 1997 election campaign that Conservative policy would result in the abolition of the state pension was correct. During campaigning with my predecessor, John Maxton, now Lord Maxton of Blackwaterfoot, we came upon two older voters in Mount Florida who were very suspicious of Government plans for pensions. I immediately got tore in, as we say in Scotland, and assured them vociferously that if the Conservatives got back in they would abolish the state pension. They thanked me for the information and moved on, promising to vote for John, who then took me aside and said that I should really not say such things, as that was not what the Conservatives planned. That was typical of John, as a very honest politician, and it was a lesson to me in our responsibility to tell the truth to voters.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman. I have here a document issued during that campaign bearing the names of such luminaries as the present Prime Minister, Deputy Prime Minister and Chancellor, and containing the bald statement:

> "Now the Tories propose to abolish the basic state pension."

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman makes my point. As we are now in the game of demanding and offering apologies for everything that we have ever said in politics over the years, I certainly apologise for that particular branch of campaigning in 1997. However, that claim was pretty irrelevant given that we were 20 per cent. ahead in the polls at that point, and it does not take away from the fact that the Conservative Government made a pig's ear of pensions policy over 18 years.

We will need a further debate when the concluding volume of the Turner report is published next year. We need to take a strategic view of the problem. We have discussed the fact that we have an ageing population and a proportionately declining work force, with the possibility of moving from the current five working people to every pensioner to perhaps only three in 40 or 45 years' time—the so-called demographic time bomb. We now need to look at the wider issues. For example, we now have far more students graduating with student debt. That, I am afraid, is an inevitability, but when it is combined with the challenges facing young couples buying their first house at inflated prices it is not a surprise that fewer and fewer people are able to save as much as they should be saving.

The pressures from various aspects of modern life are so great that, as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe said, many people are putting all their money into property. Many people are putting their money into repaying the student debts that previous generations did not have to cope with. Having said that, there seems to be little indication on the high street that people's disposable income is falling in real terms. But it is worth making these points because we have to look at all the reasons behind the so-called pensions time-bomb, instead of simply concentrating on the increasing number of older people in the years ahead.

It is very tempting to look at the Turner report and some of the news coverage and conclude that means-testing has had its day. It would be a huge mistake to turn our backs on the pension credit, at least before it has done its job, which is to abolish pensioner poverty altogether.

As a Labour MP, I would find it very difficult to justify increasing taxes in order to reinstate the basic state pension at the level that existed when the link with earnings was first broken, and then to upgrade it every year in line with earnings. I would find it difficult to tell my constituents that they should pay significantly higher taxes in order to give extra money to richer pensioners such as Mrs. Thatcher, Peter Stringfellow and the many other millionaire pensioners. Someone said that they account for only 20 per cent. of all pensioners, but that does not justify our paying extra tax to give money to people who do not need it.

In fact, means-testing redistributes wealth in the right direction. Taking away the pension credit, reintroducing the link between earnings and the basic state pension and upgrading the pension for everyone also constitutes a redistribution of wealth, but in the opposite direction. It takes money away from the poorest pensioners and gives it to the richest. That is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman is making a very thoughtful speech. If his constituency is typical, a third of the pensioners in it who are entitled to the pension credit are not claiming it. We can all push harder to change that, produce more leaflets, and so on, but because of the nature of the beast, there will always be a substantial number of pensioners who get nothing. The only way to get money to the poorest of the poor is through the pension.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman makes a very valid point. The problem that he mentions is a serious one, and the Government must redouble their efforts to ensure that those people do claim the pension credit. I have heard the argument before that many pensioners are too proud to claim. Well, they are not too proud to claim in my constituency. I have not met a single pensioner who has said, "I know that the money is there, but I am too proud to take it." That simply does not happen. The fault probably does lie with Government agencies, and we need to find far more effective methods to deal with the problem. We know who these pensioners are—they already receive the basic state pension in some form or other—but we need to find a more efficient way to contact them and to help them through the process, so that the figure of one third of pensioners who are entitled to the pension credit but do not claim it can be reduced massively, and hopefully eradicated altogether. I accept the truth of what the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) is saying, but for reasons I have explained, we should not go down the route of redistributing wealth in the wrong direction.

Interestingly, the nature of the argument has changed out of all recognition. In the 1980s, re-establishing the link with earnings was seen as a great socialist left-wing principle. It is not, and it is no longer recognised as such. As the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe correctly said, means-testing is about targeting. If we want to target the poorest people, the way to do so is not by increasing the basic state pension. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) is not in her place. It is so typical that, just as everyone realises that re-establishing the link with earnings is not necessarily a left-wing policy, the Scottish National party decide to adopt it. When the Conservative party adopted it, the cat was surely out of the bag: it was surely clear then that it is not a redistributive policy—or not, at least, in the direction that we would like.

During Prime Minister's questions today, the Leader of the Opposition said—I cannot remember his exact words and I look forward to reading the text in tomorrow's Hansard—that pensioner poverty had not been reduced as a result of this Government's policy. No one seriously doubts that a huge number of pensioners have been brought above the poverty line, so I do not understand why the Leader of the Opposition said such a thing. The Government claim—the figures are open to examination by anyone—that 1.8 million pensioners have benefited from the pension credit and therefore now enjoy incomes that take them above the poverty line. None of the agencies dealing with old people seriously contradicts that figure, yet in the light of what the Leader of the Opposition said today, either he does not recognise it or he does not think that it matters.

Mr. Waterson: I may be able to assist the hon. Gentleman. What my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition may have had in mind were figures about pensioner poverty showing that 1996–97 levels were almost exactly the same as the 21 per cent. of pensioners living in poverty in 2002–03. It is fully set out in "Opportunity for All", the sixth annual report of the Department for Work and Pensions, that that is indeed the case.

Mr. Harris: I would have to question the hon. Gentleman's arithmetic on that. Given the huge increase in the number of people who have reached pensionable age over the past seven years, saying that the same numbers were living in poverty seven years ago as are today does not mean that no pensioners have been taken out of poverty. It is still possible for 1.8 million pensioners to have been taken out of poverty. The proportion of pensioners on poverty incomes has undoubtedly decreased drastically. I do not understand why Conservative Members want to dispute that or what they have to gain by doing so, since their own policies will do nothing at all for the poorest pensioners.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) mentioned earlier how damaging it is constantly to refer to the term "means-testing" instead of "entitlement". Labour Members generously welcomed that comment, but my suspicion is that the term "means-testing" will be used even more frequently by Conservative Front Benchers. They are clear in their view that the fewer people take up the pension credit—and the more the Conservatives view it as a failure—the more it suits their particular political purpose. I believe that that is an incredibly cynical attitude to adopt. On both sides of the House, we should encourage our own constituents to persuade older people to claim exactly what they are entitled to. If we can adapt our language to use "means-testing" less frequently, we may be able to contribute to reducing the number of pensioners—currently a third—who do not claim their benefits.

[Mr. Harris]

In the aftermath of a general election, I hope that partisanship—I have to admit that I have just displayed it myself to some extent—can be put behind us, so that we can deal with the problem in an appropriately serious mode. I am sure that the official Opposition will take that into consideration next year and view the problem with the seriousness that it deserves. Whoever will be in government next year—it will be the Labour party—will have to take some tough decisions. This is not one of the matters that we can play about with or infinitely postpone taking tough decisions on.

There are three basic options that need to be considered: later retirement, which has already been mentioned; compulsory savings; and higher taxes or perhaps some combination of the three. Anyone participating in the debate who argues that we need not take account of any of those three options is kidding themselves and kidding the House.

Personally, I believe that a higher retirement age is inevitable. I was delighted to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State say that he did not want to go down the compulsory route for a higher retirement age. At the same time, however, I hope that we do not rule out compulsion altogether, because when we enter the debate after the general election we need to have a genuinely open mind on all the options. Saying at the outset that we will not consider A, B or C is not conducive to producing the best conclusions.

However unpleasant the medicine, it is surely incumbent on MPs of all parties to recognise that, because an option is unpalatable, it is not necessarily avoidable. A week ago, at the Conservative party conference, the Leader of Opposition bemoaned the lack of trust that people have in politicians. How justified that lack of trust would be if we as politicians sought to avoid taking tough decisions in order to gain party political advantage.

3.39 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I begin by declaring an interest. Like every hon. Member, I belong to the House final salary scheme. I am also a member of a private final salary scheme run by a company of which I am a director, and in which I am a shareholder.

I was interested in the speech made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris). He began by trying to argue that it was important for politicians to engage in honest campaigning during a general election campaign. I welcomed his apology for a misrepresentation of which he was guilty during the 1997 campaign, but he ended his speech by reasserting the proposition that honest campaigning was consistent with the principle that although the next Government will face "incredibly tough" decisions about the future of this country's pension system, it is reasonable to withhold from the electorate the nature of those decisions until after the votes have been cast. I must say that the justification for that escapes me.

Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), I think that it is entirely right to say that tough decisions lie ahead of us. Honest politics requires that, in advance of the general election probably to be held in the first half of next year, we must be a great deal clearer than is at present the case about the subsequent direction that each of the three parties in England is likely to take.

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North) (Lab): Are there not four parties?

Mr. Dorrell: There are three parties in England, but of course other parties will be involved in other parts of the country. As an English MP, I shall focus on the three parties in England. However, there might indeed be four parties in England, and I shall return to that point.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said earlier today that we need to establish a consensus in respect of the future evolution of pensions policy. The same point was made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe. I agree, but the consensus that we need most urgently is one between Nos. 10 and 11 Downing street about where the proper balance lies when it comes to using mass means-testing as the foundation for pensions policy.

One key reason for the establishment of the Turner commission was to avoid the need to find a consensus on this matter between Nos. 10 and 11 Downing street. If the Labour party is to abide by the injunction for honest campaigning expressed by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart, the inhabitants of Nos. 10 and 11 must work out between them whether they favour the continued development of mass means- testing as the basis for UK pensions policy. On the other hand, the Prime Minister may succeed in persuading the Chancellor that that is an historic dead end, and that the emphasis of pensions policy needs to change.

An incipient consensus on this matter emerged before the 1997 general election and was potentially available immediately afterwards. We need to be clear about why that collapsed. It is not a matter of huge controversy that pensioner poverty was an issue in that election, but the huge difference between then and now is that at that time a system was developing to allow private funding to improve pensions.

That was especially true for the new generations of retirees who emerged through the Conservative Government's years in office. Pension provision improved for those new retirees, and the pensions that they enjoyed in retirement grew more generous as living standards rose. However, pensioner poverty was a problem for people whose private provision proved insufficient.

Immediately after the 1997 election, the Prime Minister famously appointed the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) to think the unthinkable about how the issue should be addressed by the incoming Labour Government. The Prime Minister made stirring speeches at the time about how the evolution of the welfare state was one of the great challenges that his new Labour Government would address. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead, as Minister with responsibility for pensions and welfare, pointed out early in the process that the best way to deal with pensioner poverty was to recognise that it could not be remedied exclusively through means-testing and that the time had come to revisit the decisions that had been made in the early 1980s to de-link the state retirement pension from earnings. He argued that if we were to address the issue of pensioner poverty in a way that was consistent with a continued incentive to save for future generations of pensioners, we had to have a more generous level of basic pension available to all.

Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. People now live longer than ever before and spend more time in education than ever before. There is a greater draw on the public purse than there has ever been. How does that square with the Conservatives' intention to cut public expenditure?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that the shadow Chancellor has published some spending plans for an incoming Conservative Government that set out clearly how we intend to continue to deliver proper spending for health and education. We had a debate between my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and the Liberal Democrat spokesman this afternoon about how the precise spending commitments that the Conservative party has made on state retirement pensions would be financed. If the hon. Gentleman chooses to research the issue, he will find that the arithmetic has been done.

I wish to confess a personal error, and this element of my contribution may appeal to the hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead was early in recognising the need to revisit the implications of the de-linking of the state retirement pension from earnings. I did not think that he was right in 1997, but I now fully recognise that he was. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant, who is an acknowledged expert on the issue, was among the first Conservatives to recognise that the right hon. Gentleman was right. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), when he led for the Conservatives on social security policy, also recognised that the right hon. Gentleman was right.

In fact, there is an emerging consensus that the de-linking of the state retirement pension from earnings has to be revisited. The consensus appears to include everyone apart from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The consensus includes my hon. Friend the Member for Havant, the Liberal Democrats, most of the pensions industry, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead, who acts as the Prime Minister's shock troop on the subject, and even the Prime Minister himself. It does not, of course, include the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Chancellor is not part of the consensus because he is responsible for the great historic error in pensions policy over the past seven years, which had two key elements. The first was the huge increase in mass means-testing, and the second was the £5 billion tax increase on the pension funds. What people do not recognise is that a £5 billion hole in the revenues of pension funds is, because of the way in which they work, not a one-off. When expressed at a net present value, discounted at 7 per cent., it is a £70 billion hole in the capital financing of pension funds.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was personally responsible for both those errors. They are not the only reason that we are in our current position, but both are huge contributory factors to the pensions crisis we face. It is because the Chancellor is responsible for those two historic errors that we face the need to build consensus from much further back than we would have been if the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Birkenhead rather than the Chancellor had won the argument at the beginning of the Government's period in office.

The Turner report provides a basis on which we can start to rebuild that consensus. The report is very good and, like all complex subjects, it can ultimately be reduced to some relatively simple, stark choices. As Members have said, there are three options. A fourth option is also listed—further pensioner poverty in the future—but we can dismiss that without dwelling on it for too long.

The three workable options are, first, increased tax revenues to pay for a tax-funded scheme; secondly, increased individual contributions for private funded pension provision; and thirdly, a longer working life. Those are the three variables open to us. The report suggests that it is unlikely that we will get through the crisis without some contribution from all three.

It seems inconceivable that the new consensus will not recognise what the right hon. Member for Birkenhead has been arguing since 1997—that mass means-testing must be substantially reduced. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe was right to say that we cannot eliminate means-testing—we are talking about balance—but the pendulum has swung much too far towards the means-testing option, so one element of the consensus must be less reliance on means-testing. I served as a junior Minister in my right hon. and learned Friend's Treasury team and as I listened to what he said I recognised the scepticism that he has always displayed, both in and out of office, about huge spending ambitions, but more generous basic benefits must inevitably be part of the overall package.

The area of uncertainty on which I want to focus my concluding remarks is the role to be played by the increase in retirement age. I agree with those who say that increasing the retirement age must inevitably be part of the total package. It is impossible to sketch a solution to the pensions problem that does not involve the majority of people contributing more to their pension scheme by working longer.

I have several points to make on the issue. There is a huge danger that we conduct an old-style political debate on it and imagine that the decision can only be collective, that we have to meet in Parliament and make a decision about the age at which people should retire in the world of the future. That is wholly contrary to the implications of the choice agenda that both sides of the House broadly agree should be part of our future social policy planning. We need to recognise that today's citizens expect to be able to make more of those choices for themselves and that our role as policymakers is to ensure that there is a structure that allows them to do that, consistent both with their objectives and with their wider obligations to the society in which they live.

At a quick reading, I think we still need to think through some of the implications of emerging pensions policy in terms of what the world will look like when voters and individuals expect increasingly to have a bigger influence on the decisions.

[Mr. Dorrell]

At one level, of course, this is very simple: if people retire early, they must expect a less generous pension; if they retire late, they expect a more generous pension because they have saved longer and will live for a shorter period in retirement. However, that is not good enough. It is based on a key assumption, which is simply not true, that all of us as individuals make decisions about how we provide for our retirement in a fog of complete ignorance about what our life expectancy will be in retirement and what the quality of life that we can enjoy is likely to be in retirement.

I referred in my declaration of interest to the fact that I am a director and a shareholder of a company with a private sector pension scheme. We are undertaking reforms of that scheme. One of the things that strikes me in talking to people about their plans for their own retirement is how realistic they are about their life expectancy and how it is influenced by a number of things in their lives that they know but are completely unknown to the actuaries—for example, how long their parents and grandparents lived, what life choices they have made in their own lives and whether they are smokers or non-smokers. Those are elements of knowledge that people have when they make such decisions for themselves, and they do, in fact, influence the choices that they make. For us to seek to make public policy on the assumption that it is not quite nice to think about those issues is to run the serious risk that we shall make policy that is unable to accommodate the choices that people want to make about their own lives.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): My right hon. Friend is making a cogent speech, but is there not another element that has not yet been considered in the debate? During the past seven years, the Government have taken on a large number of extra public sector employees, who have significant pension contributions. We are all finding that our police and fire budgets are under pressure because of those increased contributions. Is that not something that we must consider very seriously in the future if we are to afford present pensions?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend makes an important point in referring to the multiplier in our public funding commitments. We must consider the funding implications not only of the choices that we make about the state retirement pension, but of what are essentially choices in the private sector in relation to other employment groups, because the groups to whom he refers are those for whom the public sector picks up the employer's obligation, which is privatised elsewhere, so he is entirely right.

In a world where people expect to make these choices increasingly for themselves, using information that they know and that we have traditionally not regarded as relevant to pension decision making, we have to extend our understanding of what it means to base pensions policy on individual choice. I want to mention something that is hugely sensitive, hugely dangerous and, to my knowledge, is never mentioned in the context of pension policy development: the impact of the improving understanding of genetics.

If we are to make choices about how long we will save and how long we expect to live in retirement, the idea that we can do so blind to the knowledge that is now available to us about genetically influenced life expectancy seems a bit like living in a world with nuclear arms and preferring them not to be there. That reminds me a bit of the Victorians who, it is said, used to put skirts around the legs of their pianos because it was not decent to look at them. I must say that I always suspect that that is a proverbial story.

If we are to make real choices, informed choices—to pick up a phrase that was used earlier—we must understand the reality that people in the real world use all the elements I have described to make decisions about how long they will work and how long they expect to live in retirement. If we work through the implications of real personal choice about when people will retire, we realise that we have a considerable way to go before we reach a workable set of policy structures.

3.59 pm

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). He ended up referring to choice, and I, too, shall cover that issue later in my speech. Unlike the Opposition Front-Bench spokesperson, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), the right hon. Gentleman put forward an intellectually coherent case and differentiated between the situation facing pensions and that facing pensioners. They are obviously linked but, for reasons of life expectancy and lifestyle choices that he and others have mentioned, the question as to the future of pensions as saving vehicles must be separated intellectually from the position of pensioners—both those today and prospective pensioners.

The debate is about an Opposition motion, but I shall begin on a point that the hon. Member for Havant did not cover when he opened the debate. Surprisingly for a man who is reputed to have two brains, his approach lacked intellectual coherence. For example, he castigated the Government about means-testing, but he wants to keep the pension credit. It appears that, under Conservative proposals, means-testing would wither, but the pension credit would stay. However, a key plank of the pension credit is means-testing, and rightly so.

The hon. Gentleman produced figures and a 10-point plan—I am sorry, an eight-point plan; there may be a couple of points more now—that he hardly dealt with today, except after questions raised by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), the spokesman for the Liberal Democrats. The hon. Member for Havant opened the debate on a Conservative motion and he is one of the authors of the eight-point plan, but he totally resiled from it and hardly mentioned it. He did not offer a coherent way forward and he did not defend or explain the plan. In particular, and perhaps for understandable reasons, he did not explain that some of the proposals in the eight- point plan would benefit the most well-off in our society the most. That is not a suitable way forward for pensions or for pensioners.

The hon. Gentleman said nothing about women pensioners. That is a huge problem, and it is very belatedly being recognised, partly through sterling work from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird).

The hon. Gentleman also gave figures on economic inactivity that struck me as extraordinary. I question them, to put it mildly. The labour force participation rate in the United Kingdom has gone up markedly in recent years, but the motion refers to "economic inactivity" and he spoke about growing or static economic inactivity. That is comparing an absolute figure—I think that he gave a figure of 7.39 million—with the relative figure that one should use because the work force have grown markedly, partly because we are an ageing population, as has been repeatedly said in the debate.

The Conservative party's proposals for restoring the link between pensions and earnings, attractive as the concept may be to many of us, do not add up. As I understood it, the hon. Member for Havant more or less admitted in response to questions from the hon. Member for Northavon that there is a £500 million hole, but suggested that we should worry about that in the second term of a Conservative Government, if we ever got one. In a way, he is right: there is a big question mark as to when there might ever be a second term of a Conservative Government. The pendulum swings and, no doubt, it will happen, but the pension debate will have moved on by then.

On his eight-point plan, the hon. Gentleman spoke about scrapping the obligation to use savings to purchase an annuity at the age of 75. I realise that it is a contentious issue. It was raised forcefully by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) in his excellent and interesting speech. Although I did not agree with all of it, he referred to the private Member's Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill). People who have funds in retirement plans and hold the funds without an annuity after the age of 65 have had tax relief on the funds while they were accruing and on the contributions that they put into them. There is a risk that unless society says to them, as a quid pro quo, that they should buy an annuity, they could blow the money and be dependent on—hey, we are back to it—means-tested state benefits. That is the concern. It might or might not happen, but it is reasonable for society to say, as a quid pro quo, that at 75 they must get an annuity.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve on the Work and Pensions Committee with the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps I can help him with the figures cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) that he was questioning. The figures came from the Government's labour market statistics for September 2004, which were produced by the Office for National Statistics. They show that in the three months up to July 2004, the total number of 16 to 24-year-olds who were not in work or full-time education was 1.069 million. My hon. Friend was referring to the Government's figures.

Rob Marris: The hon. Member for Havant certainly did refer to that figure, but I was talking about the figure of something like 7.93 million—I recall that from memory, so it might be wrong—that he cited regarding overall economic inactivity. I was not talking about the figure to which the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) referred. The fact that the hon. Gentlemen have been talking about figures from that three-month period shows a classic difficulty with the pension debate, given that we are talking about a possible pensions settlement and consensus for the next 30 or 40 years.

Andrew Selous: I shall be more specific and go back to the figure of some 7 million. The same September 2004 labour market statistics from the ONS showed that there were 7.6 million economically inactive people in 1997, but that that figure has now increased to 7.85 million.

Rob Marris: I know from serving with the hon. Gentleman on the Select Committee that he is at least as adept at maths as me—he might have a calculator in his pocket, but I cannot do the calculations on my feet. He is talking about a situation in which the figure of 7.6 million people increased by 250,000 to 7.85 million over an eight-year period, although I hazard a guess—it is an informed guess, but it might be wrong—that the overall labour force has increased by a greater proportion over that time. Economic inactivity has thus fallen proportionately overall, although it might well be true that the absolute figure has increased from 7.6 million to 7.85 million. However, if we consider the whole work force and prospective work force in our society, which includes the economically inactive, economic inactivity has proportionately fallen in the United Kingdom over the past seven years.

Mr. Waterson: May I reassure the hon. Gentleman about a point that he made regarding my party's policy to liberate pensioners from compulsory annuitisation? Our policy makes it clear that people would not be able to dissipate their pension funds below levels at which they would incur a charge on the public purse.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point and I am grateful for the clarification.

Sir John Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman referred to my Bill and said that people would be able to extract from their pension pots money that had enjoyed tax relief, and blow it all. They could not extract it without paying tax on it, so there is no question of people being able to receive tax relief at one end and not having to pay tax when money is taken out at the other.

Rob Marris: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because I was not aware of that fact, although I was talking about the general situation rather than the specific provisions of his Bill. I shall rethink the issue after hearing those two interventions, but I am not saying that I shall change my mind.

As I said earlier, the hon. Member for Havant expanded little on the official Opposition's eight-point plan, so I thought that I should touch on its suggestions. The third proposal is a lifetime savings account in which Government contributions would remain intact to help during retirement, although personal savings could be withdrawn provided that they were replaced. Such a system already exists, and I participated in it when I lived in Canada. The scheme is called the registered retirement savings plan, although I am not sure whether the Conservative's proposal is on all fours with it. Under the system, people receive tax relief on contributions made to a RRSP up to a ceiling. They may withdraw money from the fund before retirement, but in a similar way to that mentioned by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West regarding annuities, they must pay tax on it at the appropriate marginal rate of income tax for the year in which it is withdrawn.

The scheme worked well for me. I put money in when I was earning a good wage and took it out when I was a student. I had a low taxable income and a low marginal rate of tax. That system can work, but it is not a panacea and there are difficulties, as those who look at the Canadian experience will find. In times of economic downturn, people tend to pull out loads of money from their registered retirement savings plan. That can cause problems with the investment market and so on, and can cause problems for them later on in their life when they might wish to use the money for retirement.

The fourth part of the Conservative's eight-point plant is for longevity bonds, which the Government would issue to help pension providers—the institutions—insure against the risk of providing a pensioner with an annual income for life. If I understand the proposal correctly, that strikes me as nutty. It asks the Government to underwrite huge amounts of private pension liabilities. It amounts to the semi-nationalisation of private pension provision, which is the last thing I would expect from a Conservative party and I do not think that it would work.

What I think would work is allowing companies to promote their pension schemes to employees, which is also a Conservative proposal. A strange situation arose from 1988, when the Conservative Government changed the legislation so that employers could no longer force employees, as a condition of their employment, to join the company pension scheme. Many of us said at the time that that was a mistake. Looking back on it 16 years later, it was clearly a mistake. I am glad that the Conservatives are proposing to reverse it to some extent by at least allowing companies to promote pension schemes. We should take it further by having an opt-out approach, which the hon. Member for Northavon mentioned and attributed to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell). Companies could assume that someone was in the pension scheme unless that employee specifically opted out.

A proposal in the eight-point plan with which I do not agree is having no limit on senior executive pension funds. The Government proposed a £1.4 million pot, as hon. Members will remember. That went up after discussions to a tax-free pot of £1.5 million. Even with today's annuity rates and the figures that people might aspire to save, £1.5 million is a huge amount. On today's rates, it would provide a 65-year-old man with £70,000 a year as a pension. Those people are the very rich, but the Conservatives, who as we all know have an affinity for the very rich—it is nice to see them being true to that every now and again because it helps socialists like me—say, "We should lift that; £70,000 a year for a pension? Not enough. Lift the cap." I disagree. The cap is too high as it is. It was extremely generous of the Government to budge upwards rather than downwards from £1.4 million.

Mr. Waterson: The hon. Gentleman keeps picking out bits of our policies without explaining them in their context. I am sure he appreciates that in return for removing that cap, our policy is that the same scheme on the same terms should be available to all employees of a company. There is no longer the idea of senior executives having their own cosy little arrangement. It is what we call our fat kittens as well as fat cats policy.

Rob Marris: Whoopee-do. Is not that a great balancing concession from the Conservative party? The hon. Gentleman is right that I did not mention it, but I am aware of it. I take it as being almost nothing. Fat kittens? Great. The tiny pitter-patter of kittens is not a balancing concession for what I regard as a social inequity and inequality, although he clearly does.

The eighth point in the Conservative proposals is—no doubt the hon. Gentleman will correct me if I have got this wrong—to do with orphan assets. They want to nick those as well, but there are two considerations. First, orphan assets belong to someone in a legal sense, although it may be impossible or extremely difficult to trace those to whom they belong. Secondly, they are one of those things that lots of people would like to get their hands on. It becomes a bit of a panacea: "We've got a problem here with financing. Let's use the orphan assets." That proposal comes from a party which, when in government, stole the bank to which I belonged—the Trustee Savings bank—and flogged it off. I never received a penny, as the Conservatives stole £1 billion from its members.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): How did my hon. Friend get £1 billion?

Rob Marris: I did not have £1 billion personally, but members of the bank must have had that sum collectively, as that is was it was flogged off for. However, like many Conservative sales of the family silver, it was probably underpriced for a quick sale.

The history of pensions in the past 30 years shows that there have been questionable acts and mistakes by both parties. The dividend tax credit could, with the benefit of hindsight, have been introduced differently, although the £5 billion figure that is bandied about is suspect. When that tax regime was introduced, corporation tax was reduced. I am happy to be corrected, but advance corporation tax, which had been knocking around for years, allowed people to keep a chunk of money. The £5 billion figure is therefore not correct and neither is the £70 billion at a 7 per cent. discount, invented by the right hon. Member for Charnwood.

We should learn from past mistakes and problems, but we must also learn from our current circumstances. Our Government introduced a regime of increased means-testing, which I support, to address pensioner poverty. If we want to deliver resources to the poorest pensioners we must use means-testing. Of course, there is the problem of people who choose not to apply for means-tested benefits or who do not do so out of ignorance, but the solution is certainly not to abolish the whole system, as the Conservatives believe. In my constituency, the average pension credit is about £44 a week, and we need to try harder to find out why some people have not applied for it. They may have chosen not to apply—choice was an issue raised earlier in our debate.

Means-testing is a catch-up mechanism. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe talked about the condition in which his Government left the state pension system in 1997. He mentioned a pension of £69 a week, and said that affordability was key. I accept that it is important, but so is poverty. The Conservative Government placed too much emphasis on affordability, because they would not raise taxes, even though they were borrowing money like crazy and pushing up Government debt. To achieve affordability, they increased pensioner poverty, which has not disappeared. Figures on the extent of the problem have been bandied about today, but most observers—but not all, given what has been said in our debate—appreciate that in the past seven years, particularly the last four or five, pensioner poverty has been significantly reduced. There is still a long way to go, but the statistics show that the trend is moving in the right direction. That was not achieved deus ex machine, but was the result of conscious policy decisions by this Government that were put before Parliament and accepted before being enacted in legislation. I fully support those decisions to tackle pensioner poverty and abolish it if we can, just as I support our efforts to tackle child poverty. I accept that in both cases there is still a long way to go, but to say so or argue that we could have done more should not detract from how far we have come as a result of conscious policy decisions.

The expectations that people of my generation, who are in their 40s, have of retirement are unlikely to be fulfilled unless their attitude to saving changes markedly. We know people five to 10 years older than us, many of whom worked in public services, who retired on a full pension in their 50s. They benefited from an uprating to the sum they would have received at 65, as pseudo-retirement packages were used to disguise redundancies that were made in the 1980s and 1990s. People of my generation look at their older cousins and siblings who received such packages and believe that they, too, can retire in their 50s. That will not be possible unless my generation is prepared to save an awful lot of money.

Those of us who take an interest in pensions—I may hitherto have been in a minority of the population—expect that one's pension should provide two thirds of one's income in retirement: that is, two thirds of the income that one had while working, if employed. Nobody knows where that figure comes from—it may or may not be suitable—but it is treated as though it is written in stone. Personally, I am not sure whether I will need two thirds of my income when I am retired, but that should be my choice. The Government are at last, albeit belatedly, ensuring that age discrimination legislation goes on to the statute book by December 2006. I hope that this Government are re-elected in order to do that, because a Conservative Government would have a real problem with it as it is part of the Amsterdam treaty.

That will affect people's ability to carry on working if they choose to do so. The right hon. Member for Charnwood talked about retirement age. The average retirement age may rise, or may be rising now, but we need to separate that from the state retirement age. The Government have been clear—I fully support them on this—that the state retirement age should not go above 65. We are already starting to phase women's retirement age from 60 to 65. The state retirement age does not need to go above 65.

In today's climate, we must be aware that final salary schemes in the private sector will wither and die. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe adverted to that. They are sustainable in the public sector, although one has to look closely at their funding, but they are unsustainable, both politically and socially, in the private sector. A final salary scheme in the private sector says to the employee member, "You will have certainty as to how much you will get when you retire", but for many people, sadly, that certainty has already been done away with. Employees will increasingly wish to trade that supposed certainty for the certainty of a pot of money that has their name on it under a defined contribution scheme—or money purchase scheme, as they used to be called. That is part of the changing pensions landscape.

The question of compulsion looms because, according to Turner's excellent report, 9 million people are not saving adequately for their retirement. The reason he gives is that—as Labour Members, and probably those on both sides of the House, have long recognised but not necessarily translated into action—they cannot afford to save. That is not because they are wilful or profligate and want to blow all their money now. A tiny minority might fall into that category, but the vast majority cannot afford to save; it was ever thus. We already have some compulsory provision for those who are employed: national insurance contributions.

The Turner report talks about four alternative scenarios in relation to pension incomes in years to come: first, that pensioners will become poorer relative to the rest of society; secondly, that taxes or national insurance contributions devoted to pensions must rise; thirdly, that savings must rise; and fourthly, that average retirement ages must rise. As I understand it, it is not necessarily the case that only one will apply—there could be a mixture. For example, average retirement ages could rise at the same time as savings. Nevertheless, they encapsulate the kinds of choices that our society faces in relation to prospective pensioners who are mostly currently employed, although some are unemployed, self-employed or carers.

I will now—briefly, because I realise that other Members wish to speak—put forward an immodest proposal to sort out the pensions mess. [Interruption.] I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) has come in especially for this part of my speech. I am sure that my proposal will not command instant support, but it may prove to be a rolling stone that gathers moss.

The current private pension system is predicated on tax incentives for people to save for their retirement. If one asks the Department for Work and Pensions, as I have publicly done as a member of the Select Committee—it is in our proceedings from last year—what evidence there is that tax incentives actually encourage people to save, the Department replies that "there is little evidence that tax incentives can significantly increase the overall level of saving".

It goes on to say that "there is a degree of consensus in the research that there is little evidence of tax incentives increasing the level of savings."

[Rob Marris]

To counterbalance that, the Department for Work and Pensions also told us in the Committee, following questioning from me, that although there was little evidence, as I quoted, that tax incentives increase the overall level of saving, they can significantly affect its allocation. So does an individual who is not one of the 9 million who cannot afford to save actually save in a pension fund or in some other form of savings? Well, tax incentives may direct savings into pensions.

The reason, as I understand it, that we as a society encourage people through tax incentives, even though they are not very efficient, to save for their retirement is that we do not want people living in poverty in their retirement. But those who are saving, by and large—not all of them—will not be living in poverty in their retirement anyway. The tax relief regime, which costs £14 billion a year in forgone tax revenue, is highly regressive, and I have to say to my Government as a progressive Government that we should not continue to support it. I have said it in the House before but it is worth repeating: half the benefit—that is, £7 billion out of that £14 billion—is received by the top 10 per cent. of taxpayers.

It is unlikely that more than one or two of the top 10 per cent. of taxpayers would blow everything deliberately and rely on means-tested benefits when they got older. They would be saving anyway for their post-employed life—presumably after the age of 65—just as many right hon. and hon. Members have savings outside their pension schemes. Because we are well paid, we can afford to save.

The other figure that shows the tax regime to be regressive is the £3.5 billion a year of forgone tax revenue—a quarter of that tax relief—that is claimed by the top 2.5 per cent. of earners. We can hardly get more regressive than that. My immodest proposal is to take it all off them, including all of us right hon. and hon. Members who are presumably getting tax relief, except perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), who I think is already outside the pension scheme because he is above that age. Almost all of us are getting that tax relief. We do not need it. We are earning £57,000 a year, Ministers are earning more, and we are getting tax relief on pension contributions. That is crazy.

My immodest proposal will, I think, take a long time to gather enough support to go through the House, but I ask hon. Members to bear with me. If one added 2 per cent. to national insurance contributions by employees and 2 per cent. to contributions by employers, that would raise £14.2 billion a year. If one abolished the tax relief on pension contributions, which is coincidentally almost the same—£14 billion a year—that would make £28 billion a year.

The minimum income guarantee and pension credit cost £9.9 billion a year and the income tax relief, as I said, is £14 billion. If one got rid of means-tested pensioners benefits and put all those figures together—I am happy to go through them with the Minister—one could have a non-means-tested basic state pension, or a citizens pension as it has been called, not dependent on national insurance contributions or stamps, of £150 a week for a single pensioner and £250 a week for a couple. Other than that, the state could get out of the pensions market. Means-tested benefits such as pension credit could be abolished because the basic pension would be enough to live on.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood referred to choice, and I said that I would return to that subject. Under my proposal, people would have the choice of saving for a richer retirement than £150 a week, but if they choose not to do so, we, as a society, would say, "You will not starve in your retirement. You will get £150 a week." We can afford such a policy.

The Pensions Bill is going through Parliament, and the state is worrying whether eight regimes will become one or two—different parties count them differently. Under my proposal, all we would have to do is carry on regulating saving, which we have done with variable success. One would still expect people to save, but tax relief would not be available and savings would be regulated in a building society, stock market or bank, as they are now. However, the £1.5 million total fund, tax relief on pension contributions and the regulation of pension companies, which is necessary because of the tax benefits, would be cut, which would simplify the regime.

Pensioner poverty would be abolished on those figures. Yes, the cost would be great, but we are rich enough to afford a 2 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions for both employees and employers, which is double the amount that the Government successfully put through this House for the national health service in last year's Finance Bill. Leaving aside demography for one moment, a link with earnings rather than prices would be sustainable because the forgone tax revenue—£14 billion of almost useless tax relief that would go into the pot to pay for the policy—would otherwise rise with earnings, unless the saving rate dropped dramatically, and the 2 per cent. increase in national insurance for employers and employees would also provide increasing sums.

The structural question mark against the proposal is that demographic changes—I cannot remember the figures, but another hon. Member may want to provide them—mean that the ratio of workers to retired people will change adversely in the next 30 to 40 years, particularly as the baby boomers work through the system, as we are starting to.

On current trends, the projected population fall is 3 per cent. by 2050, but we could reverse that trend through immigration. There are enough people in the world—more than 6 billion—so we do not have to rely on the UK fertility rate. The history of the United States, along with that of other countries such as Canada and Australia, shows that net immigration is often beneficial for an economy, particularly—I realise that this point raises some questions—if the labour imported to work and pay for the older population is already educated. The demographic time bomb is not fixed, because it depends on millions of individual decisions by UK couples in the ensuing years. However, if the ratio of workers to retired people did not support my proposal, we could import labour.

I urge the Minister to examine my proposal. I realise that it has some political downsides, but it would provide simplification, get rid of means-testing, get the state out of providing tax incentives on private pensions, and provide enough for people to live on in their old age.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): It is always challenging to listen to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris). I wish that he had not taken 35 minutes to speak, but at least he shows us old Labour philosophy: tax the rich and everything will be all right. We might as well go back to the days of 98 per cent. taxation, which I can remember. That was intended to solve everything, but it did not. It was interesting to hear the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris), who made a thoughtful speech that was worthy of his distinguished predecessor. However, both hon. Members made the mistake of claiming that means-testing was the best way of delivering to poorer pensioners.

All hon. Members are worried about the predicament of pensioners, who continue to be the poorest group in our society. Many are extremely poor and I share the concern for that specific group with everyone in the Chamber. The poorest pensioners also tend to be the oldest and there is a good reason for that. Those who are 75 and older lived through the last war and grew up in the post-war austerity period. People were unable to save for their old age then and we therefore especially need to look after that group. Pensioners who are over 75 should get a higher rate of pension than the rest of us because they could not save. The younger ones—people of my age who grew up in a period of greater prosperity—have been able to save for our retirement. If we have not done that, it is our fault. However, I repeat that we should especially look after pensioners who are over 75.

I disagree with some hon. Members who believe that we should have a higher rate for those who are 75 and over—

Miss Begg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir John Butterfill: I should like to finish the point.

I disagree with hon. Members who believe that the higher rate for those who are 75 and over should roll on for ever, because that would begin to include people, like most of us, who do not need it. The higher rate should be fixed for those who were born in 1930 or before because it would thus be targeted at a special group. I shall give way to the hon. Lady.

Miss Begg: No, the hon. Gentleman has answered the very question that I intended to ask.

Sir John Butterfill: That was prescient.

We also need to look after and provide special treatment for other groups, who, for specific and special reasons, may not have been able to save for retirement. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) mentioned them. However, I disagree with the hon. Members for Wolverhampton, South-West and for Glasgow, Cathcart and, indeed, the Chancellor, that means-testing is the best way in which to provide relief for the remaining poor. It is not.

Of course, the fact that universal benefits go to everybody means that a few very rich people benefit disproportionately. However, the tax system already deals with those people. If the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West feels even more aggressive, he will probably want to increase their overall tax rate. The position can be tackled through the taxation system; such people pay a lot of tax in any case.

Means-testing has two specific problems. Many people do not go through the tests—approximately 2 million people currently do not receive the benefit. That is a serious number, despite the Government's best efforts—and I accept that they have made determined efforts to get people to claim. There is also a profound disincentive to save, which arises out of means-testing. We do not want that downside. Means-testing is expensive and requires many civil servants to administer it. If we scrapped the means test, I doubt whether the "wasted money", in the terms of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West, that goes to the very rich would even approach the cost of conducting the means test, with all the indignity that it involves for those who have to undergo it.

However we dress up the means test and call it an entitlement, it remains an indignity and I therefore do not believe that it is the right way forward. We should have a non-means-tested increase in our pension provision for everybody, to an amount that gives everyone reasonable dignity in old age, and then provide special help for special groups—the very old and others.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): I understand the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument. At present, however, the basic pension credit is at £105. Is not the logic of his argument therefore that the basic pension would need to increase to £105 before there would not be a disincentive to save?

Sir John Butterfill: No, that would not follow precisely, because if we were making special arrangements for special groups not everybody would need to go up to that level. Of course, such a level is being achieved already through the various benefits that are available. All sorts of other benefits are available for those on low incomes. If we add all those up, the money that we would save by not having all sorts of other special benefits—

Miss Begg: The hon. Gentleman seems to be implying that the basic state pension is a universal benefit. We know that it is not—1.5 million people do not have complete national insurance contributions and do not get the basic state pension. What he proposes, therefore, misses out that whole group of people. The pension credit and income guarantee are particularly useful for that group of people, who are often on lower incomes than the basic state pension, and who would continue to need to be means-tested anyway.

Sir John Butterfill: The hon. Lady is absolutely right, and I have said that there are other groups to which we would need to make payments. The people who would not otherwise get anything would have to be included in those payments. The point is that we do not need means-testing to do that.

We should also consider the encouragement of pension saving. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West says that there is no evidence that tax relief encourages people to save. Human nature would lead us to believe otherwise. However, tax relief is not necessarily well targeted at the moment, and perhaps I can refer to that later.

[Sir John Butterfill]

On the problems with private sector pensions and pension funds—at this point I declare my interest because, as hon. Members know, I chair the parliamentary contributory pension fund and I am also chairman of trustees of the pension fund for the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals—[Interruption.] No, I do not think that it is a similar organisation.

A lot of people are making all sorts of allegations as to what is the cause of the private pension crisis. If we go back only about seven years, I remember the Chancellor saying what a wonderful pension system we had, how well funded it was, and how it could easily withstand his £5 billion a year grab. At that time, it did look pretty good, although some underlying problems were about to surface. But the fact was that we had a pension system that was the envy of most of the rest of the world, and it looked very well funded. Two things were wrong with that. First, the investments, which were largely in the stock exchange but were also elsewhere, were growing at an unprecedented rate. People thought that the stock market boom would go on for ever. Why they should think that I do not know, because stock market booms never have done previously, and never will in future. They will always be cyclical. Nothing that any Chancellor, however clever, can do will alter that sad fact.

When the stock market was high, pension funds, including our pension fund and the Treasury, were all getting valuations showing massive surpluses. Employers said, "Oh good, we won't need to put as much money in. We will take a contributions holiday." What my party should have done when it legislated in 1995, and what this Government should subsequently have done, is to say that such pensions holidays should not be lawful. If the scheme actuary says that a certain amount will be needed over time by the employer and the employee, where the employee makes contributions as well, that is how much should go into the fund. However big the temporary surplus, the contributions should continue, assuming that the actuary has got his sums right, which has not always happened.

Had people continued with the sums recommended by their scheme actuaries as opposed to looking at how much was in the piggy bank and thinking that it would be enough for all time, schemes would not be in the trouble that they now claim to be in. We recently had to vote an extra £25 million into the Members' fund, despite the fact that the previous valuation had shown a massive surplus. In fact, that was only a fraction of the saving that successive Governments of both parties have made in failing to put in the amount recommended by the scheme actuary. They thought that the public were getting a good deal, but in the end all these chickens come home to roost.

Successive Governments have created a further problem in attempting to meddle with the investment policies of those charged with looking after the funds. I fundamentally disagree with the structure of the minimum funding requirement introduced by my own party in the Pensions Act 1995. I also disagree with the way in which regulators subsequently, even today, have tried to move people in certain directions of investment. The general trend, fed by the actuarial profession, has been to say that the only safe place for pension money is in bonds—if schemes are in trouble, they should put more money into Government bonds.

Mr. Dorrell: Especially at the peak of the market.

Sir John Butterfill: Yes, when bonds are at the peak of their price and shares are at the bottom. Could anything be madder? Do we normally sell things that are on the floor and buy others to replace them that are on the ceiling? Not if we have any common sense—but that is what the regulators have been urging pension funds and the insurance companies that provide them to do. They have all had to restructure their portfolios in a way that is contrary to common sense if we look at the market as a whole.

Mr. Purchase: Is not this a perfect example of why our pensions are far too precious to leave to the vagaries of fluctuating prices and markets? The stock market mechanism may allocate funds to deserving companies very successfully, but when it comes to our pensions, we should really consider what we could do in a safer, perhaps state-funded way.

Sir John Butterfill: I shall come to that in a moment, if I may.

Our system of regulation has of itself been pernicious. With a falling stock market, the regulators told people to get rid of their shares and buy bonds. What happens in that situation? The price of the bonds goes up, the yield from them goes down and the regulator then says that we have to buy even more bonds and sell more equities, and money is sucked into a black hole with ever decreasing returns and an ever increasing price for bonds. The cost of this is to aggravate the situation in the stock market, as people are selling equities that are already falling, forcing their price down still further and causing regulators to urge that more bonds be bought. It is the policy of the insane—clinically insane.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir John Butterfill: I am conscious that I am now beginning to intrude on other Members' time, so I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not.

We need a far more sensible, broad spread of investment. Although they go up and down, the graph over 50, 60 or 100 years shows that equities continue to go up and are the best form of long-term investment. The difficulty has been that people have taken a short-term, snapshot view. When things are good they think them too good, and when they are bad they think them too bad. What we need is a sensible system of regulation. Sadly, we have not had that from previous Governments or from this one.

We must now encourage more people to save, and I will return to how, in my view, we should structure such tax relief as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West might be prepared to accept—or not. The problem—he correctly identified it, in a way—is that most of the tax relief goes to the richest. That happens because of the way it is structured. If tax relief went instead to everyone, but principally to those at the bottom of the pile, that would be a much better bet. Some people will never be able to afford to save; others will, but modest amounts. The big problem is persuading people who do not have a lot of money to save something. We can go either for compulsion or for giving them an incentive to save.

Although I applaud some of the well-thought-out initiatives of my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), they do not deal with those people who make very modest savings, find themselves locked into buying an annuity and then pay tax on the small amount of additional income that they managed to save. Concentrating tax relief on the lowest portion of income—for example, by making the first £4,000 tax-free—would be of significant benefit to poorer savers and would give them an incentive to save. By applying the relief that way around, we would make a difference and provide a real incentive for poorer people to save. At the same time, we would remove quite a lot of people from means-tested benefits—if they are retained—so instead of having to come cap in hand to the state for their money, they would have their own. That would give much greater dignity to poorer pensioners and provide a real incentive for those poorer workers who have had the courage to save for their old age.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): It is a privilege and pleasure, as always, to follow the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill). He made a thoughtful and interesting speech that has given us real food for thought. His suggestions on taxation and saving incentives were perhaps more progressive than even Labour Members sometimes dare contemplate, and I congratulate him in that regard.

I first heard about what has become known as the demographic time bomb in the mid-1980s, when I was examining high unemployment and the effects of unemployment. I did not do very much about it then, other than to attend a few conferences here and there and moan a lot. In 1995, I wrote a paper on unemployment and its effects. I also developed my thinking on the relationship between work and people's ability to save for their pensions, and the relationship between the age at which one might become unemployed, and what might happen during the rest of one's life. I considered such issues from the point of view of people in their mid-30s and 40s—in other words, those who were in work, or who could be in work. At that time, unemployment was very high.

The correlation between employment and people's ability to save for their retirement is pointed out in the Turner report. Unlike others, I have not scrutinised the report in detail. I congratulate those who have, as it involves quite a bit of reading. In fact, I have given it only a cursory glance, and it certainly deserves a great deal more attention than I have yet been able to give it. What I want to bring to today's debate is how my own thinking has developed over the years and how what is in the Turner report accords with my own experience. Something that we should consider—I have not so far found it in the report—is not just the relationship between work, retirement and our ability to save, but the other social changes that also impinge on people's life choices and what they decide to do.

When I first became aware of the problem—and, still earlier, when I was a young woman having my own children—people tended to start families early in life, but the decision to start a family is now taken much later. Those decisions affect people's ongoing life choices, their ability to save and the subsequent decisions that they take. We also find that young people—I certainly include my own family—want to stay at home for considerably longer than they used to, so that their mothers can continue to do their ironing and washing and can save on their behalf while they go out and have a very good time, thank you! I make no complaint—honestly, son! It is a fact that young people stay at home considerably longer than my generation would have considered doing. I recently heard of a son saying that he was not yet ready to make a commitment—and he was only 28.

Those sorts of considerations and social changes will obviously impact on people's decisions about their future lives. Many younger people are not thinking about what they may be doing in the immediate future and they are certainly not thinking in the longer term about what to do for their retirement. That is the group of people who worry me most. I believe that we have spent much time, quite rightly, thinking about people who are pensioners today and how we should provide for them. Some people were left out of the pensions decisions. Before the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West leaves the Chamber—

Sir John Butterfill: Not yet.

Kali Mountford: I want to agree with the hon. Gentleman on another point—that decisions about pension holidays reduced the available funds and affected some of the people in the greatest need. He made a genuine and fair point that we should consider using a particular date or time rather than a particular age as the basis for pension payments. His points were well made. We will all be affected—even those 21 and 28-year-olds that I mentioned earlier. It is right to say that we owe the older generation a great deal and that they should be cared for.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West on one point. Adopting a targeted approach to pension provision for those who were unable to provide for themselves was the right and proper thing to do. I recall encountering old age pensioners in my constituency who were blue with cold. That was always wrong, and I am pleased that I do not have the same experience now. Some of my pensioners—including those in the age group that the hon. Gentleman mentioned—now tell me that they have never been so well off. I am pleased about that, though it does not mean that they could not be better off or that there is nothing more to do. What I fear now is the expectation among young people that the old-style pension schemes will continue for ever and that everyone of pensionable age will somehow be all right.

That leads me to a completely different conclusion from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris). I believe that his socialist analysis of pension contributions misses out half the equation. The analysis was always "from each according to his means, to each according to his needs", but my hon. Friend is dealing with the needs and not the means. Let me explain the main problem with his analysis. With all rights must come responsibilities, so where are people's responsibilities to contribute? We already have a generation of young people who have not yet realised the significance and importance of providing for their own old age. They should already be doing so.

Simply saying that we can tinker a bit more with the state system is not enough, though I want to be fair to the Liberal Democrats, who have given a lot of thought to their idea of a citizen's pension. Some members of my own party have done the same. I think that there is a problem with that approach, however, and it has to do with responsibility. It is a question of means: how do we draw all that money together? That flaw is present in all the ideas presented today. We could go through all of them with a fine-toothed comb to work out whether all the sums add up, but even then what I perceive to be the central question—each individual's responsibility to contribute to state or to private provision—would not be resolved.

Miss Begg: Does my hon. Friend agree that guaranteeing everyone a basic state pension would mean that the responsibility that she has described would consist of people providing extra income for themselves? She has said that people now expect a much higher standard of living in old age than a basic state pension could ever provide.

Kali Mountford: I have considered that proposition a lot, and my difficulty with it is that the present national insurance contribution system has become the consensus on which our pensions system is built. I dispute the earlier assertion that everyone has a fund on which they can draw, but people believe that the national insurance system is fair. They see a link between the amount contributed over a lifetime and the size of the pension received at the end of the process.

I have always felt that the national insurance contribution system was somewhat misnamed, as no fund actually exists under what is essentially a pay-as-you-go system. The present system has many flaws, and I have even toyed with the thought that it should be discarded, but its great value lies in the relationship between contribution and recipient. Over many years, people have grown attached to the perceived fairness of the system. We must be careful if we are going to play around with that connection.

I am very drawn to the proposal by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that we should convert the present pay-as-you-go system into a funded scheme. That could offer a way forward that people would accept, as it takes with it the most important parts of the current system, on which the consensus has been built. Under my right hon. Friend's plan, each person would be responsible for contributing to the state pension, and for making any additional provision that he or she may choose.

Mrs. Lait: I want to press the hon. Lady a little on this matter. Will she expand on the fate of the national insurance contribution? Does she expect that all of that contribution would be transferred into a funded scheme, or only a proportion? If the latter—and we must remember that national insurance pays for employment and sickness benefits, among other things—would a funded scheme such as she has described be sufficient to provide a comfortable retirement?

Kali Mountford: No, I do not believe that it would be sufficient. The hon. Lady makes a fair and proper analysis of the current national insurance scheme.

One problem with the proposal from the Liberal Democrats is that it would not be possible to devote funds to the NHS, for example, as we would not be able to see where the funding for a universal citizenship pension would come from. I therefore believe that only a proportion of the national insurance contributions could be used in the funded scheme that I have described, and that such a scheme would have to be carefully costed. It would take time for the funds in such a scheme to be built up to a sufficient level, and the scheme would not be able to provide sufficient funds for people to live on without additional income from some other source. I remind the House, however, that that is the case with the present state pension, which has only ever been the foundation stone for the rest of the pensions structure. It has never been enough for people to live on with no additional income, and anybody who did live in such a fashion would certainly be pension poor.

Nobody should be on that level of income, and no one needs to be. That is one of the messages that should emerge from this debate today. Although we must always make sure that people entitled to a benefit receive all of it, to deal with that argument simply by denigrating the benefit will not take us any further either. We need confidence in whatever system emerges from our lengthy considerations of both the state pension and the private pension system. The consensus that was built up lasted for many generations. It was built up before the second world war, and after the war a clear vision for the future emerged. Everybody knew where they stood and the system that was introduced stood the test of time. Whatever we do now must stand the same test of time as that system. I do not want to discard what was good in that system in one go. Instead, we should see how we can adapt and build on that system for a future pension scheme that is robust in the future.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend really believe that there has been a consensus? We have seen different pension Bills introduced by the parties after every election. Does my hon. Friend want to see a genuine consensus, instead of the posturing that is going on between the three parties before the general election? The eventual winner will make a decision that will be overturned before it reaches the end of its lifetime of some 30 years. There is a real need for a consensus, but we have not had one yet. Should we not use this debate to ask the three parties to agree on a consensus?

Kali Mountford: I stand suitably admonished and I shall clarify my point. The consensus is outside the Chamber. People agreed that the system was fair for decades. In the Chamber, we will always have political posturing, but we also have the possibility of a growing consensus. As we look forward to the next review and presentation by the Turner commission, we should reach some agreement on considering its findings together. The other parties claim that the Government are tossing the issue aside until after the general election in order to avoid making a decision, but this is far too important an issue for such an approach.

That approach has been possible in the past with other Government policies. I do not know if I dare mention Dearing, but the House came to a consensus view that Dearing would be considered after an election. Everyone signed up to that, but not everyone was happy with the interpretation after the event. In any event, it was possible for the House to consider a policy issue collectively. This is another issue that is important enough for the House to take that approach again. We should be able to take the next stage of Turner, together with the details that have been presented so far—they provide a good analysis of how we have arrived at where we are—and look at some clear pointers for the future.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who is not at present in his place, simplified the conclusions in the report neatly and elegantly. The report does not go through all the various social changes that affect decision making for families, but it does point out the glaringly obvious about the way forward. We must look at the age of retirement, the contributions we make privately or the contributions we make publicly. All of those factors interact with each other to provide a conclusion about the way forward. At this stage, we will obviously have a variety of views about how the cake can be carved up sensibly, but at the end of this debate it would be useful if the House could come to the common conclusion that Turner is a way forward. It has provided a good analysis as a basis for our decisions, as well as some clear pointers for the way forward.

We should say not that one of those three factors will be the cornerstone for pensions for decades to come, but that all of them will. In my report in 1995, I considered an idea that was popular at the time—I did not think of it all by myself—the flexible decade of retirement. We no longer need to talk about flexible decades, but we should look at flexible retirement. Why do we need a fixed date? Obviously, in respect of provision, we need a point at which entitlement should start, but it does not have to start on a fixed day. We could extend it a decade or so into the future so that people can make choices.

The crucial point, however, is that those choices must be informed, and the ability to make such choices has been severely limited for some time. The Government made an attempt to consider how we could provide people with information about their national insurance contributions—how much had been accrued and what that meant for their pensions—but we need to go further. We need to be able to inform people early in their lives not only about their national insurance contributions but also about their contributions to private, personal pension schemes. They need to know what it would mean if they retired at the age of 50, 60, 70 or 80, if that is their choice.

People need to know what their decisions will mean, when they choose between taking a holiday in Spain or putting a little more in their pension fund. Do they really need the holiday, especially if it is their second one that year? At present, some young people decide to take that second holiday in Spain, and I urge them carefully to reconsider such decisions. A small extra contribution to their pension fund now could give them extra comfort for a year or so in their old age. As they sit on the beach, they might not realise that they could be doing the same thing at the age of 70, instead of sitting over a two-bar fire wondering why they took that extra holiday when they were 28.

People need to be making these real-life decisions. Some are doing so already, but they are making some mistakes and we need to give them advice. I congratulate the Government on starting to think about how we can put money into a fund. At this stage, the Government are looking to trade unions to give that advice. There is nothing wrong with that, but I am concerned that some employers do not yet have trade unions on their premises. I hope that the trade union movement will sell the idea of pensions advice as a means of recruiting more members.

Such advice is certainly necessary so that people can make choices. I hope that they can make sensible, reasonable choices to maintain themselves. If they do not, compulsion will have to be the way forward. We should then have to make decisions a decade from now, when a decade's fewer people would be in a proper pension scheme, with a decade's less contributions. That would be folly.

5.13 pm

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): As Chair of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions, I am privileged in that I have the chance to get access to Ministers and to discuss these matters more often than other Members. I realise that colleagues want to contribute and that it is an official Opposition day, so I shall save my speech for another day and quickly make a couple of points.

The debate has been interesting and fascinating. It is the first time I have heard socialist dialectic discussed—by the hon. Members for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) and for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), both of whom think about such things carefully. That was a first for me and I have been a Member for more than 20 years. It was certainly a good thing.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) in his absence for being a bit prickly in an earlier intervention. Earlier this week, when I heard that a day was to be devoted to pensions, I was overjoyed. I thought that a full-day's debate would be a good chance to discuss something philosophically and strategically different. We have a new Secretary of State and a new opportunity, with the most comprehensive report that I have ever come across. It is certainly not the first report on the subject but it is the most comprehensive, drawing together all the evidence.

The report may not tell those of us in the Chamber who have studied the issue for a long time much that is blindingly new, but it brings the information together most effectively. It also gives the public the chance to enter the argument. We all know too much for our own good and we need to be very careful about that. Explaining pensions in a way that people can understand is difficult.

Talk of £57 billion does not mean an awful lot in real terms to ordinary people. Screaming headlines about black holes here and there, huge sums and arcane terminology turn people off. People in my constituency are already reconciled to the fact that they must work for longer. That is absolutely inevitable, so we must be realistic about that.

The extent of change is shown by what has happened in the course of one generation—my lifetime. My father was a railwayman all his life. He went to work at 16 and stopped at 62, after some bad health. He received a railway occupational pension and then died. My son and heir has just finished two rather expensive Glasgow university courses, at the hands of his parents, and has started work at 24. He works in the financial sector, so he is planning to retire at 55, and he will then live for another 30 or 35 years. In the space of one generation, that is a huge change, and we must respond to the extent of it when trying to make policy now for the next 50 years.

I do not care who is to blame for some of the decisions—some good, some bad—that have been made, but one thing is common to them: most of the policies were piecemeal; they were responses to the things that were going on at the time that people felt had to be addressed. Certainly some of them had to be addressed. I think that some means-testing, which is an important element in all this, was essential and that the Government had to introduce it to cope with the problem, but whether it is safe to found the policy for all time coming on that—I was pleased to read the reported remarks that the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions made at the party conference—is a very different and separate question.

This is an important opportunity. Ministers can serve the House and the debate best by keeping an open mind. The Secretary of State's response to my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) is an important sign of that, and we and, I hope, the rest of the House will respond to it, as this is an important debate.

We also have to use the election, although its timing is uncertain. The electorate have something say about the issue. We must try to get the job done of simplifying the argument into understandable concepts—I believe that Turner does so—such as whether the solution lies in more tax, longer working lives or greater savings. People can understand discussions like that. We politicians—the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) nearly got there during his interesting speech—should be explaining our priorities by theme, schematically, almost in terms of the philosophy of pensions. We should be explaining where we want to be in 50 years, which of the three elements to which Turner has adverted we want to use and what priority we should give to them.

Of course, parties must have manifestos, and it is too late to change them. Our manifesto is already more or less cut and dried—I am not giving away any state secrets about that—and I guess that so is everyone else's, more or less. I am not daft or naive enough to think that there will be no party political exchange and party political advantage sought in the debate that we must have, but we must try to get the public engaged in a discussion that is meaningful to them and that can feed back into our debate and the decision making that will flow from the election.

My second point is the need for simplification, simplification, simplification. The job has been started. I did not serve on the Committee that considered the Pensions Bill, and I am grateful for that. I am also grateful for the content of the Pensions Bill in so far as it does simplify. I recognise that it is a good start, but it is only a start. If Ministers are to offer the best service that they can on this subject in the fullness of time, more work should be occasioned in that direction. Inevitably, trying to produce a system that people can understand, discuss and make reasoned choices about is an important part of that question.

This debate has been useful and I congratulate the Conservative Opposition on initiating it. I hope that we will have more like it, and I look forward to the Turner report informing such debates positively in future.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I, too, am pleased to take part in today's debate. Like the Chairman of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions—I keep thinking of him as my right hon. Friend—when I saw the motion on the Order Paper, I thought that this would be a chance to debate the future of UK pensions and something that would be robust, intellectual and possibly even provide us with some new thinking about a way forward, around which all hon. Members could perhaps begin to build consensus. This is something for the long term; it is not a quick fix.

I, too, was disappointed by the opening speech of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts). It was party political knockabout. I appreciate that that is part of the style of Opposition day debates but the day after the publication of one of the biggest reports into the structure of, and what is happening in, the pension system is the day to put such arguments aside and to consider what we might do for the future. We should consider the issues with which we should engage. Many hon. Members have begun to float ideas and, in the best possible sense, there has been disagreement even among Members on the same side as they have tried out new ideas. However, there has also been consensus across the Floor.

I commend the speech made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, which was thoughtful and laid out the parameters of what we should be discussing. Much as it pains me to say something nice about the Liberals, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) also made a thoughtful contribution to the debate.

The pension credit has come in for much criticism today, but it is worth remembering that it was introduced to deal with the specific problems that we inherited when we came to power in 1997. Old age pensioners were dying from hypothermia or going blind because they did not want to spend their money on eye tests. Some pensioners were struggling to feed or clothe themselves or even just to live. The Government had to do something about that, so we introduced the winter fuel allowance, which—thank goodness—means that we do not hear scary statistics every winter about the number of pensioners who have died because they were frightened to put a coin in the meter.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend recall that a previous Minister, Edwina Currie, advised pensioners who were suffering from hypothermia to go to charity shops to buy extra woolly clothing? Will my hon. Friend compare and contrast that with our record?

Miss Begg: Pensioners can now go to high quality shops to buy their winter clothing if they so desire, because we have given pensioners the money to make such choices. I am sure that not all pensioners always use their winter fuel allowance for fuel, but that is their choice.

I visited a pensioner's house in a multi-storey block of flats at the weekend. A new combined heat and power system has been introduced, and that has kept the costs of the heating down. Previously, the block had electric storage heaters that were incredibly expensive to run, but this pensioner will now be able to heat her house and have money left over from the winter fuel allowance. I thought that "Heat your house for free thanks to this Labour Government" might make a nice headline for the next election. That, after all, is what has happened.

We also introduced free eye tests for old age pensioners to remove their fear about having to spend money to have their eyes tested. We introduced the pension credit, and I am extremely proud of it and what it has done. I spent the summer recess going round most of the sheltered housing complexes in my constituency. As with the experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), most of the pensioners I spoke to are incredibly and surprisingly happy. They were as nice to me as they have been in the seven years since I was elected. That said, the summer in which the basic state pension increased by only 75p was a rough one, but this summer I thought that the Government were getting somewhere.

Andrew Selous: Hon. Members on both sides of the House have agreed that a certain level of means-testing is essential and that it will play a part in any future system. I have the pleasure of serving with the hon. Lady on the Work and Pensions Committee. Is she happy with projections that some 83 per cent. of pensioners will end up being means-tested if we continue with current plans? It is the extent of means-testing that worries many of us.

Miss Begg: It is interesting that the phrase "means-testing" seems to be thought of as such a derogatory term. I am interested in what pensioners are entitled to. If lots of pensioners are entitled to lots of money, I do not have a problem with it. I find it quite difficult to argue against a system under which pensioners get extra money for spending half an hour on one phone call every five years.

A lady whom I met this summer has been £78 a week better off since October 2003 as a result of the introduction of the pension credit. She did not receive that money before because although she received only £40-odd from the basic state pension, she had £17,000 of savings, so she was over the eligibility limit for the minimum income guarantee. Her savings were disregarded under the pension credit, so her income more than tripled. She told me that she would quite fancy a nice comfortable chair and I said that she could afford to buy one now because she is receiving extra money and because she feels that her savings are safe. That shows how the pension credit works in practice.

Andrew Selous: I am sure that the hon. Lady agrees that there are several ways in which we could get money to poorer pensioners. However, although I am not demeaning means-testing per se, will she comment on the unintended consequences for savings and incentives to save of applying it to such an extent? That is why many of us have deep worries about the future.

Miss Begg: The hon. Gentleman has got a point, so I shall return to incentives when I address the wider debate of how we can encourage tomorrow's pensioners to save for their future.

One thing worries me about the official Opposition's position against means-testing: they seem to think that it is all right for people who are very poor to be means-tested, but that it is somehow demeaning to people with any money. If it is demeaning to people with some money, it is also demeaning to the very poor. The pension credit allows the poorest people to feel part of a wider spectrum of people who qualify for it, which perhaps takes some of the stigma out of the system. Why should it be all right to means-test people who are poor, but not those who are slightly better off?

Perhaps the biggest element of means-testing carried out by the state is the calculation of our taxation. Income tax is a form of means-testing. I am fairly sure that the official Opposition's position is not that means-testing is okay when the Government are taking money from someone, but not okay when used as a mechanism to give money to someone, yet that appears to be what they are saying.

We are demonstrating today the extent to which the debate on pensions has moved on. We are discussing today's pensioners because they are doing much better than before. Elderly women say that they are much better off than they used to be, and they often say that they are better off than they were during their working lives. One lady told me that all that she could afford when she was working was a bit of sausage meat, but that thanks to the pension credit she can now afford a bit of frying steak.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: My hon. Friend rightly points out that pensioners are better off than they were under the previous Government, but if the Conservatives were to abolish the pension credit system, surely the worry is that people on that credit would experience a freeze for 20 years while the basic pension caught up, so real poverty would return in the meantime.

Miss Begg: That is an enormous concern because, again, the poorest pensioners will have their income frozen. Those are the very pensioners who, for the first time in their lives, feel that they have enough of a disposable income to live comfortably. Their generation is not frivolous. They do not spend their money on sirloin steak. My constituent was buying frying steak. However, her expectation is that she will have a comfortable retirement, which is how it should be.

If we are to reform the pensions system, which I hope will come out of the Turner report, and seriously tackle the problem of women and pensions and poorer pensioners, we have to ensure in the meantime that the pension credit keeps it value. However, I accept that we may move away from that some time in the future because most things are not set in aspic. The pension credit exists to deal with the problem that has resulted from 100 years of a pension system that was structured to deal with working men with a dependent wife. We have to start looking at how we might want to restructure pensions. That is a long-term business and we have to consider long-term aims. I am glad that the debate has moved on to tomorrow's pensioners because it is important. The debate is not just about today's pensioners.

People in this country always associate pensions with old age. I have just come back from Australia. I was confused for the first couple of days when they kept talking about unemployment pension and disabled pension, but any welfare benefit there is called a pension, so it does not have the same association with old age. Whenever we talk about a pensions debate, we think that we mean the pensioners of today. The Government have done extremely well in dealing with the anomalies in our pension system and with the pensioners of today, but the real challenge is how we make provision for the pensioners of tomorrow, which all Governments must do. We need to debate that and reach some consensus.

It is simplistic for any political party to say that by merely increasing the level of the basic state pension, we will solve many of the problems. Many of them exist because of the structure of the existing state pension. It does not take account of women who have not worked—perhaps because they have cared for children or elderly relatives or have been dependent on their husband. The state pension system is based on the dependency of one person on another.

The system is unfair. A married man with a non-working wife pays the same national insurance contribution as an unmarried man or an unmarried woman with no dependent spouse. Yet the married man gets 160 per cent. back from the state, whereas a single person gets only 100 per cent. That was fine when most people were in marriages with a dependent spouse, but that is not how society is structured today. It is not how we live our lives. People have more than one relationship. Women are in and out of work and have their own pensions. Indeed, the married man whose wife has worked and has her own pension only gets 100 per cent. of the basic state pension, not 160 per cent. So the unfairness is not about married men, but dependency. We have to consider ways of breaking that dependency to ensure that people have a basic state pension in their old age to which they are entitled by dint of the fact that they have lived for 60 or 65 years. Perhaps this is the time to talk about whether we should raise the state retirement age.

The hon. Member for Havant said that there was consensus between the CBI, the TUC and other bodies about what should happen with pensions, but there is not. The CBI thinks that the retirement age should be raised to 70, but the TUC disagrees. The TUC thinks that the private and occupational pension sector should include an element of compulsion, but the CBI does not. There is therefore an absence of consensus on significant areas of policy. I agree with the Secretary of State that the retirement age should remain 65 for the foreseeable future, as it would be nice if most people worked until they 65. My mother retired at 60 and my father at 65, but they are in the minority. Most people retire much earlier, and I was frightened to learn that one of my friends has just retired at 50. Other friends are looking forward to retirement at 55. I hope that they will go on to do other things, but we need a pension system that allows people to retire from their main job and take another without a reduction in their pension. We must provide the flexibility and incentives to encourage people to work longer, as has been said. If everyone knows that they will receive at least the basic state pension they will have an incentive to save for their retirement.

With the best will in the world, the basic state pension is just that—basic. Hopefully, it lifts people out of poverty, but pensioners on the lowest level of pension credit of £107 are still living in poverty. The younger generation, however, want much more than the basic state pension and want more than any Government can afford. They expect to retire on the same disposable income that they enjoy while working. Even the most generous pensions are only two thirds of people's final salary, but when someone retires they pay less tax and do not have to pay contributions towards national insurance or their pension. They have probably paid off their mortgage, so the money at their disposal is not very different from their net income after housing costs and other expenses when working. To achieve that income level in retirement people must make extra arrangements on top of the state provision. Younger people quite reasonably expect to receive the income that their parents and grandparents enjoy in retirement, but they will not do so unless they are kicked into the realisation that they must start making provision now.

This is a big problem and needs a great deal of discussion. I am relaxed that the next phase of the Turner commission will not produce a report for another year, as there may be an election in the middle of that period, when there will be a lot of party political point-scoring. Pensions should have been the subject of an investigation 20 years ago.

I will be very proud of my Government at the next election when they start to answer these difficult questions and to equalise the pensions of men and women. As the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) said, we should not have special groups for whom we have to make special allowances. We must ensure that everyone has at least a basic level of dignity in retirement and a basic pension, as well as anything that we can do on top of that to fulfil their expectations of higher standards when they retire. It is a great challenge, but I am sure that this House and the country outside are up to it.

5.40 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): We have had an extremely interesting debate and we have before us an extremely interesting report. The report is an authoritative source of facts that will be the locus classicus of discussions on this matter for many months to come, and the debate will prove to be an authoritative and much-referred-to source on the range of arguments that have been exchanged.

I want to make a few brief remarks under three headings. First, I shall comment on the responsibility for the situation that we are now in, because the Government are getting away with it a little too lightly; secondly, I shall discuss some of the new ideas that have come out of the debate; and thirdly, I shall make a few suggestions of my own.

There is no doubt that the present situation represents a crisis—that emerges clearly from the pensions commissioner's report. It is actually a double crisis, which is the worst of all possible crises because one reinforces the other. The first crisis is that of occupational pension schemes, particularly defined benefit schemes, which were once the pride of this country. Only seven years ago, people felt very confident about the future of those schemes, but since 1997, as the report states, 63 per cent.—virtually two thirds—of existing schemes have been closed to new members and not a single new one has been opened. That is a disastrous sea change in pension provision. Our occupational pensions, which were the envy of so many places around the world, are now in crisis.

The second crisis is that of the collapse of the savings ratio. That, too, emerges clearly from the report. Those two crises reinforce each other in undermining our people's prospects for a secure retirement. It is a very serious situation.

The Government have tried to evade responsibility for all this by saying that it is caused by the strains placed on pension schemes by increasing life expectancy or by disappointing stock market performances over the past few years. They say, "It's nothing to do with us, guv; it's not the fault of Gordon Brown's pension tax." That argument will not wash. We have had steadily increasing life expectancies over the past 50 years or so during which the occupational pension movement gained strength. Figure 1.1 of the report is a graph showing that the curve of rising life expectancies between 1970 and 1990 was distinctly steeper than it has been since 1990 or is projected to be over the next few years. Occupational pension schemes have to face a greater hurdle in terms of dealing with increasing life expectancy and actuarial risk than they did over the past seven years when many of them were closed to new members.

The fact that the stock market has not behaved very encouragingly over the past few years is a problem, but we have experienced far worse stock market crashes before. The occupational pension movement managed to survive the appalling stock market crash of 1974 as merely a blip in its history. Equally, the 1987 stock market crash was a good deal more serious than what has happened over the past few years. I have to tell the Minister that those excuses will not wash.

As for the collapse in savings, the key factor is undoubtedly means-testing. There is nothing new about my saying that—I have been saying it since 1997. I recall saying, when I was pensions spokesman at the beginning of the last Parliament, that the Government could not get away with increased means-testing. They were means-testing everything that moved. They means-tested incapacity benefit, widows benefit and support for students. All sorts of benefits that previously depended merely on a contributions record were suddenly means-tested. I remember saying at the time that that could not be done without having a devastating effect on the savings rate.

On pensions, I remember saying in the Chamber some six or seven years ago that a financial adviser could not with integrity advise anybody on less-than-average earnings to save for a pension.

Mr. Tom Harris rose—

Mr. Davies: I will not give way, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me. We have only a short time available.

I made the calculation then that a person would need to save £80,000 by the time of their retirement, whether in a pension fund or elsewhere, in order to get nowhere—in order for all that money to be wasted, because the £80,000 would produce an income of £4,000 or £5,000 at the then annuity rates, which would mean that the person would have to forgo all the means-tested benefits, such as housing benefit and council tax relief, not to mention personal care and so on. Saving £80,000 would require a heroic effect—I think I used that term all those years ago—from someone on low earnings, and the money would be wasted. Think what £80,000 could buy by way of increased consumption in the course of a working life.

It follows mathematically that if someone saved £160,000 they would end up with half the rate of return that the market would require, for the sacrifice of saving and the risk of saving. It was clear that people on small incomes would be deprived of every rational ground for saving. The crisis in savings was thoroughly predictable.

We heard this afternoon from the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I remember debating with him when he was my opposite number six or seven years ago. I well remember a conference at Oxford when I first said that means-testing was not part of the solution; it was part of the problem. The right hon. Gentleman was in some consternation because he secretly agreed with me. He did not agree at all with what the Chancellor was doing at the time, but he could not very well say so in public. He told us this afternoon, and I am sure he is right, that half the tax relief on pension savings that the Revenue forgoes is taken up by people on the 40 per cent. marginal tax rate. The implication was that there was something wrong with the tax relief system.

There is nothing wrong with the tax relief system. What is wrong is that people below the 40 per cent. marginal tax rate have had their incentive to save destroyed by the means-testing policy. The responsibility lies fair and square with the Government. It would have been nice if we had had a higher savings ratio in this country in the 1990s. It was always low by international standards and certainly by European standards. I accept that, but the Government turned the situation into a crisis and they did so on two fronts—occupational pensions and incentives to save. That is a serious matter and they should not be allowed to escape responsibility for it. Those were the deliberate policies and the specific contributions of the Labour Government to occupational pensions and to saving for retirement and other purposes.

I shall deal with some of the interesting ideas that have been thrown out during the afternoon. One is compulsion. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead, for whom I have the greatest regard in every respect, seems to be in favour of compulsion. It would be disastrous, for the reasons so ably and lucidly set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), to which I might be able to add two. First, if the state gets into the business of compelling people to save, it takes on a moral responsibility for ensuring that the real value of that money is at least maintained, even if there is not a substantial savings return. That is a difficult position for the state to be in, given that moral responsibility and, conceivably, legal responsibility.

Another related issue is that it is enormously morally dubious for the state to tell people to save irrespective of whether it is in their interests to do so, particularly when the state, by its own deliberate action, has made it cease to be in their interests to save by, for example, means-testing, as I outlined. If, in those circumstances, the state said to people on low incomes, "You would be a damn fool to save now. You will make an absolute idiot of yourself if you save because of the way in which the means-tested benefits system is structured, but, nevertheless, we will compel you to save. Taking a sensible view of your own interests, we know that as a rational human being you will not save, but we will compel you to do so", it would not be compulsory saving; it would be a tax, and everybody would see it as such. Let us remove from our minds the temptation of trying to deceive the public.

Miss Begg: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's remarks about disincentives to saving. The Turner report points out that people have not saved enough for their pensions for the past 20 years, but the pension credit was introduced only last October. How does he explain the historical gap, when the measures that he describes as disincentives to save have existed only for the past year or, in the case of the minimum income guarantee, for slightly longer?

Mr. Davies: I do not know whether the hon. Lady was following my remarks about five minutes ago, but when I explained how the Government have increased means-testing, I did not talk about the pension credit for the precise reason that she mentioned—it was introduced only last year. I discussed other means-tested benefits and the minimum income guarantee, which has been in place since the beginning of this Government. Means-testing has increased substantially. A few minutes ago, I also made the point—perhaps the hon. Lady missed it—that I have been saying exactly the same thing since 1997–98. I do not make the point because of the institution of the pension credit, but the pension credit is another means-tested benefit and it has perverse and damaging effects.

I listened to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) with great interest, because he is extremely well-informed and I admire his work. When I was a Front Bencher, he used to contribute to debates, and I have learned many things from him over the years and do not mind paying him that compliment in public. However, he made two points this afternoon with which I must take issue. First, he suggested that National Savings is a proper vehicle for pension saving. I have no objection to the Post Office collecting the money, but did he mean that those savings should be invested in National Savings?

Mr. Webb indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: No, he did not. I am greatly relieved, and the hon. Gentleman's high reputation in my eyes is at no risk of damage.

Secondly—he repeated this point on several occasions—he favours the abolition of the contributory principle. The most shocking and thought-provoking thing that came from the Government this afternoon was the new Secretary of State's implication that he is tempted in that direction, too. I was struck by the irony of the Liberal spokesman making that point, when Liberals invented the contributory principle—Lloyd George and Beveridge will be spinning in their graves. I agree with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead, who lucidly deconstructed that argument.

The economic arguments on contributory entitlements concern both incentives to save and to work. No one will work a day longer than they need to if they are working for benefits that they would get anyway, even if they did not work. That would be economically crazy and morally unjust. A civilised society cannot send out the signal that it does not matter whether one works because the rewards will be exactly the same. That message would corrode not only our economy, but our value system. I object to that and I want to place my objection on record.

I should like to make one or two suggestions. Despite the enormous damage that the Government have done to the occupational pensions system, especially the defined benefit aspect of occupational pensions, we should not give up on it. I hope that the next Conservative Government will make reviving such schemes a priority, but we must think carefully about how to do that. Tax and other incentives are always expensive and one must therefore be cautious. I hope that my Front-Bench colleagues will consider the possibility of following the example of the American employee retirement funds—the famous Employee Retirement Income Security Act, or ERISA, scheme. A central principle is that the tax benefits of the regime that applies to the funds are available only to a scheme that is open to all the relevant firm's employees. That breaks the distinction between special deals for top executives and provision for everyone else in the company.

There will always be a powerful incentive for members of top management to devise pension schemes that are good for them. As we know, defined benefit schemes are the best and impetus towards them will continue despite the difficult experiences under the Labour Government between 1997 and 2005. We should harness that impetus and ensure that there is an incentive to establish a defined benefit scheme with the same conditions for all employees. Clearly, the actual benefit will differ, depending on whether the person's final salary is £20,000 a year, £200,000 a year, or even £1 million a year in the case of a company chairman or chief executive. Nevertheless, the terms, conditions and principles will be the same for all employees.

The Americans have run such a system extremely well for many years. I believe that I am right—doubtless the hon. Member for Northavon will correct me if I am not—that the ERISA system was introduced in the 1960s. It is therefore not experimental or untried.

We need to go back on means-testing, which is a disease. Its appalling consequences are economic, social and, indeed, moral in the sense of injustice that it creates. I have already elaborated a little on that. How do we go back on it? Of course, some means-tested benefits have to exist—we all appreciate that we must have some sort of safety net if we believe in a civilised society, with nobody starving on the streets. There has always been an element of means-testing in the system. Even in the days of Beveridge, the system was not purely contributory.

However, we could and should switch the positions of the pension credit and the state retirement pension. The latter should be earnings related. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) is right about that; his policies have been thoroughly worked out over several years. Indeed, he and I were shadow Cabinet colleagues when the proposal was introduced. It makes sense. Of course, one sets a programme for only the length of the next Parliament. At the end of it, we would have to consider the extent to which it was possible to continue with the earnings linkage. However, I am convinced that it is a sensible move.

The pension credit should not be abolished. We cannot abandon the poor pensioners about whom the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) spoke with great and genuine feeling in a good speech. Although it possibly reflected a different political standpoint from mine, I genuinely admired it. We cannot leave people destitute. However, the pension credit should be linked to prices so that, instead of indexing at a higher rate the benefit that people who do not work or contribute get, we should reward best those who have worked and contributed, while providing something for people who have no contribution record. That is rational, economically sensible, prudent, fair and just, and therefore economically and morally sustainable.

I want to deal with the issue of age discrimination, which was raised earlier by a Labour Member. As life expectancy increases, it is generally expected that we will have a longer active life—to which I look forward, God willing, if my electors and the Almighty allow it to me. It is completely barmy to produce documents that say that we will need to work longer, and even to provide moral exhortation to people to work longer, and yet to have a situation in which the greatest form of discrimination in the job market is not with regard to sex, race or disability—from which we have suffered in the past, and which have been effectively dealt with by legislation—but age. All of us have people who come into our surgeries who are in their 50s, well qualified, motivated and keen, who have sent off 200 job applications and who do not get a single response. They know why: it is because they declared their age. Occasionally, I have told them to try not declaring their age, and it works. I have carried out some experiments, and I take full responsibility, having said it in the House of Commons. It is not deception; it is self-protection from a complete scandal.

The best solution would be an age discrimination Act. I do not want to blow my own trumpet too much, but I first proposed a private Member's Bill on age discrimination, under the ten-minute rule, under the Major Administration. Of course, I got nowhere. I tried again at the beginning of the first Blair Administration, and of course got nowhere. I asked the Prime Minister at Prime Minister's questions back in 1998 what he was going to do about age discrimination, as I thought that he was in favour of doing something. He said that he and the Government were still committed to that. After seven years, we are still waiting, so I hope that something can be done.

My final point is simple. It is a party political point, but it seems artificial not to say it because it is blatantly clear. The Government now say that they will not tell us their policy on pensions and pension-related issues until after the election. But they have been thinking about it for months—they have commissioned a report, they are talking about it now, and they have several months to go before the election—so that will not wash. I have great regard for the Minister for Pensions; he is a great expert, and he has said some very sensible things on the subject, about which we have been talking for many years in different contexts, on the Back Benches and the Front Benches. He probably knows more about the subject than most in the House, and I know that he has strong views. But what he is about to tell us, and what the Secretary of State has told us, is that they will not tell the public or the electorate what the Government's real views are until after the election.

Even were the Government's credibility much higher than it is, and their reputation for reliability, frankness, candour and keeping their promises much higher, people would still be intensely suspicious of a Government who went through an election saying, "We will give you the news as to what our policy is on this vital matter after the election, if we're elected." As the Minister for Pensions cannot acknowledge, but knows perfectly well, the Government's reputation for those qualities is far from high, and I am afraid that the policy on which he is embarking will be a disaster. Everybody knows what it means, en clair: some very bad news will be in the pipeline if the electorate re-elect a Labour Government. The Government know what it is, but they will not say it. It is so bad that they do not even think that they can spin their way out between now and polling day.

Mr. Tom Harris: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: Not at this stage.

The Government hope to keep it quiet. That will not work. It should not work in an open society or a sophisticated democracy. The Government have hung a millstone round their necks. The Opposition will be delighted, and the Government will thoroughly merit the fate that they then receive.

6.3 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding—[Interruption.] Sorry, I meant my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). Historically, I have always made a mistake with his constituency, even though I worked with him on various Pensions Bills and can endorse his attacks on the means-testing introduced by this Government.

I came to the Chamber today thinking that we would probably concentrate primarily on the Turner report. I was glad that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) differentiated the immediate crisis facing many pensioners today because of the actions taken by this Government—although I acknowledge that some pensioners are better off—and the longer-term view. I want to concentrate on the longer-term view. I see from a hasty reading of the Turner report that it reiterates most of the principles that have created the foundations for a long-term debate on the future of pensions. My age dictates that I am interested in this subject, and I share the concern of the hon. Members for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) and for Aberdeen, South about the need for the young to learn to save as early as possible.

It was interesting to hear some big ideas exploded today. First, the Liberal Democrats and one or two Labour Members urged the ending of the insurance principle. Then it was suggested that we should have a nationally funded scheme for pensions through national insurance. That was the bones of one of our policies at the last general election, which I endorsed, but what bothered me slightly was the thought that it could be one huge national fund. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford and others with City experience will know that the size of such a fund could distort markets—and especially if it became a politically correct fund, invested for reasons other than the best interests of the pensioners. Then it was suggested that reducing tax was not an incentive to save and that we would all be happy to pay an extra 2 per cent. in national insurance. That, I have to say, is not my experience. I hope that the Turner commission will not take that suggestion on board.

It is too early to draw any firm conclusions. Alan Pickering castigated us as mere politicians rather than statesmen if we were to have a knee-jerk reaction today, but there is general consensus about certain clear issues. We all agree that the system is far too complex in both state and private provision, and we tend to lump everything together rather than look at each aspect clearly, while recognising that there is an interrelationship.

In the last Parliament, we debated the introduction of the state second pension. My party objected to the principles entirely, apart from the suggestion that carers, and especially women carers, should have access to such a pension, which would go some way in the longer run to helping poorer women pensioners and carers. The state second pension is an additional complexity in a state system that is already so complex that most people do not understand it, beyond knowing that they have to pay national insurance.

We have barely talked about the public sector system and the need for the Government to be able to draw back from the unfunded liabilities of that sector. Luckily, we are not in the position that the French Government are in, where to fund the pensions for Electricité de France—and perhaps Gaz de France—alone has put them in hock to the tune of £57 billion, which is allegedly the total black hole for all pension provision in the UK. Our own Government face a huge future commitment that will have to be met one way or another. Someone will have to get to grips in the long run with the unfunded public sector pensions.

Direct benefit and direct contribution schemes are both complex issues and there have been mistakes, so changes are needed. We have the opportunity to stand back and ask what is the principle behind pension provision. At present, legally, it is an insurance. Occupational pension funds are definitely an insurance principle, but there is a question whether direct contribution personal pension funds are an insurance or a form of relatively tax-free saving.

If we were more honest about the direct contribution sector of private pensions, we might be able to resolve some of the associated complexities, including, indeed, the question of annuities. The legal position is that we have to have annuities because they are insurance rather than, as most people regard them, their own pot of money. I was honoured to be the person who officially announced our policy on this issue to the Conservative party conference, but I should point out that my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) and other colleagues present have been very active in campaigning for an end to the annuity provision at 75. One of the easiest ways to solve this technical problem is to consider whether such provision should constitute an insurance policy.

We need to consider other issues, such as the housing market and people contemplating investing in housing as a way of replacing pension provision. We should think about what would happen if the Deputy Prime Minister were allowed to get away with his housing proposals. People need to be aware that a significant increase in housing provision would down bring prices, rather than increasing them, so it would not be sensible for them to rely on investing in housing as a way of replacing their entire pension provision.

The Turner report is the basis for extensive discussions and I am sure that we will have plenty of them in this Chamber. I look forward to participating in them in greater depth, and at perhaps boringly greater length. We must consider carefully what we do with pensions. The Government, however, are on a very pleasurable hook of their own making. We will accuse them, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford said, of going into the next election with no pensions policy whatsoever. The voters will be buying, as usual, a pig in a poke.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): It is finally dawning on many of our fellow countrymen that pension provision is an important issue, but I fear that there is a risk that the political class will regard it as an electoral issue and an electoral problem alone. In my view, the question should not be how to solve, spin or sweep under the carpet this issue in the next six and a half months; instead, we need to look ahead with real vision and leadership at how pension provision should develop in the next 20 to 30 years and beyond.

This has been a very interesting debate and I endorse the comments of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). Looking ahead in pension provision is indeed very much a political judgment, rather than a question of amassing ever more evidence. A number of contributors have referred today to the need for consensus. If we accept that our collective—and, indeed, our individual—pension shortfall will be a major problem in future decades, we need to create a consensus among the political class on the correct way forward. We do, however, need to start by discussing with some candour how we have come to this pass.

I shall not reheat the arguments of my hon. Friends the Members for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), other than to say that some of the blame must lie at the door of No. 11 Downing Street. I fear that, somewhat tragically, because the incoming Labour Government of 1997 was so committed to maintaining Conservative spending plans, the pensions "hit" became a very easy pool of money for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to draw on—or so it seemed at the time—in order to bring about his various spending plans.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): My hon. Friend makes a very important point about the Chancellor of the Exchequer's position regarding these matters. Is it not a great pity that no Treasury representative has been present at any stage during this debate?

Mr. Field: I agree entirely; however, that is in the past. If I had longer, I would have said a wee bit more about that issue, but I want now to consider the future.

One of my great concerns about pensions is the real risk of a battle, almost, between the generations. History shows that almost every generation has been able to look ahead in the hope and confidence that, except perhaps in time of war, economic life gets better for progressive generations; but no longer.

Part of the problem is down to what has been described as the demographic time bomb, but there is also the perception that in order to maintain the somewhat unrealistic and often uncosted expectations of an older generation, those either in their 20s or not even among the work force today will have an increasing burden to bear. That applies not just to pensions, but to the increasingly irresponsible public-private partnerships favoured by an imprudent Chancellor. There is nothing prudent in his "jam today" policy with its off-balance-sheet financing, which will have to be paid for in the generations ahead. It strikes me that if public policy continues to be constructed on the basis of pitting the interests of one generation of taxpayers and electors against another, we are heading for some very serious unrest in the years ahead.

I was going to say that I was speaking as a 30-something, but I am not quite that any more, having celebrated my 40th birthday last week. I still consider myself relatively young and I believe that my generation lacks confidence in the whole area of pensions. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) rightly pointed out that all too many people in their 20s and 30s feel that the only safe investment is that of property, particularly in London and the south-east, but it now looks as though even that market is over-heating so we are seeing the first signs of further problems there.

Some hon. Members have touched on the issue of compulsion. I must confess that after the mis-selling scandal—some of it occurring prior to 1997—it seems to me that the Government's refusal to take responsibility for Equitable Life makes it very difficult to make a supportable case in favour of compulsory saving. The lack of confidence among many would-be savers is tangible. Only if the pensions industry can be made much safer can we seriously contemplate compelling people to place their trust in it. If the law forces you or me to hand over an unspent surplus of our hard-earned cash to the unqualified or incompetent, there will be little incentive for anyone to save. I would reiterate the words of many Conservative Members—that experience shows that the Government, above all, are often the most unqualified and incompetent of savings vehicles.

Amid all the talk on compulsion, there is also a lack of appreciation of why so many people fail to make provision for their future. No amount of new legislation and no new initiatives will overcome the fact that the great majority of people in Britain today are too poor to make adequate savings for their retirement much beyond the state pension. I believe that compulsory saving can be only a small part of the solution.

There is an argument that goes against that. If the Government simply use taxation to spend for the future, it is in a sense the most compulsory vehicle of all, but I believe that there is a lesson to be learned from experience across the world that lower taxes may be the best incentive to save. The dismal and disappointing stock market performance of recent years in this country—it is poor compared even to many of the European bourses—has in large part been affected by the increasing tax burden. We should perhaps consider allowing people to keep more of what they earn and hope that they will put it into saving for their future.

Many contributors to today's debate have mentioned the possibility of raising the retirement age, and I must confess that I take on board some of the concerns of Labour Members about the difficulties of hard-working manual labourers. It is easy in a service economy, such as my constituency of the Cities of London and Westminster, to think of 65 and 70 as a relatively young age at which people could continue to work, but it is much more difficult for those who have carried out manual work either in the agricultural industry or manufacturing. We need to get that right. Younger people in the work force increasingly seem to appreciate—for the reasons set out today—that the retirement age will have to go up. Clearly, expectations of life have increased rapidly in recent decades.

We also have to ensure that those in retirement have realistic expectations. I do not wish to sound overly negative, but I believe that politicians of all parties have failed in the past to tell it as it is. Pensioners may well have paid their stamp, but they have not contributed anything like enough to justify receiving the state pension for the number of years that many require it, or their health care or other welfare benefits. However, we are where we are: clearly, we cannot expect pensioners to go back to work, but politicians of all parties must not raise unrealistic expectations as part of a Dutch auction aimed at winning the votes of pensioners and of people who are soon to be pensioners.

[Mr. Field]

Many older folk feel insecure and very worried about what the future holds. All of us, as constituency MPs, will discover from the contents of our mailbags in the weeks and months ahead that many of our older electors are becoming very worried by what they read in headlines about a pensions crisis. Yet we must face facts. As a nation we cannot go on as we have over recent years. I hope that we will discuss this urgent problem in the months before the next election, and it is beholden on all parties to produce sensible plans for the future.

I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead, who made a plaintive cry to his colleagues on the Front Bench, but this matter in a sense transcends some aspects of party politics. We need to get it right, and politicians of all parties will pay a large penalty if we fail so to do.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I begin by thanking the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), who is my MP when I stay in London. However, he may not get my vote at the next election.

Life has moved on since Beveridge and the introduction of the welfare state. It is clear from today's debate that there are many different points of view around the House, but also that there is no consensus about what needs to be done. Consensus can be found on one issue only—that a pension crisis now exists.

All the different parties have produced different ideas. I was especially pleased to hear the Secretary of State open the door to the possibility that women might receive a pension that was not linked to the amount of contributions that they have made. Many women have spent their lives bringing up families or as carers and they will welcome what the right hon. Gentleman said, as do I.

Every week, I meet constituents who have worked all their lives who do not know what will happen to them when they retire. The more elderly of them have fought for their country, while others have watched children and grandchildren grow up. All the time they have thought that their pension would look after them in their later years. Those who have made contributions throughout their lives imagined that all would be well, but now they hear and read about the pensions crisis. As a result, many realise that they have been living in a fool's paradise—that they have not paid enough, worked long enough or saved enough.

For many, it is too late to make any change. When the state pension was first introduced, life expectancy was about 65. People live much longer now, but it is not possible to tell everyone to work longer. Those who have worked in industry or in any type of manual labour do not have a long life expectancy, so working longer is not an option.

People are being told to save more, and that is all very well if they have the cash, but many do not. Again, in an ideal world it would be fine to say that people should pay more into pension schemes, but for many it is not an option. Many people are also amazed to discover that, although they have saved for their pensions, their caution brings little or no dividend. Recent figures show that savings have to be very substantial if they are worth making at all.

Earlier, it was stated that some people may choose between taking a second holiday and putting money into pension schemes. However, if that money were to bring no gain because of the effects of means-tested benefits, people might be better advised to take that second holiday and go off to Spain.

Many of our old people feel dazed and confused. Perhaps they are not as fit as they used to be, and their memories may not be as sharp as they once were, but they are watching post offices close and their pension books being replaced while council tax goes up every year. The link between council tax and people's pensions is crucial, and many pensioners devote a huge proportion of their pensions to paying their council tax bills.

Means-testing produces many problems, but I shall concentrate on just two. The first is that many pensioners do not apply for means-tested benefits. That exposes as a lie the contention that the poorest pensioners are helped by targeting them in that way. The poorest pensioners are not those who apply for and get the benefits to which they are entitled. The poorest pensioners are the ones who do not claim the benefits to which they are entitled, and those people must be moved out of poverty and on to a decent basic pension without delay. At present, 125,000 Scots do not claim their benefits.

The second group are an as yet unknown number—those who know that they are entitled to means-tested benefits but have decided, for whatever reason, not to apply for them. That could be because they have never claimed benefits and do not want to start now, or it could be, like some of my constituents who attended the pension credit stall at a local shopping centre, that they feel that they can do without the additional benefit. If they did not claim it, they thought, more deserving people would get it. We know that that does not happen and it was explained to my constituents that that would not happen.

The system for many is confusing, complex and keeps many old people poor. Older people fail to claim £2.5 billion in benefits, and hundreds of thousands of them live in poverty. Pension credit is a benefit aimed at the poorest older people, but it is claimed only by half of those entitled to it. It has changed its name three times in the past seven years, and that only adds to the confusion. Many people do not know what they are entitled to and they see the system as too complex. Moreover, means-testing is just not popular. Many people also do not claim the amount of council tax benefit to which they are entitled. It has been estimated that approximately one in seven pensioners is entitled to council tax benefit, but do not claim it.

Miss Begg: In Aberdeen, the Pension Service has done a lot of outreach work. When it did the calculation for pension credit, it discovered much under-claiming of housing benefit and council tax benefit. The whole process of claiming for pension credit has been beneficial to many pensioners who have received much more than just the credit. Many have also received attendance allowance as well.

John Barrett: It is still a huge problem. Pensioners paid a staggering £770 million too much council tax in 2001-02.

I am running out of time, but as I said earlier, it will be an improvement if the Secretary of State is prepared to give a fair deal to women who do not have a full contribution record. I also wish to mention the sometimes questionable behaviour by trustees of company pension funds, such as directors receiving large sums of money before they retire and bleeding pension funds dry. I hope that current legislation will ensure that people who have paid into a pension fund can be sure that the money will be there on their retirement. There is a real crisis in company pensions.

As many hon. Members have mentioned, we here are all right because we have a decent pension scheme. However, many hon. Members used to be councillors and in non-pensionable employment. There are many people, both inside and outside the House, who will struggle through retirement. As we approach the general election, it is vital that the report that was published yesterday engages the public in the debate. They will hear different views from different parties, but what they want to hear is a degree of honesty. The public also want politicians to think for the long term. Whatever happens, and whatever view we take of means-testing or ways of funding pensions in the future, the general public will not be impressed by a bidding war for their votes. Unrealistic promises will let the public down, and the lack of respect that they have for politicians of all parties will only increase. The debate must start now. Pensions are a long-term problem and we have to deal with it for the sake of this generation and of generations to come.

6.29 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I am always taken by a Liberal Democrat talking about honesty in politics. I declare an interest, in that I have private pension provision.

This has been a fine debate. There have been many knowledgeable and interesting contributions, against the backdrop of the Turner report, which has informed much of the debate.

We now know that the Prime Minister intends to postpone his retirement from No. 10, but he did not make it clear at the time that he would be forcing millions of other people to work longer, too. Almost everyone agrees that there is a pensions crisis, except possibly Ministers at the Department for Work and Pensions. The new Secretary of State said:

> "It is not a crisis happening now."

He said that it would happen in 10 or 15 years when, on any view, he will be doing another job—perhaps returning to delivering letters. He also asserted that we do not want what he described as a knee-jerk reaction. I have news for him: he is dead wrong about that. The crisis in pensions is with us now. There is no getting around that fact, even if Ministers are in denial.

Ministers are trying to shut down the whole debate. We shall not let them do that and nor will the country's pensioners. As Rodney Bickerstaffe, the president of the National Pensioners Convention, said, something must be done now. One example is the Government's financial assistance scheme for those who have already lost pension rights—at least 65,000 people. Faced with defeat in the House, the Government cobbled together a rescue package at the last minute, and it shows.

Everyone agrees that the allocated figure of £400 million is grossly inadequate to compensate even those people who are already in difficulties. Obtaining details of how the scheme will actually work and how the money is to be distributed is like pulling teeth, a point made in the Lords only this week during debates on the Pensions Bill.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman says that the fund is inadequate. Can he tell us how much additional money his party would put into it, and whence that extra money would come?

Mr. Waterson: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's distinctive contribution to the debate later on, when I put him right about unclaimed assets. I hope that he will be patient for a moment.

As I said, everyone agrees that the fund is inadequate, and we cannot obtain details of how it will work. The FAS was announced on 14 May, five months ago. Can the Minister for Pensions give us the answers to a few simple questions? When does he expect the first payment to be made? Will the scheme exclude victims of solvent wind-ups? Does he still intend to exclude victims of wind-ups that commenced between May 2004 and May 2005, when the pension protection fund is supposed to open its doors? The Minister is not writing down my questions. Perhaps he has a very good memory.

Will payments be means-tested? Will they be taxed? Has the Minister made any progress at all on extracting contributions from industry to top up the £400 million? Will he look again at our proposal to use unclaimed assets to top up the FAS to the necessary limit? For the information of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), the Government are already using unclaimed assets. If he looks at the small print of the Budget, he will see that the Chancellor is trying to grab them for another purpose altogether.

The reality is that although pensioners are already suffering, the Government are moving as slowly as possible on this massive problem. Surprise, surprise! Their timetable seems to put everything off until next spring at the earliest. I wonder why.

Meanwhile, I understand that Labour Back Benchers, who have substantial numbers of affected constituents, people who have lost their pension rights, are being urged not to rock the boat and not to express in public their concerns about the inadequacy of the scheme. It would be shameful if that pressure stopped any of them doing so in the debate, although it is interesting that none of the Labour Members who has spoken, often eloquently, in previous debates has raised the issue today.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Coop): I have raised the plight of pensioners of the former British United Shoe Machinery Ltd., a Leicester-based firm in which many North-West Leicestershire people worked, and neither the Government nor the DWP have made any contact with me, private or public, e-mail or paper, that suggests what the hon. Gentleman implied a moment or two ago.

Mr. Waterson: I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman has made contact with his own Government to make clear his concerns about the size of the pot that is being made available.

On the broader pensions policy issues, why wait to do something? During the debate, we all heard about the growing consensus on long-term pensions policy. We heard about that with great eloquence from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe, again, had this to say:

> "The interesting thing is that a consensus is now emerging amongst many different and diverse groups, who all agree that we need a much bigger basic state pension for every older person that is linked to earnings and free from means-testing."

I could not have put it better myself.

The answer is obvious: the Government—having sat on their hands for seven years and presided over the collapse of pensions, both public and private—now want to put the whole thing off until after the next election. Assuming that happens in May or June next year, it seems terribly convenient that the final report of the Turner commission is not expected until next autumn.

Mr. Tom Harris: To help the debate come the general election, is the hon. Gentleman confirming to the House that the Conservative party will include in its manifesto detailed proposals to shape pensions in the long term? In other words, will the Conservative manifesto pre-empt the final volume of Turner's report and include all the details that the hon. Gentleman accuses the Government of not putting into our own manifesto?

Mr. Waterson: Yes, I can give the hon. Gentleman that categoric assurance, as he has asked for it. What is the point of an election manifesto if it does not deal with these matters? Indeed, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) made that point when he said that he did not wish to see his party go naked into the next election campaign.

I urge the Government, for once on pensions, to be bold. The Turner report sets out in painstaking and sometimes painful detail the scale of the problem, plus the only possible solutions. The Government should now come up with their own proposals, and it is no good the Secretary of State going on about a knee-jerk reaction. Seven years is hardly knee-jerk.

What about the perfectly sensible suggestion made by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead to bring forward Turner's final report to perhaps February next year? That would allow Turner some time to consult on the interim report. It would allow us all to digest his final conclusions. Perhaps more importantly, it would also allow the Government to go into the next election campaign with some clearly defined proposals on pensions—otherwise, what do they have in mind? Will they have a blank page in their manifesto where it says, "Pensions"? My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) made that point, again eloquently, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait).

The Labour party was much less reticent on the subject of pensions at the 1997 election. I received a letter only today from Mr. Richard Sharp, who is the chairman of the south-east region of the National Pensioners Convention. He enclosed a briefing produced by the Labour party before the 1997 election and asked me to use it to > "publicly denounce them for the charlatans they are on the basis of pre-election commitments."

[Interruption.] Those are his words, not mine, and I hope that the lead charlatan is taking careful note. The document is headed, "The Tories have betrayed pensioners", so hon. Members will get the drift, and it includes the names of the current Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It says:

> "Millions of people face poverty in retirement."

As I said earlier, it says:

> "The Tories propose to abolish the basic state pension".

That was a lie then, and it is still a lie. It says—this is the good bit—

> "Labour will defend the basic state pension, without means-testing, and ensure that it remains the foundation of our pensions policy."

Hard as I look from one of end that disgraceful document to the other, I can find no reference to a promise to take £5 billion a year from pension funds if the Labour party won that election. [Interruption.] At least I have had an apology, which I am happy to accept from the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris), about that campaign. Members should have been there.

The plain truth is that, by putting off decisions now, the Government are condemning a raft of pensioners to penury in old age or utter dependence on degrading means-tested benefits. That is borne out entirely by the Turner report. That is why we need Conservative policies such as restoring the earnings link, rolling back means-testing and abolishing the annuities rule. We have been exhaustively through the eight-point plan, or the 10-point plan as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West described it when allowing for inflation. However, just as important is our lifetime savings account that is designed to encourage people not already saving—the 9 million whom we have heard about—to do so.

These are all well costed, well thought-out proposals. [Laughter.] They are designed to tackle the pensions crisis, but if they cause such hilarity among Labour Members, why do they not come up with their own ideas rather than having a self-imposed moratorium between now and next autumn that takes them conveniently, or perhaps not, through the election campaign?

We heard from the Liberal Democrats. Their policy is designed only to help the over-75s. They would scrap the contributory principle altogether, and that argument was effectively demolished by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead. Despite what the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) told me in a previous debate, they intend to erode tax relief for those making pension contributions and, as usual with the Liberal Democrats, the figures are, of course, not properly costed. Perhaps it does not really matter, because their policy is about as relevant to who will be in government after the next election as the UK Independence party's policy to renationalise the railways. It deserves about as much attention.

Where is this Government's big idea on pensions, or even its small idea? The sad fact is that, where pensions are concerned, the Government are an ideas-free zone. The Secretary of State in his conference speech ruled out increasing the pension age, which is one of the main solutions set out by Turner. We had an interesting exchange at Question Time on Monday when I put to the Minister for Pensions his comments at a fringe meeting at the party conference. He seemed to take offence at the thought that he had referred to the pension credit as a > "short-to-medium-term policy only".

But within a column, he quickly reneged on that and said of the pension credit:

> "I repeat that we are proud of it."—[Official Report, 11 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 18.]

His Secretary of State went on at inordinate length to say what a wonderful thing it was.

In today's debate, however, the Secretary of State has suggested that the pension credit will not be there indefinitely. It is clear that there is a debate going on within the Government, and we get occasional glimpses of it down long narrow corridors. However, it would be rather good if some of it could be put to the electorate when the time comes.

At the moment, we have to take it that the Government are as committed to expanding means-testing as ever, thereby deterring more saving in this country—again, saving is one of the Turner prescriptions to end the crisis. Let me remind the House of what he said in his report:

> "Means-testing within the state system both increases complexity and reduces, and in some cases reverses, the incentives to save via pensions which the tax system creates."

That is a classic definition of the problem caused by means-testing in the system.

We had the false dawn of the speech by the Minister for Pensions to a fringe meeting at the party conference, but the Government seemed to have rowed back from that—an issue referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill). They have also been quiet on compulsion, another issue on which the final report will presumably reach a conclusion next year. In fairness, the Secretary of State said that he had an open mind on this issue, but he seems to have an open mind on almost every issue affecting pensions in this country. It is probably time he began to reach provisional conclusions about what should happen.

What does that leave? Extra taxes—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field)—and I do not suppose we shall hear much about them this side of an election. How typical of the Government to heap extra taxes on individuals to pay for a decent pension! We are looking at yet more third-term taxes from Labour, but on the welfare state, as on so much else, it does not deserve a third chance, let alone a third term. If the Government are not prepared to take the action needed on the nation's pensions, they should make way for someone who will. I urge the House to support our motion.

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): We have had a good debate in which we have heard several serious speeches, although I did write that line 15 minutes ago. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not mention all the contributions that were made. We heard notable contributions from Labour Members, and I hope that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) will forgive me if I say that I especially enjoyed the analysis presented by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill) made a useful and thoughtful speech. He reminded us that he is the chairman of the parliamentary pension fund and also told us that he chairs the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals pension fund. If there is ever a black hole in the parliamentary fund, I hope that he will not decide to put some of us down. We are into joined-up governance, but that would be a step too far.

As usual, I enjoyed the contribution made by the Chairman of the Work and Pensions Committee, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood), under whose chairmanship I had the honour of serving at one stage.

We once again thank Adair Turner and his colleagues on the Pensions Commission for what everyone has acknowledged as a fine and authoritative document. We greatly appreciate the further insights that the report provides, the opportunity that it presents for thorough and evidence-based debate, and the options that it offers for consideration to produce long-term solutions to long-term concerns. However, it is disappointing that in some, but not all, quarters, there has been such an immediate and highly politicised response to the report, despite the fact that both the commission and the Government are calling for a serious and considered analysis of the complexities of the issues at stake today and, more importantly, over the long term.

It was sad that the shadow Secretary of State entertained us a little too much tittle-tattle and one or two polemics that he has been reading over his long summer holidays because he does not usually do that. I am bound to say of the shadow Minister, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), that rather than rising to the occasion, he managed uniquely to sink into it.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) knows that I always enjoy his contributions. I was interested that he spent some 20 minutes mainly attacking another Opposition party, which we enjoyed, although I was a bit embarrassed to be in the same room as them. However, given that there are three major parties in Britain—one of which comes fourth in a by-election—I understand that at least some of his speech had more to do with electoral psephology in parts of our country than pensions policy.

To those who encourage us to act in haste by taking the sound bites of the report and basing a policy on them—they know who they are—let me point out that the report itself states in no uncertain terms:

"it is more important to arrive at policy recommendations which are well founded, comprehensive and sustainable than to develop those recommendations this year rather than next".

We will not, therefore, provide a knee-jerk reaction just to make the headlines. Conservatives can knee-jerk if they want to, but we will not. We will not put forward unsustainable policies for political gain, and thus we will not jump to rash conclusions before the commission has completed its work and published its report next year.

We acknowledge that societal evolution over the late 20th century and the 21st century necessitates a concurrent evolution in pensions policy, so we welcome the commission's considered assessments of the challenges of voluntarism, of compulsion, of extending working lives for those who want that and of encouraging greater pension saving. There will be much more such consideration after the consultation and discussion in the next volume of the report.

The problems that women have traditionally faced in accumulating a decent pension income are acknowledged. The report states that we need to look at adjustments to public policy that "should have been started in the last 20-30 years."

We should all bear some responsibility for that.

I shall outline our current strategy and also look to the future. The lack of action and the mismanagement of the state pension system under the Opposition left a terrible legacy. The situation in 1997 was one that we did not want repeated: a Britain in which 2.7 million pensioners were living in poverty and where, pound for pound, pensioners' savings were subject to a 100 per cent. marginal tax rate. Yet curiously those Conservatives who presided over that regime now lecture us on savings incentives despite pension credit now rewarding modest savings. It was also a Britain in which carers, disabled people and many women were excluded from accruing second state pension provision. Urgent action was required, and the Government acted.

Today's pensioners are significantly better off than they were under the last Conservative Government. Reforms to the state system have lifted 1.8 million pensioners out of poverty. Nearly 2.4 million people are getting extra mon[redacted]ave got under the previous system, with an average gain of more than £16 a week. We are spending £10 billion extra each year on pensions compared with 1997. Restoring the earnings link would have cost just £3 billion.

Pension credit guarantees an income of £105 a week for single people over 60—it was £69 in 1997—and £160 for couples. These benefits are designed for the people who need them most, which inherently necessitates some form of income or means-testing. Despite constant accusations about the "humiliation" that the Opposition claim such an approach causes, when we asked people in our surveys—because we listen—70 per cent. of pensioners believed that the process was easier than the previous system and 85 per cent. stated that they would recommend applying for pension credit to someone else.

The Opposition would have us believe that pension credit degrades pensioners. On the contrary, it is poverty that degrades our elderly people. That is why we have made the reduction of pensioner poverty our highest priority. We now have a Pension Service, and many colleagues will have met our excellent staff in the local pension service who run advice centres and do home visits, of which we made more than 500,000, showing that there is a human face to the service. If people do not like the forms—many of us do not—they can apply over the phone for pension credit.

There have been a number of changes and pensioners have fewer changes to their circumstances to report. Whatever the important arguments about the advantages and disadvantages of targeting or means-testing—I know that there are advantages and disadvantages—let us at least acknowledge that what we are doing with the pension credit and the Pension Service is a million miles away from the folk-lore memory of old-style means-testing.

There is an important point about gender and pension credit. Getting on for 3.2 million individuals benefit from pension credit. It is no coincidence or accident that 2 million-plus of those are women. Women have not often accumulated a full national insurance pension because they either brought up children or were carers, which made them less likely to have occupational pensions.

Mr. Willetts: The Minister talks about the pension credit. This is an opportunity for him to set out the Government's plans if they were to have a third term. Will he clearly state, for the record, that if they win they will uprate both the guarantee credit and savings credit by earnings, not prices?

Malcolm Wicks: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to talk about the important issue of gender, and I am disappointed. For this Parliament, we have made the commitment to index link with earnings the pension credit. He will have to wait until the election and our manifesto to see what happens.

Many things are already in place that will support future generations. The state second pension, which perhaps we do not hear enough about, is important for low to middle-income earners. It gives people the opportunity for further state pension income, not just for those who are in full-time work, but also, most importantly, for disabled people, carers and many women. Up to 20 million people will benefit from the scheme. Low earners will receive at least double the sum to which they would have been entitled under the state earnings-related pension scheme. We have recognised the need to increase confidence in private pension provision in our Pensions Bill. The financial assistance scheme provides £400 million to help people who face the reality of losing their pension rights. The pension protection fund, very much to the credit of the former Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), will be regarded in future as a major piece of institutional reform by the Labour Government, ending the scandal of workers who have worked hard all their lives and paid into a final salary scheme losing their pension rights when, through no fault of their own, their company goes bust. The pension protection fund will stop that scandal, and we are proud of that.

Mr. Webb: Can the Minister answer a question asked by both Opposition spokesmen? Will the financial assistance scheme cover funds that have gone to the wall since May or June this year?

Malcolm Wicks: Of course we are looking at that difficult issue. Judgments are being made about many of those schemes. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that there is an issue of moral hazard, as we do not want to force companies to behave wrongly in the operation of their winding-up schemes. Given our commitment on PPF and the financial assistance scheme, he and the House will understand that we want to do the right thing but, for reasons of moral hazard, we must be careful.

The informed choice programme is important, and combined pension forecasts are now being produced. The nature of the pensions problem is partly demographic. Forecasts suggest that in the next 50 years—the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe made a strong point about this—the number of people over 65 will increase by three quarters, with numbers increasing more among the over-80s. As a result, the ratio of over-65s to people aged 20 to 64 will increase by 75 per cent. by 2050. There are therefore significant problems to consider, many of them related to demography. There are three main issues that will arise in future, and colleagues touched on them in their speeches. First, we are moving back to full employment, but too many people in their 50s, whatever the debate about the retirement age, are out of work. Employment rates are, however, moving in the right direction. Between 1997 and 2004, employment rates for people between 50 and the state pension age increased by more than 5 per cent. I am not complacent, however, as there are still too many people who are economically inactive. One million people on incapacity benefit would prefer to be in work, and we have policies to support them.

Secondly, ageism is an important problem. The Government will outlaw age discrimination. I have talked to constituents and other people in their early 50s who have been told that they are too old to work. Ageism can be as debilitating to individuals and as wicked and cruel as racism or sexism, and must be abolished. Thirdly, we are looking carefully at the state pension system. The Prime Minister said at our Brighton conference:

> "We will . . . design a pensions system that has the basic state pension at its core, gives special help to the poorest and provides incentives for hard-working families to save whatever their wealth or income."

That is our strategy in outline. We must enable more people to have a decent second pension, and the state second pension is important. The Turner commission will look at the complex issue of whether we should maintain voluntarism in occupational pensions or consider compulsion. We need to debate that difficult issue, and we await the commission's report.

These are important issues. The way in which we respond to the challenge of an ageing society is a big question for the 21st century. We are determined to respond to it positively, looking at the commitment of older people, not negatively and pessimistically. The pension question is a major issue in any consideration of an ageing society, and we should all address it seriously.

Question put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Pensions Report commissioned by the Government; notes that it reinforces the conclusions of the 2002 Green Paper identifying the need for all to work longer or save more; commends the Government's commitment to face the challenges of an ageing society and to tackle inactivity by helping those who want to work; welcomes Pension Credit, benefiting over 3.1 million people, and the state second pension, helping millions build decent second pensions; further welcomes new tax credits making a huge difference to saving incentives for 3 million lower earners; commends steps to restore confidence in pensions through the Pension Protection Fund and the £400 million Financial Assistance Scheme; notes the Government's commitment to tackling age discrimination, and to rewarding those continuing to work after state pension age; believes both main Opposition parties' policies are unaffordable and do nothing for the very poorest; notes that Conservative policies would create a £500 million deficit within four years and be unsustainable in the longer term; commends proposals building on the Government's historic success in tackling pensioner poverty, which will continue to build a pension system with the basic state pension at its core, while still helping the poorest and offering saving incentives for hard-working families.

Parcel Delivery Charges (UK Islands)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Joan Ryan.]

7.29 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland): I expect that all hon. Members will have had occasion at some time to curse the acres of adverts that are a common feature of every Sunday newspaper and supplement, and all the various inserts that come with them, offering a remarkable and sometimes exotic array of mail order goods. For some of my constituents, however, those Sunday supplements, alongside the internet and more traditional mail order catalogues, offer access to a range of goods and services that would otherwise be difficult for them to obtain.

Many Members, I suspect, will be less likely to understand the significance of the small asterisk attached to the banner headline offering "free delivery", which explains only in small print and at the bottom of the page, "UK mainland only". One business that offered a delivery charge of £7.75 to mainland customers wanted to charge one of my constituents £85. Such practices penalise local people and add significantly to the costs incurred by businesses. Of course, this creates a great deal of frustration in Orkney and Shetland—a frustration that my constituents bear with great patience and good humour. Companies boasting of a next-day delivery service are often met with a wry smile. The services offered by courier companies to the isles are often the poorest.

A few weeks ago, one of my constituents in Foula told me of a batch of veterinary medicines that were to be sent to the island from a supplier in southern England. I should say in passing that the supplier could just have easily been located anywhere in mainland Scotland, given the attitude that is often demonstrated there. Again, the supplier in question was adamant that the medicines would be with my constituent the next day. Knowing the reality of the situation, he was happy to expect them to arrive within four or five days. Two weeks later, he still had nothing.

It eventually transpired that the courier had dumped the package in the shed for goods to be transported to Foula from mainland Shetland, without anyone bothering to make arrangements for its onward transportation to the island. Such service is particularly damaging to an island such as Foula, which is 14 miles due west of mainland Shetland, in one of the most remote parts of my constituency. It has what could best be described as a challenging ferry service, and an air service four days a week. Driving to the local wholesaler if something does not arrive is simply not an option for the crofters of Foula. To discriminate against a market of some 50,000 people strikes me as short-sighted. One can to a degree understand why some companies add an extra charge for delivery to non-mainland residents; but to refuse to deliver to those communities at all is indefensible.

It would be remiss of me not to give credit were it is due. Some companies have been prepared to look again at their delivery charges, following representations that I have made. To favour the House with but one example, I commend a small internet company based in

[Mr. Alistair Carmichael]

Devon that supplies arts and crafts materials, called Kered. As a result of a constituent's complaint, I wrote to Kered to bring to its attention the inequity of its charging extra for delivery to islands. It went to the trouble of renegotiating its agreement with the courier. It previously charged £18 plus VAT for parcels delivered to the isles; the charge has now been reduced to £8.95 plus VAT. Would that there were more companies like Kered. If a small company such as Kered is able to make such significant progress, why cannot more major firms follow suit, given their economic clout?

Several other companies have realised that they can send parcels weighing less than 20 kg by Royal Mail for a relatively modest charge. It is disappointing that many businesses are oblivious to that service; however, I fear that that is as much a comment on the Royal Mail as it is on the businesses themselves. It is not just private individuals who are penalised by the poor and expensive postal service; many local businesses suffer, too.

According to a report produced by Postwatch Scotland in April 2003 on parcel and other postal services in the highlands and islands, 12.5 per cent. of companies have experienced difficulty with businesses refusing to send them goods. I suspect that the figure for businesses in island communities is higher than for those in the mainland highlands. The Postwatch report also revealed that 17 per cent. of highland and island firms were being charged higher delivery charges than businesses elsewhere in the UK.

Since the Postwatch report was published, many highland firms have experienced a reduction in postal charges. In January, Parcelforce announced that parcels travelling within mainland Scotland will no longer be surcharged if they cross Parcelforce's "invisible line", which has divided Scotland for some 15 years. However, parcels sent from elsewhere in the UK to the north of Scotland still have a surcharge added, and parcel recipients who live on Scottish islands still have to pay a surcharge, wherever the parcel comes from.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I represent a constituency that includes the Isles of Scilly, where Sunday newspapers and supplements do not arrive until the Monday. Does my hon. Friend recognise—I am sure he does—that other islands in the UK do not receive or benefit from what claims to be a universal service obligation? Does he also agree that there should be more equity in the service?

Mr. Carmichael: My geography is not all that it might be, but I certainly recognise that there are other islands within the UK. They do not necessarily have the good fortune of being within Orkney and Shetland, but no doubt they have their own charms. My hon. Friend makes a very good point. There is a history of discrimination here. I was born and brought up in an island community, and I, too, grew up to expect to get the Sunday papers on a Monday morning. The matter I raise is just one aspect of that particular difficulty.

When the Minister responds, I suspect that he will tell me that there is little he can do. That would be a perfectly fair comment. We now have a liberalised parcel market, so if companies cannot make a profit from deliveries to a constituency such as mine, they have the right to refuse to do so or to make extra charges. That may be true, but I hope the Minister will concede that the same would inevitably be true if we were ever to have a completely liberalised mail service for letter post. For my constituents, it would likely mean a worse service that would end up being more expensive.

I believe that a large part of my job in this place is to bring to the Government's attention the very real challenges that come from living away from the main centres of population in this country. Liberalising the mail market in the same way that the parcel market has been opened up would only add to our difficulties and to the pressure to move to already overcrowded parts of the country. The one yardstick by which I measure any proposal that comes before this place is what it is likely to do for population levels in the isles, because an island community is constantly struggling to maintain the critical mass of population. It is apparent from the contents of my mailbag that my constituents identify having a good reliable service that is comparable if not the same as that on offer to people in the rest of country as a crucial consideration in their decision either to come to or remain in our part of the country. In my experience, it is up there with the quality of health and education available to people in their communities.

This is not the first time that I have raised this subject with Department of Trade and Industry Ministers. I previously met with the Minister's predecessor and as recently as 16 September raised the matter with the Secretary of State at DTI questions. I have always received a sympathetic response from the Government, particularly the DTI, but I am not persuaded that they have any great ideas as to an answer. I await the Minister's reply with interest.

What I am looking for tonight is, first, a recognition that the Government understand the nature and extent of the problem, and secondly, that they are prepared to look for some means of solving it. If the Minister stood up in his place tonight and said that the Government would re-regulate the parcel service, I should be delighted. I should be absolutely astonished, but truly delighted. What we must achieve is somewhat more imagination and lateral thinking about how best to use the liberalised market that we are left with to ensure that island communities such as Orkney and Shetland—and others, which I am delighted to see represented in the Chamber tonight—do not suffer from this continued discrimination, which has a real impact on private individuals and businesses within our communities.

When I think back to my maiden speech, I remember saying that we were not looking for any special handouts or treatment. We wanted the same treatment as anyone else. This is one area in life where we previously had the same treatment, but it was removed from us, probably as a result of an unintended consequence. The challenge for me and for the Government now is to find some means of ameliorating the worst effects.

I am aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) wants to make a short contribution to the debate. He, too, represents a constituency that contains a number island communities—not least the one in which I was born and brought up. In view of the short time that has elapsed so far, I hope that the Minister will be able to range a little wider in his response.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this debate and on presenting his case very well. As he said, this problem affects our constituencies, as well as two or three others in the country. In the couple of minutes for which I shall speak, I shall concentrate on Parcelforce, which is a state-owned company.

Parcelforce takes a day longer to deliver parcels to Scottish islands than is the case with other parts of Britain. My constituents fully understand why that is, and accept it. However, the company charges double for that poorer service, and that is not acceptable. The double charge applies to parcels sent from England, Wales and lowland Scotland.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland noted, Parcelforce has made a concession: from early next year, parcels sent from lowland Scotland to the highlands will not be subject to the double charge. However, the concession does not extend to the islands.

Mail order is probably far more important to islanders than it is to people who live in other parts of the country, yet Parcelforce—as I said, a state-owned company—charges islanders double for the privilege of using it. I simply do not see the justification for that. What is it based on? It cannot be based on the cost of delivery. A parcel sent from, say, Largs to Cumbrae—a 10-minute ferry journey—still attracts the double rate charge. In contrast, it must cost much more to send a parcel from Cornwall to Aberdeenshire, yet that attracts only the ordinary rate. The price charged is therefore not based on distance or cost, nor on the fact that a parcel is going to an island. For example, there is no surcharge on parcels sent to the Isle of Wight. The surcharge applies only to the Scottish islands and to the Isles of Scilly.

A very small part of the country is therefore being charged double by a state-owned company. If living on islands is to be economically sustainable, islanders must be able to access public services such as Parcelforce at the same rate as the rest of the country.

My suggestion to the Minister is that the Royal Mail's universal service obligation should be extended to Parcelforce. That would entail only a slight extra cost, in the context of Parcelforce's overall budget, but it would be of tremendous benefit to the economies of the islands.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this debate. As he said, this is an important issue for island communities, wherever they may be. I am aware that in March last year he met my predecessor as Minister with responsibility for postal services, who is now the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, to discuss parcel services. I know, too, that the hon. Gentleman raised his concerns with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry during parliamentary questions on 16 September this year, and that he has also met with representatives from Parcelforce to discuss these concerns.

The House will be interested to know that, since I took over responsibility for the Royal Mail and postal services, I have met many of the stakeholders involved. I shall meet Parcelforce representatives in the near future and I shall take that opportunity to raise these concerns with them again.

This debate gives me an opportunity to set out the background to the restructuring of Royal Mail. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made two statements in the House, in March and June 2002, following the announcements by Allan Leighton, the chairman of Royal Mail—which was then known as Consignia—about the company's three-year plan to restructure its postal services.

The need for that restructuring was clear. The company showed a pre-tax loss of £1.2 billion in 2001–02. Even allowing for exceptional costs from restructuring, there was still an underlying loss of £318 million on day-to-day operations—about £1.2 million for every single working day. The aim of the company's renewal plan was to reduce costs by £1.4 billion a year, wipe out the losses, and return the business to profit by April 2005. I am pleased to say that Royal Mail has returned to profitability and the management has gripped costs and reduced overheads. While that is a real achievement, there is still a huge task ahead to turn the company around to long-term sustainable profitability.

The first phase of Royal Mail's plans, announced in March 2002, included the restructuring of Parcelforce, as the hon. Gentleman said. Again, it was not difficult to see why a radical overhaul of the business was necessary. Parcelforce had been loss making since its conception back at the end of the 1980s: from 1992 to 2002, its losses totalled £508 million. Despite initiatives to stem those losses, including investments in Parcelforce of about £200 million in recent years, the business has continued to lose money. Several business models have been tried, but in 2002 it was losing £15 million a month as the company failed to reduce its costs fast enough as the business declined. It was clear that the business model had failed, and the board decided to restructure Parcelforce in order to try to return the company to profitability.

Parcelforce has been restructured into an express parcels carrier and now provides customers with a range of highly reliable time-certain and day-certain delivery services. Parcelforce is, therefore, operating in a fully competitive market. The universal service for parcels—the standard three to five day delivery service—was transferred to Royal Mail and provides for delivery of parcels weighing up to 20 kg at a uniform price anywhere in the United Kingdom.

After two years of the renewal plan, there has been an improvement in Parcelforce's performance, but it still lost more than £100 million in 2003–04. More change is being implemented during the current financial year, with the aim of Parcelforce's operations breaking even by the end of the year. That is by no means certain, so the management need to keep control of costs. Otherwise, the target will not be achieved and the cycle of losses will continue.

[Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe]

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of mail order companies refusing to send goods to the islands. There is no reason why any mail order company cannot use Royal Mail's standard parcels service, which, as I have said, delivers parcels weighing up to 20 kg at a uniform price anywhere in the United Kingdom. For example, a parcel weighing up to 1 kg and delivered within three to five working days after posting costs £3.46.

Mr. Alan Reid: With Royal Mail's standard parcel service, the customer does not sign for a parcel. For mail order companies, having parcels signed for is an important part of the process. That is the problem with the standard service.

Mr. Sutcliffe: When I speak to Parcelforce, I will raise that issue. I shall do that as the Minister with responsibility for postal services, but also as the Minister with responsibility for consumer affairs. Consumers in the islands are not getting a reasonable deal, and we need to address that.

Mr. Carmichael: Does the Minister share my concern that it seems to be up to Members such as myself to go to mail order companies and tell them that they can use the Royal Mail's standard parcel service? It does not seem to be properly marketed. That is also an issue for Royal Mail generally. I met representatives of Royal Mail recently about the newspaper registration service. It turned out that Royal Mail had services that would better serve the users of the newspaper registration service, but nobody had ever thought to market those services to those users. Does not that cause the Minister some concern?

Mr. Sutcliffe: It does, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not get into a detailed discussion of Royal Mail and the issues he raises. I have been responsible for the matter for only a few weeks and at some time in the very near future I will have a view about progress for the Royal Mail and post office services. The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point and the work that he and other hon. Members on both sides of the House are doing is raising the profile of the services with the mail order companies. He will know that mail order companies have issues about delivery in terms of the development of their businesses, and I will look at the issues that he has raised.

I recognise concerns that Royal Mail's standard parcels service does not meet some mail order companies' requirements for a signature as proof of receipt. Although Royal Mail can offer a range of product services for contract customers, it is true that contract standard parcel services are not included within the universal service obligation, which applies only to non-account services paid for through stamps or meter frank impression.

If the standard product does not meet the needs of individuals or contract customers, including mail order companies, they can take advantage of a range of alternative services offered by Royal Mail, although I acknowledge that there is an issue about the marketing of those services. They include Packetpost for business customers who send more than 5,000 parcels in a year and Packetpost Returns for businesses whose customers return 2,000 or more parcels annually. In addition, the second-class Packetpost service was extended to a maximum weight of 2 kg, providing customers with an option for relatively small and lightweight packages, including mail-order goods.

I appreciate concerns that Parcelforce charges higher prices for delivering to some parts of the country, including the highlands and islands of Scotland, the Scilly Isles and the Western Isles. However, the pricing structure for Parcelforce's new express services is a matter for the company, which is operating in a commercial and highly competitive environment—there are about 4,000 other carriers in the UK. Zonal pricing is nothing new. Parcelforce's zonal tariff structure for Scotland, for example, has been in place for 15 years, and such structures are also employed by Parcelforce's competitors. It would not be right to oblige Parcelforce to provide uneconomic services while other companies are free to pick and choose.

Parcelforce "has listened"—it says in my notes—to the concerns that have been raised. It will listen to them. As the hon. Gentleman said, the company introduced a new pricing structure for Scottish customers in January 2004, following its review of services in Scotland. That review, which began in February 2003, was carried out in response to the demands of customers and focused specifically on the Scottish network, looking both at the services the company provided to customers and at pricing.

Mr. Carmichael: The Minister is being generous in giving way. My experience as a constituency Member has been that Parcelforce has done its level best, but does the Minister accept that the difficulty is the underlying structure of the market in which the company is required to operate? Parcelforce cannot subsidise operations to my constituency, to the Western Isles or anywhere else; it would be swiftly picked up under competition law if it did so. Can we find a mechanism to make competition law work in our favour instead of always working against us? Is not this a case of market failure?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman again tempts me into an interesting debate about competition and marketing, but I must refuse to engage in it at present. We shall return to the matter, as under my consumer brief there are certainly issues about performance and detriment to consumers. However, so that I can deal with the issues under debate in the context of my responsibilities for postal services, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I stick to the script and investigate further after our debate.

Parcelforce has maintained its policy of not surcharging parcels being sent from the highlands and islands to England and Scotland. In addition, Parcelforce does not make a surcharge for customers sending parcels from one island to another; they pay only the zone 1 rate. The company has also abolished its zonal surcharge for parcels travelling within mainland Scotland.

I appreciate that not all customers are entirely satisfied with the outcome of the review, as has been pointed out. However, Parcelforce has considered the issues long and hard and believes that it has achieved the best balance between meeting the needs of its Scottish customers and providing services on an economically sound basis, but I am sure that the company will listen to representations and to the discussions that will take place.

As I said, the universal service obligation for parcels—the standard three-day service—has transferred to Royal Mail. Concerns have been expressed that Royal Mail has raised proposals to abandon its universal service obligation. I can appreciate those concerns, but I can assure the House that they are unfounded. Royal Mail has not raised that issue with the Government, nor do I expect it to do so. The Postal Services Act 2000 requires that the universal service must be provided at an affordable, uniform tariff throughout the UK. The Government have no plans to change that requirement.

Postcomm, the independent regulator for postal services, and Royal Mail have been discussing the possible introduction of some geographic pricing in relation to bulk mail products used by the company's larger customers. Royal Mail wants to introduce that approach to enable it to compete with other postal operators as the market is further liberalised. I understand that Postcomm intends to publish its initial views on the proposal later this month. Let me make it clear, however, that those proposals will not affect everyday users of postal services, such as small businesses or, for example, individuals sending birthday cards to relatives. So people will continue to be able to send parcels, as well as letters, at a uniform tariff to every part of the country, including remote and rural areas.

As I said earlier, during parliamentary questions on 16 September, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that we would draw the concerns of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland to the company's attention. As I have already said, I will raise those concerns with Parcelforce when I meet its representatives in the near future. However, I wish to make it clear that Parcelforce—I know that the hon. Gentleman will accept this—must be allowed to operate commercially in a highly competitive environment in competition with other companies in the parcels sector and that its pricing and services structure is therefore an operational matter for the company, as it is with its competitors.

I must stress—I am sure that I will do so on many occasions in time to come—that it is not for the Government to subsidise the continuation of unprofitable services in a competitive market. That would be unfair to other operators and, as the hon. Gentleman said, it would probably constitute illegal state aid.

I want to ensure that that the hon. Gentleman's issues and those of other hon. Members are addressed. We will do so in the usual discussions that take place. I undertake to respond to the hon. Gentleman on the issues raised, probably in writing, after the meeting with Parcelforce. I will consider the issues in the way that he suggests in the context of the marketplace and the detriment that his and other hon. Members' constituents are suffering because of the attitude of the mail order companies. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has had an opportunity to speak to the Mail Order Traders Association.

Andrew George: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, as time is now running out, but I want to emphasise something to him. My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) has articulately made the case, particularly in relation to his constituents and those of the Scottish islands. In fact, many of the issues raised have significant parallels in the Isles of Scilly in my constituency. I hope that the consultations and reviews that the Minister mentions in respect of parcel services will bleed south of the border and south of the English border, down to Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly as well.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman never fails to take the opportunity to mention his constituency and west country issues. I am grateful to him for that, but the debate relates to the areas that are suffering detriment at the moment.

There are another six or seven pages of the brief that is before me, but I simply wish to say that I will consider the issue and see what can be done in the spirit in which the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland has dealt with it. I congratulate him on raising the issue. I hope that he will rest assured that we will take note of what he and other hon. Members have said, and we will get back to him in due course.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Eight o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Income Tax

1. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): How many people pay income tax at the top rate; and what the figure was in 1997. [190537]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Some 2.1 million people paid higher rate tax in 1997, compared with the current year in which 3.4 million pay it. The reason is that twice the number of people now earn more than £30,000, £50,000 and £100,000 than in 1997. In 1997, 2.6 million employed people earned more than £30,000, but now almost 6 million do so.

Mr. Prentice: I wonder how many people share my concern that the number of people captured in the higher rate tax band appears to be growing exponentially. Is my right hon. Friend aware of the forecast produced by the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which suggests that by the end of the next Parliament a staggering 4.4 million people will be higher rate taxpayers? Are we happy with that?

Dawn Primarolo: As my hon. Friend will know, the Government and Labour Members are extremely happy with the economic stability, the growth in employment and earnings and the way that tax and benefit reform has ensured that the poorest receive the most. He will also be aware that the Government have undertaken not to raise the basic or top rates of income tax within the lifetime of this Parliament.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): At what level of income does the Paymaster General consider someone to be rich?

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the hon. Lady will want to concentrate much more on ensuring that the poorest in our society receive support from this Government. She will have noticed from my reply that twice as many people are now earning more than £30,000, at the same time as the poorest fifth of households have been helped considerably by the Government's tax and benefit reform.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): There is another way of looking at this issue. If more people pay tax in the highest band, it means that the booming economy has resulted in more people getting more wages and salary. If we added on another 2 per cent. tax for higher rate taxpayers, such as MPs, Cabinet Ministers, directors and the rest of them, we would be able to pay a pension of £150 to every pensioner. That is another way of looking at it.

Dawn Primarolo: I thank my hon. Friend, who is always challenging in the ways he tackles problems both in his constituency and in the Chamber. I am sure he would agree with me that the fact that pensioners, especially the poorest ones, are now considerably better off is yet another way of looking at this problem. The reforms that the Government have undertaken, including the pension credit, ensure that the poorest third of pensioners receive more money. My hon. Friend will note that twice as many people earning more than £30,000 is a tribute to the success of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his brilliant stewardship of the economy.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): More than 1.3 million extra people have been sucked into paying the higher rate of income tax under Labour. The Paymaster General failed to say that the main reason is that while average earnings have gone up by 39 per cent., the higher rate threshold—including the personal allowance—has gone up by only 29 per cent. Does she agree that that means that a Chancellor who promised not to increase income tax has in fact increased it for 1.3 million people?

Dawn Primarolo: That is ridiculous. I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new post and thank him for pointing out the spectacular growth in earnings under this Government. A family with one earner on average male mean earnings of £29,300 a year has a tax rate of 20.1 per cent. That is lower than it was in 1997 under his Government and lower than in any year under his Government, right back to 1979.

Mr. Osborne: Because of the Chancellor's stealthy trick with the tax thresholds, which even the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) pointed out to the House, the 1.3 million extra higher rate taxpayers now include deputy head teachers, police inspectors and warrant officers in the Army. Does the Paymaster General think that it is fair that those people pay the higher rate of income tax? Indeed, does she think that they are rich?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman himself pointed out the vast growth in average earnings, which, as I said to the House, are doubling the number of those earning £30,000, £50,000 and £100,000, in a progressive tax system in an economy that is growing, with 1.8 million extra jobs. Those are the figures we see. The question that the Opposition have to answer is:

what would they do? What are their proposals for tackling that? The only commitment we appear to have from them is that they will slash public expenditure.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): When my right hon. Friend considers future taxation policy, will she also consider the merits of moving further along the road of using environmental taxation? If she does so, she may be able to reduce tax rates below even those that the Government have so far been able to achieve.

Dawn Primarolo: I thank my hon. Friend for his support for the climate change levy, which was implicit in his question. Just in case the Chancellor did not hear his early Budget representation, I shall certainly make sure that those views are brought to my right hon. Friend's attention.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): The Paymaster General knows that we disagree with both her and the Conservatives over the top rate of income tax and believe that it would be fair and practical to have a top-rate marginal tax of 50 per cent. on earnings over £100,000. As she believes that there are significant economic disincentives for a higher marginal rate of tax, will she explain the findings of the Pensions Commission, published this week, that four in 10 pensioners—a growing proportion—are now paying marginal rates in excess of 50 per cent., and that a quarter of them pay marginal rates in excess of 75 per cent.? Is there not massive inconsistency in the Government's thinking on the matter?

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the pension credit reducing the 100 per cent. marginal rates that existed previously. Much as I respect the hon. Gentleman, the real problem with the Liberal Democrats is that they advocate one particular proposal to raise funding to cover all their expenditure—which it will not—thereby fundamentally undermining the very economic stability that ensures that people are earning more and are in employment, and that we have a stable economic framework.

Third World Debt

2. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on the progress being made towards writing off third world debt. [190538]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I can report to the House on progress at this month's World Bank meetings and the International Monetary Fund meetings that I attended and chaired on behalf of the United Kingdom.

We decided to extend debt relief for an additional two years, making possible a debt write-off of more than £100 billion, and the decision was also made to examine in detail the British plan to match 100 per cent. bilateral debt relief by, for the first time, 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief, paid for by contributions from donor countries and, potentially, by receipts from IMF gold.

The House will also want to know of discussions I held at those meetings that led me today to instruct the Bank of England to freeze with immediate effect the assets of JTJ, the terrorist group that publicly admitted involvement in the murders of Kenneth Bigley and five other hostages and has perpetrated a range of terrorist acts across Iraq. Following our discussions, we are working with international partners to deny JTJ access to funds across the world. We must do all in our power to ensure that there is no hiding place for terrorists and no hiding place for those who finance terrorism.

Mr. Robertson: I thank the Chancellor for that answer. The whole House will welcome what he announced in the second part of his reply.

May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the situation in Ethiopia? The UK has helped that country through debt relief and through contributions; in fact, we are increasing contributions to Ethiopia. However, the amounts that we are able to give are only a fraction of what the country has to pay in servicing its remaining debt, which is about £2 billion. Will the Chancellor, therefore, redouble his efforts to persuade the rest of the international community to speed up debt relief to Ethiopia?

Mr. Brown: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his initial remarks. I believe that our outlawing of that terrorist organisation will be welcomed by everyone in the House.

On Ethiopia, I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman has a long-standing interest as secretary of the all-party group on Ethiopia and that he is very much involved in looking at the problems of Africa as a whole. He will, therefore, be interested in the proposal that we put to the IMF and the World Bank. Half the debts of Ethiopia are multilateral debts; as a result, it has not benefited as much as it might have from bilateral debt relief and, as he says, the remaining debts are in the order of £2 billion or more. Our proposal to reduce multilateral debt relief will be of particular benefit to Ethiopia.

I understand the urgency with which the hon. Gentleman puts his case. We know that, as a result of all the problems in Ethiopia, life expectancy is little over 40. We know that, despite all the attention that has been given to Ethiopia, there are only 2,000 doctors for 70 million people. We know, too, that one in five infants dies before the age of one. It is, therefore, urgent that we do more both on overseas aid and on wiping out the debts that arose from a previous regime. I hope that we can work together on solving that problem.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that we will all be delighted to hear that multilateral debts will at last be tackled because this country has taken a lead on our bilateral debts and it is necessary for other countries to follow us. What progress has the Chancellor been able to make on the international finance facility, which will not only increase the money available, but involve the other international partners that we need to bring in? We need to look beyond the original heavily indebted poor countries. He knows that many other low-income countries would benefit from debt relief, so what progress has he made on that?

Mr. Brown: On my hon. Friend's last point, our proposal for 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief will extend beyond the 37 HIPC countries to what are called International Development Association-only countries. Such countries do not have high debts, but have problems because of some of their debts.

In addition, we have been gaining support for the international finance facility. More than 40 countries are supporting our proposal. A report has been done for the World Bank and the IMF and a report is being done for the United Nations. The matter will be on the agenda when we chair the G7 in Britain next year. I hope that we will receive support from not only international organisations and national Governments, but campaigning organisations—I know that my hon. Friend has played a big part in helping that to grow. The proposal for the international finance facility has been helped by our decision in the spending review to set a timetable for raising overseas development aid to 0.7 per cent. I hope that the Conservative party will change its policy that would lead to massive cuts in such aid because it would be completely unacceptable.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Does the Chancellor now regret his missed opportunity to become the managing director of the International Monetary Fund?

Mr. Brown: The managing director of the International Monetary Fund, Mr. Rato, is a very good friend of mine. He used to be the Finance Minister for Spain. He is doing an extremely good job and was supported by the United Kingdom. I know that the hon. Gentleman is interested in what happens to gold, so I can tell him that Mr. Rato is now supervising an investigation into the possible off-market disposal of IMF gold so that we can raise sufficient money to write off the multilateral debts that are owed to the IMF. Some 15 per cent. of multilateral debts are owed to the IMF, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be able to support the sale of gold on this occasion.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does the Chancellor share my view that development aid is not administered by the European Union as effectively as it could be?

Mr. Brown: Both sides of the House should have a common opinion of the problem that we face. Although 90 per cent. of our overseas aid goes to the poorest countries in the world and we use untied aid so that it can go to help the poor directly, less than 50 per cent. of the European Union's overseas aid budget goes to the poorest countries in the world, with the result that only €3 per head goes to Africa and €0.3 per head goes to Asia—the two poorest continents in the world. We propose to release €1 billion from the EU external aid budget so that the money can go to the poorest countries in the world. I am asking the overseas aid Commissioner, who has not given total support to my proposal for the international finance facility, to tell his successor that he should seriously consider increasing the amount that the EU gives for debt relief, getting money to the poorest countries and supporting our proposal for an international finance facility, which is now receiving support throughout Europe.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): I congratulate the Chancellor on the action that he has taken to date, and the international leadership that he has given, to write off third world debt. What support from overseas aid has been given to the Cayman Islands and other islands in the Commonwealth that have been devastated this summer by hurricanes?

Mr. Brown: We have given money to the Caribbean countries and we are giving additional support as a result of what has happened over the past few weeks. Such countries with debt burdens that are unmanageable and unpayable are part of the process through which we are writing off debt. Although we talk about Africa and Asia as the poorest continents, there are Caribbean countries that need their debts writing off. I hope that we can get all-party support for moving forward on that, but difficult decisions must be taken. We must invest more of our overseas aid budget into debt relief and win support from other countries for the international finance facility. I tell the shadow Chancellor that the process would be helped if all political parties supported an increase in the international development budget instead of calling for massive cuts to it.

Small Firms Loan Guarantee

3. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the small firms loan guarantee. [190539]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Following the Graham review, which reported in the past few days, I can report to the House a major change in the scale, quality and speed of small business support throughout the United Kingdom. For firms less than three years old with turnovers of £5.6 million or less, loans now under the small business guarantee scheme will increase from a maximum of £100,000 to £250,000 and will be administered by an independent company at arm's length from the Government.

Based on the successful US model, we are also piloting enterprise capital funds that could invest up to £2 million in small businesses. With low interest rates and small business tax cut from 23p to 19p, all types of small business can get the extra finance that they need.

Mr. Cunningham: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Has he implemented the recommendations on the small firms loan guarantee?

Mr. Brown: The Graham report is into the small firms loan guarantee scheme and is being implemented by the Government. The main change is that instead of being able to borrow only £100,000 for new investment, firms of less than three years' standing can now borrow £250,000. The scheme has helped thousands of companies over the years. Twice as many companies are getting help now. It is as a result of that scheme and others that 400,000 more small businesses are in the economy than there were in 1997, which shows the success of an economic policy based on stability.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has > "a cross-government role in the co-ordination of government policy."

When did the right hon. Gentleman last meet the Chancellor of the Duchy to discuss small business and co-ordination? If they disagree about the co-ordination, who has the final say? Is it the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Chancellor of the Duchy?

Mr. Brown: I think I met him at the Cabinet meeting only a few minutes ago.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): What the Chancellor has announced is very good news. In some of the poorest constituencies in the land, such as my own, it is difficult for new start-up businesses to access finance. Will the company have a specific remit to work proactively in some of the poorest constituencies, which have the lowest number of new businesses starting up, to help those companies to set up?

Mr. Brown: We have created enterprise areas in those areas where historically there has been high unemployment. Some 2,000 enterprise areas have greater advantages in terms of the help that can be given to start-ups and the fastest planning permission that can be granted for starting up a business. There is more help for new investment projects in my hon. Friend's constituency and others around the country.

The range of support available to small business starting up is greater than at any time in our history. It is for that reason that we now have 4 million small businesses compared with just over 3.6 million in 1997; that the number of self-employed has risen by more than 100,000 since 1997; and that the number of people employed in small business has risen by two thirds of a million since 1997. We are not complacent and intend to do more, but in every constituency of this country there are more small businesses—in some cases, several hundred more—than there were in 1997.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Chancellor realises that the scheme is excellent, and we support it. It was set up by a former Conservative small business Minister. Is he aware that most of the small firms organisations have been saying for some time that it should be administered by the clearing banks without day to day involvement by civil servants? Will he heed that advice?

Mr. Brown: I announced only a few minutes ago that that is exactly what we are doing. The scheme will be at arm's length from the Government, administered by a company that can make independent decisions, free of interference from the Department of Trade and Industry. Both the Liberal party and the Conservative party had better look at their proposals for the future of small businesses because I understand that both not only want to cut the support that is available, but want to abolish the Department in its entirety.

Science Strategy

4. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): What representations he has received on his Department's measures to support science. [190540]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Following 200 representations in support of our 10-year science strategy and the announcement of an additional £1 billion of funding for science by 2008, I can report that we will have a national conference on science and innovation, in advance of the Budget, with all members of the scientific community and industry. We will discuss with them further ways of building on the successful 10-year strategy that was launched in the summer to improve the quality and quantity of science investment in the United Kingdom.

Ross Cranston: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. He will know that we have an excellent science base. The problem is translating that into practical reality, demonstrated by the historical low research and development expenditure. Professor van Reenen recently demonstrated that that was especially low in the 1980s because of a lack of Government support. Van Reenen and his colleagues have also said that tax subsidies have an effect, so the Government's measures on tax credits are to be welcomed. But could the Chancellor ensure that at the conference the separate issue that the Economic and Social Research Council identified in its report on productivity, namely intellectual property rights, will be on the agenda?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is right—the protection of intellectual property is crucial, particularly for a country such as ours, which holds a sizeable number of the new patents that are issued throughout the world. It is also important to recognise that the development of the science base in this country is possible only if there is substantial Government funding for science. The increase of £1 billion from the Government in the next few years, together with the welcome investment by the Wellcome Foundation, which is providing an additional £1 billion, will build up the science base in this country over the next few years in a way that has not happened before. A few minutes ago, I said that we now have the best support in living memory for small businesses to develop, and we also have the best support available, and we want to do more, to aid science and technology in this country, and to help spin-off companies from the universities. Not only will we do what we can to protect intellectual property but we will maintain the growth of incentives available to science-based industries.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I have to say that what the Chancellor has just said is complete rubbish. Is he not aware that his changes to the rules on venture capital have killed start-up businesses emerging from our universities stone dead? Will he go away, look at the problem and come back with something positive to tell the House? He should stop telling us things that, frankly, are not what universities are experiencing on the ground.

Mr. Brown: I would take the hon. Gentleman's representation seriously if he had been right about the windfall tax, which he opposed, extra spending on the NHS, which he opposed, and the minimum wage, which he opposed. He is factually wrong about what is happening to the venture capital industry in this country. The extra incentives that we have given that industry have been welcomed by all parts of it, which shows how remote the Conservative party is from business and industry in this country.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): The Chancellor may be aware that the Treasury Committee is currently conducting an inquiry into regional productivity. On a recent visit to Germany, we were impressed by the nationwide Fraunhofer research institutes, which bridge the gap between higher education research and manufacturing industry. What measures is he taking to ensure that the welcome increase in science spending will secure the linkage between universities, higher education, manufacturing and other industries so that we can increase economic prosperity and productivity throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Brown: My right hon. Friend, who is undertaking that investigation as Chairman of the Treasury Committee, is quite right—we want to build modern manufacturing strength in this country, which depends on investment in science and technology and on universities being in a position to produce spin-off companies. However, it also depends on businesses investing in innovation in ways that they did not in previous years. We have set a target to raise innovation expenditure from 1.9 per cent. to 2.5 per cent., and have put in additional money ourselves. The research and development tax credit has been taken up by thousands of small firms—

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): The Chancellor is wrong—it has been taken up by only 5 per cent. of all firms.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong, as 95 per cent. of the firms eligible for the small business R and D credit have taken it up. I shall write to him today to put him right about the facts. Perhaps the Treasury Committee should undertake an inquiry into the Conservative party's lack of knowledge about what is happening to British industry. We will have to offer a course of education so that its candidates are prepared at the next election.

Mr. Prisk: As the Chancellor wants to talk about innovation, let us do so. Innovation and science, as he knows, rely on good research and development. He mentioned his tax credit scheme, yet it specifically and quite intentionally excludes the smallest partnerships and firms. Given that those are the very entrepreneurs who are at the cutting edge of both science and technology, why is the Chancellor deliberately excluding them from the scheme? Perhaps he should learn that lesson.

Mr. Brown: We are spending £600 million on the small business R and D credit scheme. The hon. Gentleman proposes to extend the scheme to other firms, so presumably he wants to spend more on that credit. Why, therefore, does the shadow Chancellor want to cut the budget for science and research and development? Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should have a seminar with his right hon. Friend to try to square the circle.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Scientists in my constituency appreciate the Chancellor's championing of science and the vast increase in that budget under this Government. How can we ensure that 2.5 per cent. of publicly funded research and development actually gets to small businesses?

Mr. Brown: Small businesses collect the R and D tax credit themselves. The tax credit is efficient; it works in America; and now it is working in Britain. The Conservatives should understand that thousands of companies' innovation plans depend on the R and D tax credit, which would be abolished under a Conservative Government. Not only the CBI, but all major businesses in this country welcomed our 10-year science document. The Opposition may want to disparage the Royal Society, Microsoft, the Wellcome Trust, the CBI and Qinetiq, which wanted the science strategy. The Conservative party would cut science expenditure, which, like the health service, education, transport and law and order, is another area of public expenditure that is at risk from a Conservative Administration.

Tobacco Duty

5. Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): If he will commission research to assess the impact on revenues from duty on tobacco of Government initiatives to seek to reduce levels of smoking. [190541]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): Smoking kills 120,000 people in this country every year and adds more than £1.5 billion to NHS costs. The Government's primary concern is to reduce those health and other social costs by cutting smoking. Of course, we also review the consequences for the tax system caused by changes in consumption each year as part of the Budget process.

Mr. Steen: I am a long-term campaigner to restrict smoking in public places. Bearing in mind that hon. Members on both sides of the House have taken their positions, will the Economic Secretary tell the House whether he is in favour of people smoking themselves to death in restaurants, not to mention passive smoking, so long as it brings in a healthy sum to the Treasury?

John Healey: I explained to the hon. Gentleman that the Treasury keeps an eye on tax receipts from tobacco. However, the Treasury strongly supports the NHS's stop smoking services, the expansion of those services, campaigns to raise awareness of the risks of smoking for young people and the comprehensive ban on cigarette advertising. The hon. Gentleman's argument is—how can I put this gently and politely?—rubbish.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Are not health and education programmes the most appropriate way in which to help people—particularly people from low-income families—quit smoking, rather than simply pricing them out of the market?

John Healey: Successive Governments, including this one, have used the high price of cigarettes to encourage people to reduce smoking. That policy has been successful after the past two decades, but it is not the only measure that we take. The education campaigns that my hon. Friend mentioned are, in part, responsible for the recent cut in young people's regular smoking. The Government are considering a wide range of measures as part of our public health consultation, and my hon. Friends in the Department of Health will take my hon. Friend's comments as a late representation to that process.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Will the Economic Secretary also examine high levels of tobacco duty and smuggling? He knows that it is now estimated that some 30 per cent. of UK cigarettes are counterfeit and are therefore practically tax exempt, which obviously impacts on not only the overall tax take, but on the health programmes discussed by other hon. Members.

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman is rightly concerned, as we are, by tobacco smuggling's impact—about £3 billion a year—on the public purse. The differences in duty between the UK and other EU member states are not the point. The vast majority of smuggled cigarettes arrive in bulk with no duty having been paid within the European Union or anywhere else. Such organised criminal activity, which we are taking steps to disrupt, is the major problem that is causing a loss to the taxpayer.

Third World Poverty

6. Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): When he last met G7 leaders to discuss third world poverty. [190542]

7. Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): What his Department's policy is on ensuring that the resources allocated to tackling poverty in developing countries are used to best effect. [190543]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): At the IMF and World Bank meetings that I attended a few days ago, I proposed that we make better use of existing aid by reorganising priorities, untying aid and pooling funds internationally. That includes calling on the European Union to focus more of its aid on the poorest countries. We also propose that other countries set a timetable for spending 0.7 per cent. of their national income on aid, as well as a doubling of aid through the adoption of the international finance facility.

Mr. MacDougall: I congratulate my right hon. Friend not only on his response but on the effort that he has put into tackling world debt, which is well recognised across the House. Can he tell me how many countries are able to meet their public service requirements given the background of third world debt, and what hopes he has for the future as regards tackling that problem?

Mr. Brown: There are 27 countries receiving debt relief which has made it possible for them to spend more on their social policies, including health and education. Madagascar's spending has risen by 60 per cent., Uganda's has risen by nearly 50 per cent., and some countries have been able to double their expenditure on health and education. In Tanzania it has been possible to offer all children school education, and in Uganda the pupil:teacher ratio has been cut from 100:1 to 50:1. Those are the results of existing debt relief. Our new proposal for multilateral debt relief will release further funds for health, education and—this is absolutely crucial for the future—economic development.

Mr. Clarke: I acknowledge, as does the whole House, how much the Chancellor has done to increase real overseas aid. In doing so, however, may I encourage him to continue to demand the utmost transparency so that the funding that is made available grows to challenge illiteracy, poverty and all the ills of developing countries; and to continue to challenge corruption so that the people whom he intends to help—the many, not the few—are recognised by his policies?

Mr. Brown: Members on both sides of the House will agree with what my right hon. Friend says about tackling corruption and introducing transparency into public accounts and the way in which Governments operate. I applaud him for the work that he has done over many years in promoting the cause of developing countries.

When the economic group of the Commission for Africa met, uppermost in our minds was whether it was possible to secure a bargain with the African countries whereby in return for our providing additional aid, perhaps through the international finance facility, the central banks and finance ministries of those countries are prepared to be far more transparent by opening their books to show where the money is really being spent. That could be agreed at next year's meeting of the G7. I met central bank governors and finance Ministers from many countries in Africa to discuss a proposal that would require far greater transparency and the opening of the books before additional money was made available. That is why the conditionality to which my right hon. Friend refers is essential if we are to ensure the best use of overseas aid.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): I add my congratulations to the Chancellor on what he is doing for the very poorest people in the world and on what he is still trying to achieve. However, there have recently been disturbing reports that Department for International Development projects in Africa are being stopped or suspended and the money for them diverted to the reconstruction of Iraq. Is he not concerned that money promised to the very poorest people of the world should be used to repair the damage that our country and the USA have inflicted on Iraq? Should not that money more properly come from the Treasury, the Ministry of Defence, or even No. 10 Downing street?

Mr. Brown: I can tell the hon. Lady, who has also been a campaigner on debt relief and overseas aid, that the budget for the poorest countries in Africa is not falling, but increasing, and that no money has been taken from the budget that is available to the poorest countries for the necessary reconstruction of Iraq. The budgets for those countries are rising this year, next year, the year after and the year after that, and the money is going specifically to the poorest countries and poorest people in Africa and Asia. As the hon. Lady will see from the figures that DFID publishes, overseas development aid is rising each year so that we meet 0.47 per cent. by 2008 and 0.7 per cent., in line with the timetable, by 2013. If our international finance facility proposal is accepted by the rest of the world, or at least by many countries, we could get to 0.7 per cent. by 2009. That would be a major achievement indeed.

One of the effects of what we have managed to do in increasing our development aid budget and setting a timetable is that five additional countries over the last year have set a timetable for getting to 0.7 per cent. So what has started in some countries is being adopted by others, but I caution the hon. Lady against saying that money is being taken for Iraq, because more money is going to African countries.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Does the Chancellor agree that the simple cancellation of debt is perhaps one of the least effective ways to ensure that money is spent for the relief of poverty under what are, after all, some of the less accountable regimes in the world?

Mr. Brown: The cancellation of debt is the beginning—the starting point—for countries to be able to sort out their problems. If they continue to carry that burden of debt, it is not possible for them to take action on the problems that we have been talking about in the last few minutes. We have stood up for a very intense form of conditionality in relation to the poverty reduction strategies that have to be produced for the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. That requires country ownership of the problem, community involvement and civil society being involved in the discussion.

We have set down new guidelines, new rules and codes and standards that all countries have to follow in relation to the transparency of their public accounts, but it would be a terrible mistake for the hon. Gentleman to say that there should be no debt relief because he is dissatisfied with some of the ways that were adopted in the past. We are making huge improvements in transparency—more has to be done—but the problems in many of those countries will not be solved unless there is more generous debt relief.

Taxation and Saving

8. Mr Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): What assessment he has made of the effect of the level of taxation on (a) personal and (b) retirement saving. [190544]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): Relief on the taxation of savings has a very positive effect. Tax support for individual savings accounts and other forms of personal saving amounts to more than £2 billion a year. Annual tax relief to individuals and employers for retirement saving amounts to more than £11 billion.

Mr. Mackay: As the Chancellor has raided £5 billion each year from our pension funds, will the Financial Secretary accept some responsibility on the Chancellor's behalf for the awful mess that our pensions are now in?

Mr. Timms: The change that the right hon. Gentleman refers to removed a distortion in the system that favoured dividends at the expense of investment—a point made in 1993 by the Chancellor, Lord Lamont, in his Budget speech. Commenting on surplus advance corporation tax, he said:

> "This can have damaging economic effects . . . It cannot be right to distort the commercial decisions of British companies in this way".—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 186.]

I note that the Conservative party is not proposing to reverse that change. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, at the same time, introduced reductions in the rate of corporation tax, offsetting that change. That package has led to the unprecedented period of economic stability and growth that we have enjoyed since.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Is it not clear from the Turner report, which was published this week, that if our country is to continue to pay the basic state pension we obviously have to keep the level of taxation that we have at the moment or increase it, or indeed increase the age at which people retire? The Opposition propose to link the basic state pension back to earnings, and they have been disingenuous in pretending that they can also lower taxation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister does not answer for the Opposition. The Opposition worry about Opposition policies.

Mr. Timms: Certainly the Opposition's policy is unaffordable. The Turner commission has done us a great service by setting out the challenges that we face, not so much in the next 10 years, but over a 20 or 25-year period. I hope that we can have a mature and sensible debate across the House about what is the right way forward.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Does the Minister not realise the indirect damage that the pension tax has done, particularly to pensions saving, in terms of its leading to a 35 per cent. underperformance of the British stock market? There has been a major loss of value, and basically £5 billion is worth £100 billion of value.

Mr. Timms: The Turner commission makes the point that the impact of that change is comparable with that of the changes in the Finance Act 1986—a subject on which we hear rather less from those on the Conservative Benches. Turner also says—this is the key point—that the effects of both changes are small compared with the impact of the stock market fall and the rapid increase in longevity. Those are the big challenges that are affecting our pension system, and I hope we can have a mature and sensible debate about how best to address them.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): In considering the prospects for pensioners, will my hon. Friend ensure that the policies introduced by the Chancellor on pension credits, the 10p starting rate and the other benefits that pensioners receive continue—that is what pensioners are requesting, particularly poorer pensioners—so that we can ensure that they have a reasonable quality of life in retirement?

Mr. Timms: I welcome all the work that my hon. Friend has done in campaigning for improved income for pensioners. In 1997 a large number of pensioners were on a total income of £69 a week. Through the changes that we have introduced and the pension credit in particular, there have been dramatic improvements. I assure him that we will ensure that the pace of progress continues.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): It would be churlish not to begin by welcoming the Financial Secretary back to the post he once occupied with some distinction, and by offering him my commiserations on having to deal with the Chancellor's mess on pensions.

This week, one newspaper carried the banner headline, "The Great Pensions Betrayal". Does the Financial Secretary understand that headline? Does he see why people feel betrayed by the Chancellor's taxes on savings, the £5 billion tax raid on pension funds, and the means tests for pensioners?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his words of welcome, but I do not accept for a moment the characterisation that he has presented. As I said earlier, and as the Turner commission spells out clearly, the fall in the world stock market has raised big questions for the future of our pension system, as does the rapid increase in longevity, which of course all of us welcome. The impact of the items that the right hon. Gentleman listed is very small compared with those big changes. I genuinely hope that we can have serious reflection across the House on the basis of the Turner commission's useful work on the right way forward to deal with the big challenges that our pension system faces.

Mr. Letwin: When will the Financial Secretary and the Chancellor see that it demeans the whole of British politics when Ministers stand there and claim sole responsibility for all the good things in the economy and then claim that they have no responsibility whatever for the pensions crisis? Is he not concerned that, partly because of the Chancellor's taxes and his means test, we now have a savings ratio which is half the European average? Does not the Financial Secretary see that there is now an urgent necessity to restore the incentive to save?

Mr. Timms: The right hon. Gentleman needs to acknowledge that pensioner incomes have risen dramatically since 1997—faster than the rate of earnings growth. It is true that policy has focused, in our view, rightly, on the incomes of the least well off pensioners, but average pensioner incomes as a whole have risen faster than earnings. The current savings ratio is about the same as it was in the 1960s, the last time we had a period of stability and stable growth. Of course, in the early 1990s, because of the instability in the economy, the picture was different, but the savings ratio is currently higher than in the US. The right hon. Gentleman should pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the long period of stability and growth that we have enjoyed, which means that pensioners and all of us are much better off.

Health Expenditure

9. Siobhain McDonagh (Mitcham and Morden) (Lab): What the change in public expenditure on health has been in real terms since 1997. [190545]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): As a result of the Government's policy in successive spending reviews, public expenditure on health has risen by about 60 per cent. in real terms since 1997. By 2008, it will have risen by 90 per cent., to nearly £110 billion across the United Kingdom. That is the biggest ever sustained increase in national health service funding.

Siobhain McDonagh: May I thank my right hon. Friend for that brilliant answer, particularly for the people in my constituency? Under the last Conservative Government, the only remaining hospital in my constituency was closed, despite opposition from thousands of constituents. By contrast, my local health authority is today looking at ways to expand the health service, and one of its most amazing recommendations is that the Wilson hospital should reopen. If that recommendation is supported, as I anticipate it will be, what reassurance can my right hon. Friend give my constituents that the funds will be available to reverse the Tory decision and reopen the Wilson hospital?

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend is kind, but much more important she is also an effective campaigner for the health service in Mitcham and Morden. She will know that as a result of this Government's actions her primary care trust is seeing its budget rise by some 20 per cent. in real terms in just three years. The good news is that that resource is accompanied by reform that creates a more responsive service with greater choice and information for patients. I have no doubt that her constituents will continue to benefit from the reforms and resources that we are applying to the NHS. I have no doubt either that, in re-electing her at the next general election, whenever it comes, her constituents will comprehensively reject the mishmash of cuts and privatisation that are on offer from the Opposition.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If the Chief Secretary is right and so much more money, in his view, is being spent on hospitals, why is their state of cleanliness so poor, and why are thousands more people dying from MRSA?

Mr. Boateng: No one, least of all someone who has had the pleasure of working in the Department of Health, for one moment underestimates the challenges that are faced in terms of infection in hospitals or the extent to which dedicated NHS staff and managers are working to address those challenges. It is important to keep them in perspective, however, and to remember, too, that as a result of the investment in the NHS we are addressing those challenges, not simply with new build but also with training. We are making sure, too, that the procedures in place at every NHS facility correspond with the highest standards and the best international practice.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): Does the Chief Secretary agree that this unprecedented rising tide of investment presents an historic opportunity to correct local deficits in health funding and to tackle some of the health inequalities that blight our country? While all primary care trusts got at least double figure percentage increases last time, nevertheless some in the most deprived parts are more than £10 million away from target funding, while others in more prosperous areas are probably £10 million over target. With the next round of PCT allocations imminent, will the Chief Secretary meet colleagues from the Department of Health to see what can be done to remove entirely all distance from health funding targets?

Mr. Boateng: I know that my hon. Friend spends a great deal of time in his constituency on health service issues, and I will certainly make sure that his concerns on deficits and their impact in terms of our capacity to meet the targets that we have set ourselves for reducing health inequalities are made known to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health—who, I am sure, will be only too happy to make sure that he and his departmental team are fully aware of all those concerns.

Mortgage Rates

11. Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): What assessment his Department has made of the effect on the housing market of recent mortgage rate increases. [190547]

Mr. Boateng: Interest rates remain low by historical standards, ensuring that mortgage interest payments also remain historically low. Households' total interest payments are now 7.6 per cent. of disposable income, compared with a peak of over 15 per cent. in the early 1990s.

Mr. Pike: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. It is to the Government's great credit that we have seen low interest rates and low mortgage payments, which are so important. He knows that we have had to do something to stop the increase in house prices in London, which were escalating at too high a rate. Does he recognise that in my constituency, which I know he knows well, we have a problem with low demand, and that we do not want that to be affected by increases in interest rates?

Mr. Boateng: On previous occasions, my hon. Friend raised his particular concerns, which I know are shared by his constituents, about housing in Burnley. Interestingly, mortgage interest rates are only one factor impacting on the housing market in his constituency. As research has shown, in the north-west there remains a need to tackle underlying problems of poor quality and insufficient choice in housing. That is why the Government are ensuring that we are investing nearly £7 million this year specifically in housing in Burnley, and that is on top of the investment being leveraged in by the East Lancashire housing market renewal pathfinder, which amounts to some £15 million over two years. I will be visiting—next week, I believe—the Burnley pathfinder, where I look forward to seeing for myself the good work that I know is being done.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend looking at any particular measures to help first-time buyers, particularly in my constituency where there are real difficulties now because of house prices?

Mr. Boateng: There continue to be real concerns about affordability in relation to the housing market. That is why the Deputy Prime Minister is working on a long-term national goal for affordability in the housing market. Reforms to the planning system are being introduced to facilitate and help with that and we intend to consult on those changes in the coming year. It has to be about long-term solutions, but in the short to medium term we are also of course taking steps to improve access to the housing market for key workers.

It is important to remember that since 1997 there have been over 1 million new households as a result of the stability of the housing market, which reflects the underlying stability of the economy. People have more money that they are able to spend on housing, and that money is being spent, and spent in a way that improves not just people's access to housing but the quality of housing available to those people who will never be able to buy, because they are important too.

Financial Advice and Services

12. Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): If he will reform the rules governing the delivery of financial advice and services through the workplace. [190548]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): Yes we will, as part of the two-year review of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. We have had a large and supportive response to the consultation on our proposals, which concluded in May. I will announce the key outcomes of the review shortly. The changes will make it easier for employers to promote their pension scheme in the workplace, subject to safeguards.

Mr. Beard: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that in the evidence to the Treasury Committee on restoring confidence in long-term savings, there was widespread agreement on the advantages of being able to promote pension and savings schemes in the workplace, but at present employers are prevented from doing that? An employer cannot, for instance, promote a stakeholder pension scheme to which they contribute, although a very similar occupational scheme could be promoted. Does my hon. Friend agree that unless these legal inhibitions and anomalies are removed, the pension and savings issues raised by the Turner commission report this week cannot be properly addressed?

Mr. Timms: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. I had noticed that that point had been made in the evidence and I pay tribute to him for his work on the Select Committee and on the all-party group on financial markets and services. Research by the Association of British Insurers has shown that about 40 per cent. of employers feel inhibited from promoting their schemes by the current financial promotion regime. We are proposing an exemption from the regulations for employers so that they can provide advice to employees on their pensions without having to be regulated by the Financial Services Authority, along the lines that my hon. Friend proposes. I also take his point about urgency. I want to announce the outcome of the two-year review before Christmas and I hope that the regulations will be in place by next spring.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Is it not difficult for advisers to give good financial advice when Government policy keeps changing so rapidly, particularly in areas such as pensions? For example, can the Minister give people any guarantee that the pension credit will still be around in 10 years' time?

Mr. Timms: I think the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge that there have been enormous gains from the economic stability that we have enjoyed since 1997, including confidence for people making their preparations for the future. The pension credit has been an enormous success and I can certainly say to him that, subject to this Government's being re-elected, we will maintain the policy that has done so much to increase the incomes of the less well-off pensioners.

Pensions and Saving

13. Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): If he will make a statement on pensions and saving. [190549]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): Since 1997, the Government have provided £80 billion in support for pensions and saving. The pension credit supports more than 3 million of the least well-off pensioners, ending the scandal of pensioners forced to live on as little as £69 a week. With stakeholder pensions, individual savings accounts and, from next year, the child trust funds, we are delivering new incentives, simpler products and better information for pensioners and all savers.

Mr. Green: A few minutes ago, the Minister called for a mature, cross-party debate on pensions. I agree with him, and in that spirit I commend to him the words of the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who said in the House yesterday that the means-tested pension credit could not continue indefinitely. It is welcome that the Secretary of State is moving into the consensus that already contains the Conservative party, other Opposition parties and many outside bodies with an interest in pensions. So may I invite the Minister today to join that widening consensus—that progressive consensus, as the Chancellor would, no doubt, call it—and agree with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions that the means-tested credit will go?

Mr. Timms: I was present at the debate yesterday. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—who made an excellent speech on the subject, by contrast with the speech made by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who led the debate for the Conservative party—was talking about the future trajectory of indexation, which is a rather different matter from the one to which the hon. Gentleman refers. However, I can tell him that our determination to increase the income of the least well-off pensioners will continue. We have seen very dramatic improvements as a result of the pension credit, and I want that progress to be maintained.

Business of the House

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 OCTOBER—Opposition Day [19th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate entitled "Government's Failure on Crime", followed by a debate entitled "Government's Failure to Tackle Climate Change". Both debates arise on an Opposition motion.

TUESDAY 19 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 20 OCTOBER—Consideration of Lords Amendments to the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Bill, followed by a debate on the national service framework for children, young people and maternity on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 21 OCTOBER—A debate on defence in the world on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 22 OCTOBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 25 OCTOBER—Opposition Day [20th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

TUESDAY 26 OCTOBER—A debate on programming and other House business.

WEDNESDAY 27 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 28 OCTOBER—Second Reading of the School Transport Bill.

FRIDAY 29 OCTOBER—The House will not be sitting.

I should like to inform the House that business in Westminster Hall will be:

THURSDAY 28 OCTOBER—A cross-cutting question session on antisocial behaviour, followed by a debate on the United Kingdom in the United Nations.

THURSDAY 4 NOVEMBER—A debate on the report from the Foreign Affairs Committee on foreign policy aspects of the war against terrorism.

THURSDAY 11 NOVEMBER—A debate on the western Balkans: the challenges of post-conflict development.

As the House will have noted, I have announced the Second Reading of the School Transport Bill for Thursday 28 October. The House will also wish to know that we intend to introduce the Gambling Bill and, subject to the progress of business in the Lords, the Disability Discrimination Bill. All three Bills will be carried over into the next Session.

With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce the recess dates for the Commons calendar for the Session 2004–05. In doing so, I should reinforce my previous warning to the House that it is in the interests of everyone to treat the following dates as very provisional. Clearly, they are subject to the progress of business and I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House and staff will bear that in mind before making any plans to travel abroad.

The dates are as follows. For Christmas, the House will rise at the close of business on Tuesday 21 December and return on Monday 10 January. The constituency week will start at the close of business on Thursday 10 February, with the House returning on Monday 21 February. The House will rise for the Easter recess on Thursday 24 March and return on Monday 4 April. For the Whitsun break, the House will rise at the close of business on Thursday 26 May and return on Monday 6 June. The House will rise for the summer recess on Thursday 28 July and return on Monday 10 October.

The printed calendar will be available in the Vote Office for next week's business statement. However, details of the calendar are now available to our constituents, and to Members, on the website of the Leader of the House—www.CommonsLeader.gov.uk.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for publishing the annual parliamentary calendar today. It is very helpful for Members planning ahead to have such early notice. Now that the Prime Minister has told us that he would like to serve another five years—although I am not sure that the electors will necessarily give him the chance; I certainly hope not—is the Leader of the House thinking of bringing out another of those pseudo-Stalinist five-year plans, this time for parliamentary business? I look forward to hearing about that idea.

I understand why we shall not be sitting next September. Will the right hon. Gentleman treat next year's non-sitting September as a pilot for the future and can he assure the House that he will take the necessary steps to ensure that there is no resulting loss of the time available to scrutinise what the Government are doing?

Yesterday the Prime Minister apologised a little more for the information that he published before the war. Can we expect a statement next week pushing the apology another centimetre or two, perhaps admitting that—no doubt in good faith—he exaggerated the intelligence that he had been given? Surely, it will only be when he makes a full apology for misrepresenting the evidence that the public may begin to trust him again.

The Leader of the House has announced that the Gambling Bill will start its passage through the House. That is extremely welcome, given the worrying effects of unregulated internet gambling on children and the vulnerable. Why, however, was it necessary for that to be reported in the Financial Times today, rather than the Leader of the House simply coming here and telling us what he was doing? The report says:

> "Peter Hain, leader of the Commons, is expected to tell MPs that the gambling bill will be introduced into the Commons during the next four weeks. It will then be carried over into the new parliamentary session".

Surely we were entitled to hear that news first, particularly on an issue that I have raised with the right hon. Gentleman in the past.

Will the Leader of the House consider a debate on the middle east peace process? In all parts of the House, and in the country, there is deep concern about the continuing suffering and death on all sides. Perhaps the best time to hold such a debate would be after the presidential election, but the House will wish to discuss the situation soon.

Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that a full list of Bills and draft Bills that the Government intend to bring forward during the next Session will be published at the time of the Queen's Speech?

Finally, will the Leader of the House confirm that details of Members' expenses will be published next week? It would be helpful if he could tell us the date. Those expenses are governed by strict rules of the House and the proper mechanism for raising any questions is by means of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, Sir Philip Mawer.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful for some of the points that the shadow Leader of the House raised, especially about the calendar, because one of the reasons why I wanted to bring the information to the House as soon as possible was to allow Members—and, equally importantly, staff—to plan ahead.

May I deal with the hon. Gentleman's last point next? I am grateful to him for raising it. Details of Members' expenses will be published at 3.30 pm next Thursday, as agreed by the Members Estimate Committee. They will be published on the Parliament website, www.parliament.uk. As every Member is aware, the allowances are crucial in enabling MPs to undertake their duties, deal with the wide range of issues brought to them by constituents and represent their constituents' interests in Parliament.

To avoid any possible misinterpretation, I want to emphasise very strongly the point made by the shadow Leader of the House that all such expenses are accounted for in accordance with the strict rules of the House. Both the director of finance and administration and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards have a role in ensuring that those rules are followed and would, I am sure, be happy to answer any inquiries and questions. Each hon. Member, of whatever party, is affected equally, and I trust that no Member, not even a prospective parliamentary candidate, will deal with the disclosure in an irresponsible manner.

The Prime Minister's duration in office is a matter for the electorate in the first instance. After that, he has made clear his intention, with all our support, to serve a full third term. That cannot be clearer.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Iraq war and recycled the tired old attack—the Leader of the Opposition repeated it yesterday—that virtually questions the Prime Minister's integrity. The Prime Minister, with the support of the Cabinet, saw the intelligence that all the other intelligence agencies in the world saw and accepted as accurate. That includes the Russians, the French and the Germans, who disagreed with the decision to go to war. They accepted that the intelligence was accurate and we acted on it in enforcing the will of the United Nations. It does the hon. Gentleman and the Leader of the Opposition no credit to continue the recycled attack on the integrity of the Prime Minister, who showed a great deal of courage in making a tough decision, as was shown by the uncovering of the awful evidence of mass graves under Saddam. That evidence justified the decision to go into Iraq in support of United Nations resolutions.

I welcome the fact that the shadow Leader of the House is pleased about the introduction of the gambling measure. It is important that we regulate properly gambling on the internet and by other means. I have made an announcement about the Bill at the first opportunity. I thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman noticed that the Prime Minister announced in his speech at the Labour party conference that, as soon as the American presidential elections are out of the way, he will seek immediate re-engagement to secure an outcome that will achieve an independent Palestinian state and an Israeli state that is secure from terrorists and other attacks, living side by side. It is the only future for that part of the world. The sooner we engage actively—the Prime Minister has constantly worked for that with the United States Administration—in bringing that outcome to fruit, the better.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether we would publish the full list of Bills and draft Bills alongside the Queen's Speech. We intend to do that. It is in the interests of the House and the Liaison Committee was grateful for the advance notice of draft Bills that I was able to provide earlier this year.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): As the Leader of the House knows, next year, Britain will hold the presidency of the G8 and the European Union. The Prime Minister has made clear the themes of the G8 presidency—there is even a logo for it—but there has been no clarification of the precise themes for the EU presidency. Can we have an early debate about what the themes should be so that the Government can gauge hon. Members' mood on such an important issue? The Government could then use the presidency to campaign on Europe. When are we likely to have the logo for the presidency?

Mr. Hain: I am not in a position to help my hon. Friend but I welcome his interest in a crucial time when British leadership under the Labour Government will, through the G8 and EU presidencies, again be displayed. He may rest assured that the Prime Minister and our Labour Government will tackle with great vigour and energy all the key challenges that face Europe as well the G8 countries.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): In response to the comments of the Leader of the House, I reassure him that my colleagues and I do not primarily question the Prime Minister's integrity. However, we question his judgment. Would not it be helpful if we could see the full facts, including the Attorney-General's advice, before taking a final decision on the matter?

We, too, welcome what the Leader of the House said about Members' expenses, but we hope that he is not being over-optimistic in assuming that the media will not indulge in misrepresentation and misunderstanding.

The Leader of the House made an announcement about the non-September sittings next year, and I would like to ask him a number of questions about that. Can he confirm that the removal of those two weeks will not set a precedent, as it is happening due to the one-off need for building works in the House? What will he do if there is pressure on time next year? Will he extend our sittings from July into August—that was the quid pro quo—or will he take time out of the constituency weeks at half-term? Can he assure us that, during the 11 weeks when the House is not sitting, there will be arrangements for Members on both sides of the House to question Ministers and hold them to account?

I have previously congratulated the House of Commons Commission on the excellent annual report that it published recently. Indeed, I have referred to the introduction, Mr. Speaker, in which you say:

> "There can be few groups of customers more demanding than 659 Members of Parliament".

I hope that the Leader of the House will agree that this is an extremely important report containing important issues and a great deal of useful information for Members. It is difficult, however, for Members to debate these issues. I and other Members have sought to discover whether we debate the annual report in Westminster Hall. We are spending £140 million in cash outturn terms, and that is clearly a big sum. This place is dependent on holding people who spend taxpayers' money to account—that is our role in life. Surely there must be some way for us to have a debate on this matter. It involves the whole issue of accountability. I think that the Leader of the House might be sympathetic to the idea that, in addition to the dates that he has already given us for Government business in Westminster Hall, there might be an opportunity for us to discuss the matter on a Thursday afternoon. The House authorities advise me that that is the only way in which we can debate this extremely important function of the House.

Mr. Hain: To deal with the hon. Gentleman's last point first, I am grateful—as I am sure all members of the Commission will be—for his acknowledgement that the annual report is an excellent one. It is indeed; it contains very useful information and it is very important. Right hon. and hon. Members often ask questions whose answers are to be found in it. I take his point that it would be an advantage if there were an opportunity—apart from putting questions to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood), his colleague who answers for the Commission—to debate the Commission's annual report. I shall certainly look at his suggestion, in concert with the Commission, because it seems a little odd that, because of our rules and procedures, we cannot address the important work that the Commission does in representing all of us.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's point about the Prime Minister and Iraq, unlike the rather grubby attacks from the Conservatives. He said that this was not a matter of the Prime Minister's integrity but of his judgment. One issue of judgment that I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would have taken into account is what the impact would have been if Saddam had been allowed to remain in power. We have seen in this morning's newspapers the most graphic description of the sickening legacy of Saddam's regime, in the form of a mass grave at Hatra containing at least 300 victims of his tyranny. There were pictures of the bodies of women, some pregnant, some with babies in their arms, who had been blindfolded and shot in the head. That is the kind of occurrence that could well have continued, had Saddam stayed in power under Liberal Democrat policy. When we talk about judgment, we need to take account of the consequences of allowing him to stay in power.

On the freedom of information disclosure of Members' expenses, I very much welcome the all-party agreement. It affects everyone equally. I also take account of the hon. Gentleman's point that the media might not act responsibly in this regard, but I hope that they will. All the categories of expenses that will be available for inspection by our constituents are to do with our work here as MPs, and the work that we pay our staff to do to help us to serve our constituents properly. The House is now providing a level of service that is historically unprecedented compared with what was happening 10, 20 or 30 years ago, let alone before that. The expenses also provide for the operation of constituency offices and enable Members to live in their constituencies and, as we necessarily must, in London. Those are all properly accounted-for expenses that are claimed under the rules and should be treated accordingly.

I apologise to the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) for not picking up on his point about September. He raised many issues and I am afraid that I missed that one. The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) echoed his point about whether the absence of September sittings next year—on the advice of the House authorities about the need to proceed with security arrangements for the Chamber and the construction works involved—would be a pilot for the future. I know that Members have strong feelings about the conditions in which we came back in September—feelings that you share, Mr. Speaker. In the end, it is a matter for the House. There will be a vote on whether to retain September sittings—[HON. MEMBERS: "On a free vote?] Of course it will be on a free vote, as it was before, because it was on House business. We will also have a vote on the sitting hours early next year, following the report of the Modernisation Committee, which is currently concluding its evidence taking and will shortly consider its recommendations.

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, last year, several police authorities, including West Yorkshire, which serves my constituents, did not receive a full and fair share of the resources to which they were entitled under the revised funding formula? Can he arrange for Ministers to come to the House at the earliest opportunity so that we may press them on whether that situation is likely to be repeated this year or whether authorities such as West Yorkshire will get the resources that they need to continue to combat crime in our communities?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises an important local matter and I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will want to look into it. My hon. Friend will of course have the chance to question my right hon. Friend on Monday at Home Office questions. However, my hon. Friend will also acknowledge that crime has fallen rapidly under this Government and that some 10,000 extra police officers have been recruited, alongside more community wardens and community support officers, all of whom are helping to defeat crime in his constituency and police authority area, as well as through the length and breadth of the United Kingdom.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I thank the Leader of the House for finally arranging a debate on important House issues, not least programming and allied matters. I hope that, as a result, the House will give you, Mr. Speaker, additional discretion in respect of the time limits on speeches by Select Committee Chairmen when important reports by their Committees are discussed by the House. Will the Leader of the House print in the Order Paper in plenty of time the motion that will be debated? It is very important for the Procedure Committee to know whether he intends to accept all or at least a majority of its recommendations in respect of programming, which is vital to the House if it is to scrutinise Government legislation adequately.

Mr. Hain: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's question on that matter, especially given his role as Chairman of the Procedure Committee, a job that he does very well and with great diligence. I am happy to answer his points. The debate on Tuesday week will cover programming matters, deferred Divisions, short speeches, the carry-over provisions and the Strangers motion that arose out of the last report by the Modernisation Committee. I assure him that he will have plenty of time to consider the motions that I intend to table and I have been clearing the detail of them this week. I take his point about allowing Select Committee Chairmen greater scope than the current rules prescribe.

The hon. Gentleman did not ask me about the other Procedure Committee report, but he has properly done so in the past—

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I shall.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman says that he will do so if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker. The Procedure Committee report on Sessional Orders will be a matter for debate in the House in the very near future. I hope to provide early information of the date.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): This time last week, I was in Dublin with my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) and for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) and three peers. We were looking at the impact of the smoking ban in the workplace that the Irish Government have introduced. Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 1738?

[That this House notes that the medical and scientific evidence of the dangers of exposure to secondhand smoke in the workplace is now overwhelming; further notes that exposure to secondhand smoke in the workplace may cause more than 700 premature deaths a year, three times the number killed in industrial accidents; further notes that the Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health has concluded that exposure to secondhand smoke may increase non-smokers' risk of both lung cancer and ischaemic heart disease by about one quarter; further notes that the voluntary approach to smoking restrictions has left at least two million people still working in places where smoking is allowed throughout and at least another 10 million in places where smoking is allowed somewhere on the premises; further notes that the legislation in Ireland ending smoking in workplaces has been a medical and political success, resulting in a 97 per cent. observance rate, large falls in cigarette sales and a large rise in the number of smokers seeking to quit; believes that an end to smoking in the workplace would be a major advance towards a healthier population; and calls on the Government to commit itself to legislation ending smoking in all workplaces in the forthcoming White Paper on public health.]

Has my right hon. Friend had any intimation of the likely publication date of the White Paper that has been imminent, according to the Government, for some time? This issue is more important than most to many people and it is time that we got to grips with those in the food, drink and tobacco industry who cause—sometimes inadvertently, but sometimes recklessly—such serious ill-health and premature death for many people.

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend that both passive and active smoking are serious health issues. The Irish experience will be very interesting, as has been the experience in New York and other parts of the world. We have some catching up to do and my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Health and the Prime Minister are both seized of that. My hon. Friend will be encouraged to note that the White Paper on public health will be published later in the year. Since there is not much left of the year, that will be reasonably soon.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for brief questions, because I have to consider the business before the House today.

Sir George Young: Further to the helpful reply that the Leader of the House gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), can he confirm that the debate on Sessional Orders will take place in what remains of this Session? Can he confirm that he will table resolutions related to that debate to enable the House to express its view on the continuing disturbances in Parliament square?

Mr. Hain: The debate will be next month, so it will certainly be before Prorogation. I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to clarify that. I will certainly look closely at the terms of the motions that we are drafting and bear in mind the point that he makes.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport recently announced a major consultation on the Crossrail project, which will end on 27 October. He should also be aware of the strong view of the business community in the Thames valley that the western terminus for Crossrail should be Reading, not Maidenhead as is currently proposed. Will he ensure that the House is given ample opportunity to debate that important transport project once the consultation period is over?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is a great champion of Reading, including its football club, and he makes an important point about the western terminus being in Reading, not Maidenhead. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will note carefully my hon. Friend's powerful advocacy. The consultation period on that matter is open until 27 October, so he and his constituents will have an opportunity to make their case.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Is the Leader of the House aware that we have unfinished business from the Energy Act 2004, namely the final decision on connection charges to the grid from the National Grid Company and Ofgem? Is he aware that some of the proposals are unfair, discriminatory and sky-high for Scotland, and would sabotage not only the Government's alternative energy targets but Scotland's future as the renewable powerhouse of Europe? Can we have a debate as soon as the final proposals are published, so that we can illustrate to the Government the folly of allowing their energy policy to be dictated solely by Ofgem?

Mr. Hain: Ofgem has an important independent regulatory role to perform and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not want to question that—at least, in general. The Government do not allow anyone to dictate their energy policy, which is the most coherent of any Government for a generation and will allow us to make secure progress. The hon. Gentleman talks about sky-high bills for Scotland. The only sky policies coming out of Scotland are the pie-in-the-sky policies from the Scottish National party. The idea that the Government would in any way sell Scotland short is ridiculous. Scotland has a great deal under this Government and the hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Would not the best way to add to the magnificent work the Government have done on aid to developing countries be for them to alter the terms of international trade? One of the greatest problems for the third world is that subsidised imports from Japan, the United States and Europe undercut its own production, while tariffs mean that it cannot export products to this country. May we have an urgent debate on the malign effects of the common agricultural policy on the developing world?

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Excellent man.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is indeed an excellent man. I can confirm that. He is a good Welsh colleague.

I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's point, as do the Government. The Government are leading the international drive to achieve trade justice and to stop those protectionist barriers ringing Europe, the United States and other rich countries, blocking opportunities for poor countries in Africa and elsewhere to lift themselves out of poverty. We are also leading the world on the lifting of debt and on the provision of much more overseas aid and development. Indeed, we have been leading Europe in pressing for reform of the CAP and have already achieved much. We would like to see the CAP completely abolished and will continue to press for that objective until we reach it.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Bearing in mind that no institution, including Parliament, can function effectively without a degree of trust and confidentiality, will the Leader of the House join me in deploring what appears to be an extensive leak from the Joint Committee on Security yesterday? Will he further agree that we should consider disciplining Members who leak documents, whether they sit on the Government or the Opposition side? Any Member who leaks a document or a meeting of that sort should automatically be suspended from the service of the House for at least a month.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is an experienced and excellent parliamentarian and I shall bear in mind the points he made, as we all will. I read that report with great interest; it contained a lot that was news to me—I do not know whether it was accurate. The hon. Gentleman and I are members of the House of Commons Commission, which will shortly discuss those matters, but, in general terms, I take his point: we cannot operate, especially in the sensitive area of House security, without some trust and confidence among ourselves.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the growing consensus among Labour MPs, and perhaps on the other side of the Chamber, too, that the proposal to elect the House of Lords on a secondary mandate—the Billy Bragg proposal, as it has become known—would be a compromise acceptable to many of the different points of view on House of Lords reform. Given that point, is he prepared to make arrangements for an early debate, with, I hope, an indicative vote on the issue, to gauge the degree of support for that proposal among Members?

Mr. Hain: I understand my hon. Friend's desire for such a debate. There is a bit of unfinished business that, as a Government, we are determined to finish after the next general election—with the permission of the electorate. Personally, I am very taken with the idea of a secondary mandate—of an election of Members of the House of Lords at the same time as a general election, so that there is no independent route of countervailing power—which keeps this House supreme while democratising the House of Lords and dealing with its powers and procedures. The latter are, frankly, anarchic.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we have an urgent debate in Government time on cancer services and the devastating effect of the postcode lottery on patients' chances of receiving them? In January 2002, my constituent, Margaret Griffin, was diagnosed with multiple myeloma and told that her condition was terminal. She now has only weeks or months to live. Given that the new drug, Velcade, could extend her life by up to 18 months, is not it both tragic and unacceptable that because her local health trust will not pay for the drug for her, even though it is available and has been provided in the Royal Marsden, the Royal Free and, I understand, in hospitals in Basildon and Bedford, she faces the grim prospect of an early death? What is to be done?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman has properly raised that deeply troubling situation for Margaret Griffin and I am sure that we are all very sympathetic to him and to her.

[Mr. Hain]

Obviously, I cannot comment on the detail, but the Secretary of State for Health will have noted his point. I can, however, point out that 99 per cent. of patients with suspected cancer are seen by a specialist within two weeks of being referred by their GP, which is up from 63 per cent. in 1997, despite a 30 per cent. increase in referrals over that period. As a Government, I think we have a good record of achievement, although there is much more to do and, in this case, clearly a lot more to do.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had the opportunity to read early-day motion 1703 concerning Adam Evans and NHS dentistry?

[That this House expresses its regret and disappointment at the decision of Adam Evans to abandon NHS dentistry from January 2005 and only offer private treatment from his Diamond Smiles practice in Barnoldswick; understands the shock and dismay felt by many people in the town at the loss to the private sector of a dentist whose NHS credentials were paraded with such fanfare in 2001 when his practice opened; recalls that Mr Evans sought the help and assistance of the honourable Member for Pendle in securing a grant of £30,500 from the NHS to establish the practice, telling the honourable Member on 20th February 2001 that he felt 'there is a severe need in the Barnoldswick area for NHS dental provision'; further notes Mr Evans' statement of 25th January 2001 to the Consultant in Dental Public Health at the East Lancashire Health Authority that the grant 'will enable me to create a modern NHS practice available to all those people in the East Lancashire area who are seeking to register for NHS dental care'; believes Mr Evans has let down his patients and public alike after proclaiming so loudly his commitment to the NHS; further believes that he has cynically used NHS funds to help him set up shop in the town; calls on him to return the £30,500 to the Primary Care Trust in January 2005 when he ceases to take NHS patients; and urges the primary care trust to take steps to establish a new NHS dental surgery in Barnoldswick to allow those patients at Diamond Smiles who wish to stay with the NHS to transfer across to the new practice leaving Mr Evans with those who are content to go private.]

Is my right hon. Friend aware that NHS dentists are not on the breadline and can easily earn £65,000 a year, and does he share my concern that our efforts to rebuild NHS dentistry are being undermined by people such as Adam Evans who accept grants from the national health service to set up an NHS practice and then go private? Will my right hon. Friend ask the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House and tell us what the Government intend to do to end that sort of abuse?

Mr. Hain: I understand that the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale primary care trust is currently seeking advice about the contractual relationships in that matter. It is also discussing alternative methods of ensuring the continued provision of NHS dentistry in Barnoldswick. The PCT will continue to ensure the provision of emergency dental treatment. My hon. Friend will understand that we have invested more resources in recruiting and training NHS dentists and we shall continue to take that work forward.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House make sure that the parliamentary authorities allow Members to use the parliamentary computer system for casework during a general election period?

Mr. Hain: We are looking into that matter, because obviously those of us who are tied into our constituency offices through the use of Commons equipment, as many are, cannot be in the situation where a constituent comes to our local constituency office and we are unable to provide them with a proper level of service. On the other hand, however, the normal purdah rules affect us, because we cease to be Members of Parliament after Prorogation and are simply candidates. The issue is being looked into at present and I gladly sympathise with the point the hon. Gentleman raised.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an urgent debate on women in prison? I am sure that he is aware of the tragic suicide of yet another woman prisoner, last Monday, which brings the number of women suicides in prison to 12 this year. Many of those women have mental health problems and prison is not the right place for them. Will my right hon. Friend arrange an urgent debate on policy for women offenders?

Mr. Hain: I am sure that the whole House will want to praise my hon. Friend for the consistency of her campaign on the troubling rise in suicide among women prisoners. The incidence of youth suicides in prison is also troubling. There will be an opportunity to raise the matter at Home Office questions on Monday and I am sure that my hon. Friend will continue to press the Home Secretary and will raise the issue to see whether we can make an improvement in that troubling situation.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): The Government are bringing forward the draft Gambling Bill, which changes the emphasis from out of town gambling to town centre gambling and could bring three casinos to the centre of Guildford—none of which are wanted. Will the Government take into account international research into the harm done when children are allowed to play slot machines and the link between that and the problems of adult gambling?

Mr. Hain: As the hon. Lady will be aware, the Bill has been subject to extensive pre-legislative scrutiny and the Government have taken account of many of the important points made during that process. The Bill is about properly regulating gambling. Whether any casino—let alone three—comes to Guildford is a matter for the local authority, not for the Leader of the House or even for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. The hon. Lady should properly take her concerns to the local authority rather than raising them in this place. However, I emphasise the point that the Bill is welcome legislation for regularising and bringing up to date law and procedure that desperately need it.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that Kofi Annan has declared that the war with Iraq was illegal and that the Iraq survey group has declared that the weapons of mass destruction did not exist. Does he accept that we owe it to the tens of thousands of people who have been—and are being—slaughtered in this worthless war to revisit and debate the issue? As a result of the debate, we would hopefully hear not only an apology, but an apology without qualifications. Although an apology would not be enough, at least it would be a start.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend and I have an honest difference of opinion on the matter. I respect his point of view, but I am entitled to expect him to respect mine and that of the Government. He mentions the deaths that have occurred since the action took place last year, but I would like him to remind the House of the nearly 1 million deaths that occurred under Saddam's murderous tyranny.

Llew Smith: I demonstrated against that.

Mr. Hain: Indeed my hon. Friend did, as did I, so we are in the same situation.

It is important for us to bear in mind what Saddam did. I do not know of any ruler in history other than Saddam Hussein who has murdered up to a million Muslims. If he had continued in office, we would have seen further examples such as those uncovered by the new Iraqi Administration. They have identified 40 mass graves throughout the country. We do not yet have all the evidence of the full horror of Saddam Hussein, but he would still be in power if my hon. Friend's views had been taken into account when we took the decision last year.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The Leader of the House and hon. Members will be aware that over the summer period and the early autumn when we had our problems with security, there was a lot of press coverage in which disparaging remarks were made about the Speaker and the so-called men in tights. There was an inference that some of that briefing had come directly from either the Leader of the House or his staff. Will he take the opportunity, as I am sure that he will want to, to deny that either he or his staff were involved in that?

Mr. Hain: I am happy to deny that, and since the hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity, I put it on record. If he had been in the Chamber during previous business questions, he would have known that I expressly praised the role of the Doorkeepers in the invasion by the huntsmen and on the previous occasion. They perform a fantastic job for us. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman should have lowered the tone of the consideration of such a serious matter by making that kind of accusation.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): May I press for that debate on Iraq? There are people with different perspectives on the matter, ranging from my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith), who asked for the debate, to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. There are some of us who believe in a third way—I thought that the Government might be interested in third ways. We say that the invasion itself was wrong and that some of its consequences were predictable, but that everything must now be done to assist democratic forces in Iraq to build a proper, decent society. Although there might still be big differences between both sides, there might be an area on which we could get agreement, so let us have the debate.

Mr. Hain: I am very sympathetic to my hon. Friend's point of view. Whatever opinions are passionately held about the merits, or otherwise, of going to war in Iraq, the truth is that we are where we are. The objective now, as he says, is to ensure that we have a democratic Iraq that includes a strong and independent trade union movement. We must support that enterprise and use all our efforts and resources to ensure that the Iraqi people have the chance to run their own country for the first time in at least a generation, if not ever.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): When the House came back in September, apparently to debate fox hunting, certain parts of the motoring industry in the west midlands—Rover, Jaguar and, in my constituency, Land Rover—were in a state of dire anxiety. May we even now have a debate on the motor industry in the west midlands, and will the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry reply to it?

Mr. Hain: We have Transport questions on Tuesday and the hon. Gentleman can put his point to the Secretary of State. I do not accept that we came back in September only to debate fox hunting because we debated several important pieces of legislation during those two weeks. Job losses in manufacturing, including those in the midlands, are important, but the fact is that under the Tories, nearly a million manufacturing jobs were massacred by the early 1990s alone.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Points of Order

1.15 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It was in January this year that I first raised a question that was alluded to today regarding the incessant noise of the protest in Parliament square. We have heard that matter linked today to the Procedure Committee report. I have spoken on numerous occasions to the head of the police in the Palace of Westminster who tells me that he has made many representations to the police outside the Palace to take action about the noise, but that they do not do so. Is it not time that the Leader of the House picked up the telephone, spoke to the police and asked them why any demonstrator should be allowed to broadcast his rantings and ravings at a volume that is totally unacceptable to the general public?

Mr. Speaker: As the Leader of the House said, we will have an opportunity to debate the matter. Please be assured that I have also complained to the police on behalf of Members and staff who have to put up with the noise and that I shall continue to do so.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the House failed to explain why the announcement on the gambling Bill was leaked to the Financial Times and The Times newspapers this morning. To make matters worse, an official spokesman for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport was quoted in The Times, which shows the contempt that Government Departments seem to have for the House of Commons. Will you reiterate yet again that such important announcements should be made to the Commons, not the press?

Mr. Speaker: I keep saying that, and on Tuesday I mentioned the press being given advance information. We have a Press Gallery, and excellent correspondents get a pass from the Speaker so that they can be there to hear the case that Ministers make. I do not know why phone calls must be made the night before when they can be here. They seem to enjoy coming here to listen to our debates. The best advice that I can give Ministers is to come to the House of Commons because the press will hear what they have to say.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I would not want to keep pursuing the matter.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As Ministers of the Crown have consistently ignored your rulings on the situation, if it goes on, will you consider summoning one of them to explain to the House why such a thing has happened? That would set a good precedent for the others.

Mr. Speaker: Sometimes Back Benchers ignore my rulings as well. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I receive requests for urgent questions from time to time and bring Ministers before the House regularly.

BILL PRESENTED

SCHOOL TRANSPORT

Mr. Secretary Clarke, supported by The Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Darling, Mr. Secretary Johnson, Mr. Richard Caborn, Mr. Stephen Twigg and Dr. Stephen Ladyman, presented a Bill to make provision for school travel schemes; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed. [Bill 162].

EU Justice and Home Affairs

[Relevant document: The Twenty-eighth Report from the European Scrutiny Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 42-xxviii, The EU's Justice and Home Affairs Work Programme for the next five years.]

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

1.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Union document No. 10249/04, with ADD 1 and ADD 2, Commission Communication on the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice: assessment of the Tampere Programme and future orientations; notes that the Communication forms the basis of negotiations for the next European Union Justice and Home Affairs Work Programme; and supports the Government's position that the Work Programme should focus on measures that complement the efforts of Member States and will be of most benefit to European Union citizens.

I am pleased that the European Scrutiny Committee managed to secure time to debate this important issue in the Chamber. We live in a world in which crime does not recognise national borders. Although we maintain our right to have national systems of justice and law enforcement in operation, in pursuing criminals and seeking justice we have recognised that by co-operating we on occasion have a good result in foiling those who want to make victims of our citizens, whether they are in the UK or in other parts of the EU. It is important that we discuss the new justice and home affairs work programme because it will guide EU work in this sector for the next five years.

We know that co-operation on counter-terrorism, asylum and immigration and on fighting crime makes a real and positive impact on the lives of UK citizens, but Europe should not be involved for the sake of it. The basis of our engagement with Europe is respect for national sovereignty—a view that is shared by many other member states. The Commission communication is a useful tool to stimulate discussion, but that is all. There is much in it we can support: an emphasis on mutual recognition of judicial decisions rather than harmonisation and a commitment to strengthen efforts on counter-terrorism and on document and border security. However, we do not agree on some things. In that regard, we have much in common with colleagues on the Committee. We are working with others to ensure that concrete proposals reflect UK priorities. We do that by our involvement in positive engagement and by winning support from other Ministers throughout the EU.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): As is so often the case with the Government, the Minister gives the impression that there is nothing to worry about. Did she see the superb article about the matter by the distinguished home affairs editor of The Daily Telegraph on Monday this week? He explains that if the House does not kill the document now, what is regarded as simply a discussion document to "take note of" will be pushed through on the nod next time and we will be stuck with it. When so little comes from the Committee to the Chamber, does she not recognise that it is our responsibility to stop it and to stop it now?

Caroline Flint: I have seen the article and the Conservative party press release parrots the same myths and distortions. It is important to have time in the Chamber to discuss the subject. I strongly believe, as a Home Office Minister and a constituency MP, that in fighting terrorism and crime and, importantly, in tackling abuse of our immigration systems, there are times when we have to work with others across the EU. I make no apology for that.

I shall be clear about dispelling some of the myths that have been put about by papers such as The Daily Telegraph and by the shadow Home Secretary only this morning on the radio—and where is he? It would be nice if he made time to focus on the issues. From his contribution on the "Today" programme, I thought he could do with a bit more briefing.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): The Minister dealt adequately—in fact, superbly—with the shadow Home Secretary this morning. Tampere is about co-operation. It is not about giving up powers. It is about European partners working together to combat crime and illegal immigration. It has been a success so far. Will she pledge that at the summit, when we have Tampere II, the Government will reinvigorate the agenda to ensure that there is even greater co-operation?

Caroline Flint: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind words. He has my assurance that when it comes to catching criminals, tackling terrorism and dealing with fair migration, but also abusive migration systems, we will wholeheartedly look for ways in which we can co-operate while at the same time preserving what is right for a nation decide to decide on.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I want to make some progress—

Mr. Cash: The hon. Lady is going to duck the question.

Caroline Flint: No. In fact I think that I am going to pre-empt it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) mentioned success. It is important to talk about the situations that affect people's lives. The European arrest warrant has been of practical value at an EU level by ensuring quick and efficient extradition between member states. Already this year, we have contributed to 28 arrests in the UK and returns to other EU countries. Those people have been accused of criminal offences and we have helped the justice process. As a result of our requests, 16 people in other EU countries have been returned to the UK to stand trial. That is important. It is important that when offences are committed against UK citizens there is no place to hide for criminals throughout the EU.

[Caroline Flint]

On asylum, Eurodac is a European fingerprinting system. It has helped to reduce asylum shopping and the ability to make multiple claims. Consistently, we return 150 asylum seekers a month because of that co-operation. Applications are also down.

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I want to make a little more progress.

Europol is improving the exchange and analysis of criminal intelligence. The police college is exchanging best practice, not so that there is one training system for police throughout Europe, but simply to share best practice. The UK is leading on the police college and it is a way of improving co-operation. Eurojust is improving co-operation in cross-border prosecutions so that criminals can be properly punished wherever they go.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): I thought that the Minister would emphasise the Government's position, which is supported by members of the Committee. We do not support the idea of giving Europol its own investigative powers, which would turn it into a European police force.

Caroline Flint: I concur with my hon. Friend. We do not think that there is a role for that, but there is a role for exchanging intelligence and information. We want some of the other member states to put more into that process to give our police the ability to share intelligence information to track the criminals who cross different borders. I thank him for making that point. It is another aspect of the justice and home affairs work programme. We need to examine what we have agreed and ensure that it is implemented before we embark on new ideas.

Mr. Cash: Does the Minister concur that the Committee made it clear that the work programme affects policies that are at the core of national sovereignty? Furthermore, there is a risk that the proposals on the area of freedom, justice and security encourage the notion that such an area is a unitary state, separate from the member states that make up the EU community. In relation to the Committee's recent consideration of procedural rights in criminal proceedings—another draft framework decision—does she also accept that she has not tackled the argument that we put in the Committee, that the EU measures should stick to cross-border cases because criminal proceedings are a matter for national Parliaments?

Caroline Flint: I agree that it is right to take every opportunity—the Committee is right in that regard as well—to reaffirm our red lines on European co-operation. I was going to say something about that later, but let me deal with it now. The Commission's document is for discussion. It does not set out concrete proposals. No one has signed up to it. That will be done by Ministers who are sent by nation state Governments to decide on such issues.

Mr. Hawkins: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: No, I want to finish this point.

On judicial co-operation, we strongly support the embedding of mutual recognition as the cornerstone of criminal judicial co-operation. It is important to recognise that those words are not just mine; the Commission uses the same phrase in its document. We welcome the fact that it recognises that as the first principle. It ensures, through mutual recognition, good co-operation between member states without requiring harmonisation of member states' criminal justice systems.

We will work with other member states because we are not on our own. One of the benefits of being at the heart of Europe is that we can make the case and make our position stronger. We will ensure that the EU continues to respect the distinct and diverse legal traditions of member states. Let us not forget that the United Kingdom does not have just one legal system. In particular, we will ensure that the things that concern us will not be changed. So the prosecution of individuals must remain a national competence and we do not support the proposal for a European public prosecutor, and many other member states agree with us. We have ensured through the treaty that we have safeguards so that if there is a threat to our legal system and criminal procedural law we have an emergency brake that we can apply to make sure that there is a unanimous decision.

Mr. Hawkins: Is the Minister giving a firm undertaking at the Dispatch Box on behalf of the Government that if anything that they oppose is changed before the matter comes before the Council of Ministers they will veto it? All too often, Ministers say that they do not agree with parts of EU documents that subsequently go through on the nod at the Council of Ministers. The Government claim that they tried to protest, but to no avail. That is the thin end of a very large wedge that is destroying Britain's independent sovereignty, and that is why we are so angry.

Caroline Flint: If Opposition Members wish to make a speech, they should put their name down on the list and queue with everyone else who wishes to speak. However, I challenge the hon. Gentleman to look at my record at the Justice and Home Affairs Council—I assure him that I never pass anything on the nod. There is no question of the UK signing up to a harmonised legal system, and the communication does not propose one. The constitutional treaty, as I said, rightly protects key areas of our criminal procedural law, but we accept some approximation of criminal acts and penalties. It is important to look at the issues involved, such as serious cross-border crime.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Caroline Flint: No, I am in the middle of explaining something, and I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman listened.

The European framework decisions on combating terrorism are important. Previously, eight countries in the EU did not have adequate counter-terrorism measures, but as a result of co-operation and discussion they have since implemented legislation. The UK is fortunate to have adequate legislation on counter-terrorism. I make no apology for saying that the sexual exploitation of children in the EU is another important issue in cross-border crime, but we would need to see robust justification for any new measures. Criminals do not respect national boundaries, and increased practical co-operation between the police, courts, immigration and customs services has the potential to make a difference.

The Commission communication rightly recognises that people must experience the many benefits of justice and home affairs co-operation to appreciate the value of Europe, which is why we agree with the European Scrutiny Committee that in the next work programme we must evaluate the impact of measures already agreed and focus on making them work at a practical level. We need less rhetoric and more action and accountability.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will the hon. Lady now give way?

Caroline Flint: I will do so, provided the hon. Gentleman makes a point, not a speech.

Mr. Wilkinson: It is just a small point. Will the hon. Lady assure the House that there will not be an extension of qualified majority voting in justice and home affairs?

Caroline Flint: The position on which matters QMV can be used has already been discussed, and we are in full agreement. We have made sure that we have safeguards on both criminal procedural law and asylum and immigration so that we do not have to take part in certain discussions if we do not want to. We believe, however, that in some cases QMV is helpful, enabling us to get things done quickly and effectively to achieve a genuine impact on our communities.

I am conscious that Members wish to contribute to our debate, but I wish to deal with immigration in a little more depth. In the past 24 hours, the Conservative party has peddled the myth that we are giving up control of our frontiers. I want to nail that myth, which is quite wrong. We can opt in, where it is in Britain's interest, to measures that tackle asylum and immigration issues. There is no justification for the Tory suggestion that there is a threat to control over our frontiers.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Does the Minister not find it odd that a Conservative spokesperson pontificated on the "Today" programme this morning but does not have the good grace to come to the House to make his points at the Dispatch Box?

Caroline Flint: I quite agree. If someone is going to perpetuate myths and allegations they should at least be here to hear the answers.

The new justice and home affairs work programme should seek to strengthen external borders, concentrating on practical measures to improve cross-border co-operation and to respond to operational demands. It should continue to embed and evaluate measures that are helping to reduce the number of people who are using and abusing the asylum system—there has been a fall in applications of 70 per cent. since October 2002. We should exploit new technology to improve document security, including biometrics and identity cards. We can use all those methods to try to make sure that we have a better system in which we co-operate where necessary but act on our own where that is in our national interest.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): As the Minister knows, Britain has opted out of the Schengen agreement, but will she confirm that under the QMV regulations that the House is being asked to approve we would no longer be able to do so and would lose control of our borders?

Caroline Flint: The hon. Gentleman is wrong, and I shall write to him in detail to explain why.

Illegal immigration knows no borders. We can work together to strengthen practices and procedures to ensure that they cannot be exploited by organised criminal gangs. It is important to secure cross-border co-operation on the trafficking of human beings, which takes place throughout the EU. Men, women and children are trafficked throughout Europe and, as the Minister responsible for reducing organised crime, I know only too well what that means. Hon. Members may know that we are conducting a review of prostitution. Many young women are caught by the vice market in EU cities, and we should seek to work together to end that unacceptable practice. We will continue our own independent efforts, but the EU can sometimes add extra value when tackling such issues.

The new justice and home affairs work programme represents a genuine opportunity to improve the freedom, justice and security enjoyed by UK citizens, both at home and abroad. I assure hon. Members that the Government will defend UK interests robustly in negotiations, but I hope that everyone accepts the justice and home affairs agenda, which is about real issues that affect real lives, including those of UK citizens, who may be victims of crime and can expect a reliable standard of justice wherever they are in the European Union.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I beg to move, in line 4, to leave out from "orientations" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

> "but believes that the Government has failed adequately to support the national interest in its response to the Tampere Programme, including its failure to halt the proposal to introduce co-decision and Qualified Majority Voting on immigration, asylum, visas and border measures and the Commission's aim further to harmonise the civil and criminal justice systems of Member States."

The approval in 1999 of an EU programme of action covering visas, asylum and immigration, civil and criminal justice, and police and customs operations to create an area of freedom, security and justice was always going to lead to an ambitious agenda. The way in which the programme has developed presents grave dangers to the sovereignty of this country. Our debate is particularly relevant against the background of the preparation of the proposed EU constitutional treaty, a substantial part of which impacts on the Tampere agenda.

Some of the concepts in the programme are complicated and couched in legalese. Others are more obvious, but we should not underestimate the huge implications for British justice and parliamentary sovereignty of giving up our veto in home affairs policy, giving European police investigating powers and adopting minimum sentences. We should also be aware of the federal state implications of appointing a European public prosecutor. The communication from the European Commission that we are debating today, however, merely provides a summary of progress to date, whereas we clearly need a full evaluation of the measures that have been implemented in member states over the past five years.

Keith Vaz: The Tampere agenda, as agreed in 1999, dealt with co-operation between EU partners. Is it Conservative policy to oppose co-operation on crime and illegal immigration?

Mr. Djanogly: I shall specifically address the question of mutual recognition, but the Tampere agenda goes much further than co-operation and attacks the generally held concept of mutual recognition. It is bizarre that we are expected to endorse a set of proposals that form part of the programme for the next five years without a full review of those measures' potential benefits. I would like to say that I am confident that the Government will not attempt to commit our nation to the proposals, the end results and benefits for our citizens of which are unknown, but I am not. A blind Commission is leading a blind UK Government towards an undefined federal superstate, to which we say, "No, thank you very much".

Mr. Connarty: I wonder whether the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) was listening to the Minister, who confirmed that the Government oppose Europol's having investigative powers. Had he taken the trouble to read the document, he would know that the Government and the European Scrutiny Committee are opposed to a European public prosecutor. He should stick to facts rather than mythology.

Mr. Djanogly: The Government maintain that they oppose further investigative powers for Europol, but that does not mean that the Commission is not suggesting that Europol should have those investigative powers or that the Government have stood up for British interests.

A key issue identified in the European Scrutiny Committee report is the Commission's desire to introduce co-decision and qualified majority voting on those measures—immigration, asylum, visas and borders—that fall within article 67(2) of the EC treaty, supposedly in an attempt to increase the amount of work that is completed. However, the alarm bells will start ringing for anyone who cares to examine those proposals.

The principle of unanimity and the possibility of veto, where required, are in place for a reason. Such checks and balances maintain our nation's right to decide which measures are most appropriate for British citizens in the European arena. The Commission itself has identified that many of the issues that fall within that programme remain at the core of national sovereignty, and so they should. That is why I am concerned by the prospect of the Commission imposing legislation on member states through QMV. That must be resisted at all costs, and the Government are not actively fighting that threat to our country's ability to withstand legislation from Brussels that is not in the British public's interest.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Did my hon. Friend share my amazement that the Minister did not seek to justify the proposals in her bad-tempered introduction to the debate? All she said was, "The system works wonderfully. We have got this example and that example. It is all absolutely super, isn't it?" If the system works so well, why do we need new proposals?

Mr. Djanogly: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Minister's opening comments were extremely defensive and she did not constructively support the agenda.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): The Opposition are in serious need of some help. Some of the proposals, such as Eurodac, which is an enforcement unit that uses fingerprinting in order to deport people, are extremely good. Some countries opposed Eurodac, but QMV allowed us to achieve an objective that we could not otherwise have obtained, which was good. Can the hon. Gentleman tell me the consequences if the House votes no after today's debate?

Mr. Djanogly: The Tampere agenda contains 23 proposals that relate to policies on crime, most of which have either been fulfilled or are on the way to being fulfilled—it is not a pie-in-the-sky agenda; it is a real agenda. After this debate, I hope that the British Government return to the Commission and start to say no on issues such as, most importantly, getting rid of our veto.

Mr. Cash: May I offer my hon. Friend some assistance on the point raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart)? If the House were to reject the proposal—I hope that it does—the Government would be in the dog-house and would be obliged to give effect to the sovereign will of Parliament. That is the key question, and we should reject the proposals.

Mr. Djanogly: My hon. Friend states the obvious, although his point may be optimistic given the Government's position.

It has been proposed that the European corps of border guards should fall under the control of Brussels. We agree with the Minister that the long-term goal of establishing a European corps of border guards is objectionable in principle as well as being impractical. However, we support the development of co-ordination mechanisms designed to strengthen member states' ability effectively to guard their own borders. Although additional resources to support that function are welcome, they should not be ploughed into the creation of the European corps of border guards, but used by member states to improve their own national guards' training.

The British people want control of our borders and the right to draw up our own policy on asylum. In an ICM poll from earlier this year, 77 per cent. of those polled wanted Westminster to exercise control over asylum procedures. We need an accountable and efficient policy that addresses the needs of those migrants who have a genuine claim and who seek our help, as well as preventing bogus claims from those who would abuse our system. Can we guarantee the British public that those requirements will be met by a single European policy covering all member states? I think not. Indeed, the Government currently fall short of those requirements. Given the disaster of the Government's asylum policy, they probably cannot wait to offload their problems on to Europe. Conservative Members regard that as a cop-out, pure and simple.

Mr. Hawkins: My hon. Friend knows that I fought those battles for a number of years from the Front-Bench position that he now occupies. Since the Government came to power, they have promised in the House to oppose things, but then signed up to them, however reluctantly, because of the inclusion in the same package of something else that is good. They have spent years saying that they will oppose things and then failed to do so.

Mr. Djanogly: My hon. Friend makes a good point, and I think that he will relate to my conclusions.

Having had the pleasure of participating in the Statutory Instrument Committee and the European Scrutiny Committee B debates on both the European arrest warrant and the harmonisation of criminal sanctions, I have become particularly familiar with the Commission's ludicrous proposals on criminal justice. The principle of mutual recognition has long been deemed the cornerstone of European judicial integration. The Commission denies that it intends to challenge legal systems in individual member states through the promotion of harmonisation—so far, so good—so why does the communication say that it is necessary to avoid a situation in which two separate legal regimes cover cross-border crimes and internal disputes?

The communication also states:

> "duality could be inconsistent with the aim of a single area of justice for all".

How is it possible to adhere to mutual recognition, which apparently supports the judicial traditions of each member state, without the operation of separate regimes? The answer, of course, is that it is not possible, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said earlier in the debate. That is a clear indication that the Commission deems the ultimate result to be interference in the judicial systems in operation in each member state. It strikes me that the Government seem all too willing to accept the Commission's proposals at face value without true, open consideration of the Commission's real aims. This represents a clear threat to national sovereignty. Is the Minister going to stand by and let these measures—which purport to further the principle of mutual recognition, but in fact aim towards a unitary legal system—creep in? In no way can such aims comply with and respect the subsidiarity principle. The Scrutiny Committee got it absolutely right and went to the heart of the matter when it said in its report:

> "If Parliament has not chosen to unify the separate legal systems of England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, we see no justification for this being attempted by the European Union."

That is spot on. We see no justification for it either, and we urge the Government to do everything in their power to prevent it. Trust is based on knowledge, and without greater knowledge of the workings and standards of judicial systems in other member states, it is difficult to see how even the procedure supporting mutual recognition will be adequately implemented.

The Commission has stated that it supports further action to define and fix minimum penalties for certain offences, to end life sentences, and to move towards further approximation—for which I read harmonisation—of national laws to secure effective mutual recognition of judgments. Again, harmonisation rears its ugly head. At the extreme end, we are facing a massive overhaul of the criminal laws of all member states, yet that prospect raises insurmountable practical problems in a Union where national systems are so incredibly diverse and bear so little resemblance to each other.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman with great care. Over the past few months, he and I have appeared many times in the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, where we have both prayed in aid the views of the Law Society. Has he, too, received the Law Society's very long briefing—it runs to 33 pages—which makes it clear that it supports the mutual recognition programme because it has considerable advantages for practitioners?

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman misses my point. I support mutual recognition, as does he and as do the Government, but this agenda is not, in practice, about mutual recognition. That is our worry.

Aside from the practical issues, we also believe that the agenda is objectionable in principle. Do we, as a nation, want to submit our decision-making power on criminal policies and sanctions to the will of Brussels? I do not think so. This country has developed to date a legal system of which we can and should be proud. Accordingly, we should firmly rebuke any potential threat to it.

Angus Robertson: The hon. Gentleman refers to a legal system. Is he not aware that there are three different legal systems in the UK? Will he explain the position of the Scottish Conservative party in that regard and give one example of any concern that has been expressed north of the border?

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman may have missed my earlier comments in which I referred specifically to the different judicial systems in the United Kingdom and how their own systems are respected. This agenda will end that.

A prime example of a crime in one country that may be entirely overlooked in another is that of animal rights terrorism, which is prevalent in my constituency. Public opinion on that has changed massively in this country over a very short space of time, yet many other member states have no concept of what the crime is, let alone ideas about how to tackle it. The power to determine which crimes attract which sentences should never be removed from Westminster. It is only by retaining control over our own system that the British public will feel secure about the fact that justice is obtainable and adaptable to the demands of the day.

[Mr. Djanogly]

We also oppose the creation of a European public prosecutor, as such a position promotes harmonisation rather than co-operation.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): We are discussing the five-year JHA—justice and home affairs—programme. Is the hon. Gentleman telling the House, in all seriousness, that he believes that in five years' time this country will be unable to have laws dealing with animal terrorism, which he cites as an example of how that programme will go wrong? If he really believes that it will affect our right to have laws on animal terrorism, he should say so; if he does not, he should accept that he has raised a completely irrelevant and nonsensical issue as part of his scare campaign.

Mr. Djanogly: I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman has got completely the wrong end of the stick. I am simply maintaining that the definition of a crime and the sentence that attaches to it will be considered differently in each member state and should therefore be the prerogative of that member state's judicial system. I do not think that the Government would detract from that—the problem is that they are not going over to Brussels to tell it what we want.

As I said, we oppose the creation of a European public prosecutor. Sufficient justification has yet to be provided for such a move, which seems more suited to preparing Europe for federal statehood than to any practical purpose. The attainment of security throughout the member states of the Union underpins the achievement of freedom and justice. As the Minister said, the biggest threat to that in recent years has been terrorism, so the prospect of increased co-operation between law enforcement agencies of all member states is to be welcomed.

We do not believe, however, that there is justification for extending the powers of Europol to become a separate, fully functioning European police force. In its current form, Europol makes large contributions to the exchange and analysis of information, rather than undertaking investigatory work. As such, it has a significant role to play in increasing co-operation and the sharing of best practice between member states, and it should continue to do so. That is not to say, however, that Europol needs to become a full Union agency feeding from the Community budget.

As with the Government's position on the Commission's Green Paper on criminal sanctions, I sense that although they have a lukewarm response to much of this communication, they are not prepared to do much about it. That is dangerous. It leaves the door open to creeping harmonisation, whereas what is needed is a strong rejectionist stance in favour of maintaining the British interest such as that which my party would provide.

Why are the Government taking such a soft position on this? In the conclusion to the communication, the Commission took the opportunity to reinforce their approval of the proposed constitutional treaty. This statement particularly grabbed my attention:

> "the final adoption of the Constitutional Treaty and its rapid entry into force are becoming essential, as this will offer the legal and institutional means of meeting . . . expectations".

The key word is "essential". As Conservative Members have argued time and again, the constitutional treaty is by no means essential either for our country or for the European Union. If this agenda is to go forward, the Commission's proposals for the next five years must be viewed as a way of seeking increased intergovernmental co-operation and progress in the fields of justice and home affairs. That ceases to be the case at the point where the proposals represent an attempt by the Commission to reinforce their desire to gain the ability to impose potentially unwanted legislation on member states that have lost their right of veto and the power to control their own country's policies and, therefore, their futures. That is exactly the situation that could become a reality under the umbrella of the constitutional treaty.

Mr. Connarty rose—

Mr. Djanogly: To the extent that the Labour party will support a yes vote for the European constitution, I cannot see how it will wish to destroy its own campaign—

Mr. Connarty rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) is clearly not prepared to give way.

Mr. Djanogly: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have given way many times, including to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty), and I am about to conclude my speech.

I cannot see why the Labour party should wish to destroy its own campaign by attacking elements of the treaty, such as the giving up of our veto on home affairs, that are included in the Tampere agenda. This therefore becomes Labour's Trojan horse whereby it is preparing to sell this country for the sake of its constitutional treaty. It is a chilling prospect for our nation, but one that we need to face up to in the context of the Government's continued silence on this programme's true implications for our justice system and our national sovereignty.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Many Members hope to catch my eye but we have limited time for the debate, and I hope that they will bear that in mind when making their contributions.

1.59 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): This is an extraordinary debate, partly because of the contribution that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), but also because of the astonishing absence of the shadow Home Secretary. I know where he was last night; he was at the Dorchester hotel—celebrating Diwali, tucking into his chicken tikka masala and rice.

I know where the shadow Home Secretary was this morning; he was on the "Today" programme, debating with my hon. Friend the Minister. Where is he this afternoon? Why is he not here? A new precedent has been set—shadow Ministers do not bother to come to the House of Commons to defend their position—but I am not surprised that he is not here: my hon. Friend gave him such a trouncing on the "Today" programme that he is too frightened to enter the Chamber.

I had the privilege of representing the Government at the Tampere Council between 15 and 16 October 1999. I remember it well, because it was the first time that member states came together to consider the issue of justice and home affairs in this way. An agenda was set out, and it is right that we should be reviewing it now.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Before the hon. Gentleman gets to his main thrust, does he agree that there are four Opposition spokesmen, covering constitutional affairs and home affairs, on the Front Bench, whereas only two Ministers are present?

Keith Vaz: Never mind the quality, feel the width, I say. The point is, where is the shadow Home Secretary? It is a disgrace that he is not here.

The purpose of the Tampere Council was to create an area of security, freedom and justice in the European Union, and it is right that we should be reviewing it this year. It is also right that the European Scrutiny Committee has produced such an excellent report, and recommended that we should have a discussion on the Floor of the House. I commend members of the Committee for doing so.

The fact remains that this agenda was important in 1999 and became even more important because of the events of 11 September. The achievements of the agenda over the past five years have kept the issue of justice and home affairs right at the centre of the Government's thinking. I commend the Minister and her colleagues for going to the justice and home affairs meetings, defending the Government's position time and again, and making a positive contribution to the way in which the agenda has been taken forward.

As with all European agendas, there are disappointments at the fact that certain benchmarks have not been achieved that should have been achieved by now, but the purpose of December's European Council is to give this whole agenda a new thrust to ensure that we consider it in the light of what has happened over the past five years.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Does the ex-Minister not think that the EU, instead of pursuing its hegemonistic ambitions in justice and home affairs, should concentrate on matters closer to home and not permit such disgraceful episodes as the sacking of the chief accountant, Mrs. Andreasen, for exposing fraud, maladministration and corruption in the European Commission?

Keith Vaz rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are wandering rather wide of the motion.

Keith Vaz: I shall abide by your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I will not answer the hon. Gentleman's point.

The fact remains that we must make progress. I want to raise three brief points, because I know that lots of my hon. Friends want to take part in the debate. First, there has been success in combating illegal immigration because of the work that has been done by the Home Secretary and his predecessor, the Foreign Secretary. Other EU nation states must take responsibility for the immigration problems in their areas. We cannot solve the problem of illegal immigration unless there is good, strong co-operation between our countries. That is shown, frankly, by the number of asylum seekers and of claims for asylum, which have declined over the past few years. That has been one of Tampere's successes.

The second point relates to combating crime. Surely the Conservative party must appreciate the importance of ensuring that those who commit crimes are brought to justice as quickly as possible. They should not be able to hide in another member state to evade justice. If they were able to do so, that would make a nonsense of the EU, which is why the European arrest warrant has been such a success. It was so difficult to get extradition before impetus was given to the justice and home affairs agenda. If someone commits a crime in another area of the EU, they must be brought to justice. By and large, people have to be brought to justice in their member states, because that is usually where the crime is committed.

The third point—the question of different judicial systems—is important. That is brought home to us by the European Scrutiny Committee's excellent report. Why is it that every time a European document is debated in the House, Opposition spokesmen go quite berserk, saying, "This is the last straw and the superstate will be created"? I am surprised that the hon. Member for Huntingdon did not mention the abolition of the pound: I realise that every speech that Conservative Members make is written with reference to what Mr. Roger Knapman and Mr. Kilroy-Silk might think about it, because all Conservative Members are concerned about is protecting their position from the United Kingdom Independence party.

The fact remains that we need a serious debate—a grown-up debate—in the House on European matters, which will allow us to explore the crucial issues that are at stake in the EU. There is absolutely—

Mr. Hawkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Keith Vaz: No, because time is short.

There is absolutely no question of our judicial system being changed because of this take-note document: it is absolutely ridiculous. We have a completely different judicial system from that in Scotland, and we know that four of the six Members who serve on the Committee have Scottish constituencies. Their judicial system is completely different from ours in England. There is no question of one being created. There is no question that we will be harmonised with the French judicial system or the German judicial system, which are quite different from the systems here.

The one point on which I can agree with the hon. Member for Huntingdon is that we have a judicial system of which we can be extremely proud. Of course it is the role of our Government—not just the Home Office, but the Department for Constitutional Affairs—to protect the integrity and independence of our judiciary.

[Keith Vaz]

Finally, I want to address the question of mutual recognition. Of course we want to ensure that there is mutual recognition. It is absolutely vital that decisions taken by courts in member states—

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con) rose—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale) (Lab): He has just come in!

Keith Vaz: I will not give way to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) because, as the Chairman of the Committee points out, he has only just wandered in to give some legal advice to the hon. Member for Huntingdon. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield should wait his turn if he wishes to take part in the debate, or perhaps he was busy at the Dorchester, like the shadow Home Secretary.

The fact remains that mutual recognition is a core principle of what we have been discussing. My constituents want to know about the practical problems, which my hon. Friend the Minister so eloquently placed before the House, because if they go to France and have an accident or there is a problem they want to know whether they will have access to justice in such countries. Those are the practical questions being asked by our constituents, involving the practical co-operation that must exist between member states, the judicial authorities and the police forces. That is what we are talking about here, so let us hear no more nonsense about a federal state in respect of this document. Let us have some proper support from this Conservative Opposition—supporting the Government as they stand up for Britain's interests.

2.9 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I open by thanking the European Scrutiny Committee for its work and for the quite sensible views it has expressed in the report. The subject has considerable import, and it should be put before the whole House. My only regret is that there is still a problem with our procedures. If the Committee considers a matter to be of serious import, it is somewhat bizarre that it should be debated on the Floor of the House to enable other Members may participate, only for the debate to be so brief that they cannot do so.

There would have been more debate if the matter had been referred to European Standing Committee A, B or C, because a Standing Committee would have had longer to consider it. I modestly suggest that it would be better for the matter to go first to the European Standing Committee, after which, with the benefit of its advice, we could debate it on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman makes a most constructive suggestion about the matter going from the European Scrutiny Committee to the European Standing Committee and then to the House. Does he agree that when the European Scrutiny Committee states that the matter is so vital that the whole House should consider it, there should be a full-day debate in Government time?

Mr. Heath: I am not sure that I would go quite that far, but the House will have heard the hon. Gentleman's comments.

What saddens me is that, thus far, we have not had a debate about the European Scrutiny Committee report. We have had the nonsense of an amendment, thought up as a jolly wheeze by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), who could not be bothered to attend the debate that he started, although he was happy to go on the radio this morning.

I am going to defend the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), because it was suggested earlier that he was not here. He may not have been sitting up and paying attention sufficiently to be seen on the other side of the Dispatch Box—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already said that time is limited for the debate. Perhaps we can concentrate on the motion rather than on some of the personalities involved.

Mr. Heath: I am happy to do so. I was defending the honour of another Member of the House, whom I felt had been traduced.

The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) used his rather lamentable contribution as a proxy for a debate on the European constitution. We know, or at least we think we know, that we will have a referendum on the constitution—we had certainly better have a referendum on it—so there will be an opportunity to debate those issues then; this is not that opportunity.

I am surprised that there has been no mention of the debate that is convulsing a lot of the European Parliament and European Commission: the identity of the person who will put these proposals into effect. The name of Rocco Buttiglione has not been mentioned, yet we have the extraordinary situation of the civil liberties committee rejecting his nomination as European Commissioner—on sound grounds, I think, given the views that he has expressed and the actions he has taken. I hope that the debate on his confirmation, or otherwise, will be on the right terms—that it will be not on what he believes but on the way in which he intends to pursue the proposals that are before the Commission. I also hope that Mr. Barroso will take careful note of what parliamentarians are saying about Mr. Buttiglione's suitability for that role. He may be a perfectly good commissioner in another role, but he is not the right man to take forward a programme that is concerned with the liberties of individuals and the fight against discrimination.

I hope that not a single Member of the House does not believe that co-operation between member states is essential to fight organised crime, terrorism and domestic crime, drug smuggling and the like.

Keith Vaz: The Conservatives.

Mr. Heath: I do not believe that that is the case. I believe that they simply choose to use this as a Hartlepool agenda to try to get themselves out of a hole.

It is an unfortunate misuse of the proceedings. It is a great shame that we have these announcements of doom every time we have a European debate. I am staggered—[Interruption.] A cameo appearance by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden. It is staggering that we are debating this at all because we were told after Amsterdam and Nice that there would be no Parliament to have these debates—it was the end of the world every time. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman is going to join us—[Interruption.] Yes, he is.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the House please settle down? This is a debate on a serious motion.

Mr. Heath: I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman in his seat. Of course, his hand signed many of the treaties that his colleagues find so objectionable now.

I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that we wish to maintain the integrity of our legal systems. I do not hear a single person who wants the English, Scots or Northern Irish legal systems to be eroded by decisions taken elsewhere. I hope that the Government will stand firm on that. I am confident that they will because they have said so—and, in this instance, I believe them.

I hope that we have effective border controls. I have my doubts about British border controls. I wish to see a single border force, which I think would be more effective than the disparate arrangements that we have at the moment. I recognise that we have had a massive expansion of the European Union, that there are significant new issues about border control that need to be effectively acknowledged within the European Union, and that new member states may need assistance from better established and perhaps richer states to provide the border controls that we want. That, however, should not affect what we do in this island state. We have an advantage over most of the other member states.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): If we are going to help the new member states of the EU to tighten their border controls, is it not a bit invidious for anyone in the Chamber to suggest that we need not take the issue seriously? It is wrong if we are reluctant to take any strong action and to support a Government who, for once, are moving in the right direction.

Mr. Heath: Of course, I agree with my hon. Friend.

We are trying to ensure that people cannot slip through the criminal net. Is there any hon. Member in the Chamber who wants criminals who ply their trade across borders to get away scot-free, simply because we do not have the apparatus to deal with them effectively? Of course there is not. Therefore, if we can find ways of recognising each other's judicial systems—improving them on occasion and recognising their strengths, in a context of respect—it is sensible that we do so.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Do the Liberals disagree with any Government policies on this matter? If not, would any of the proposals be red line items for the Liberals?

Mr. Heath: I am working my way down the list, but we believe that the Government and the European Scrutiny Committee have the balance approximately right in most areas. As I develop my speech, the hon. Gentleman will recognise that that is the case.

Some people see the minimum standards as a Trojan horse, but, again, do we have no concerns about whether British citizens will be dealt with appropriately in EU member states? I suggest that we do, that we want reasonable standards of justice to pertain in the European Union and that that is a prerequisite for a common area of security, which is what this discussion is all about.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): My hon. Friend might recall the case of my constituent, Caroline Dickinson, the young school girl who was murdered in Brittany some years ago, which is still outstanding. It is a classic example of where we want to be absolutely reassured that standards of investigation and justice are common throughout the European Union. If this is a step in that direction, and I believe that he is right in accepting that it is, surely we should all support it.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That was a tragic case and it perfectly illustrates the point that we wish to pursue.

Europol is an area where we may have a slight difference of opinion with the Government. We are concerned about the operation of Europol within the United Kingdom. Some hon. Members may recall that it was the Liberal Democrats who, both in Committee and on the Floor of the House, opposed the statutory instrument that gave immunity to Europol officers within the UK, perhaps embarrassing the Conservative Opposition in so doing. We take seriously the limits to what Europol can and should do, although we do want it to be effective and accountable. At the moment there is a limit to its accountability. I should like to see a more direct relationship between Europol, as part of the European Union structure, and the European Parliament so that, for example, the director of Europol is confirmed before the European Parliament. That seems a perfectly sensible suggestion, albeit one to which the Government are not, I think, acceding.

I have concerns about fundamental rights in some of the new countries to have entered the European Union. I strongly support enlargement, but in some of those countries the basis for human rights is tenuous. We should be extremely careful to ensure that all member states live up to the responsibilities into which they have entered in joining the EU and, indeed, through membership of the Council of Europe. British Governments of all colours have constantly promulgated that.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman is kind to give way yet again. In relation to the European arrest warrant, is he aware that it is easier to have someone extradited to Slovenia than it is to the United States? Given his earlier comments on states that have just entered the EU, is he not concerned about that?

Mr. Heath: I wish that the hon. Gentleman had not said that because it tempts me into a debate on our extradition treaty with the United States. People can be extradited from Britain to the United States but there is no reciprocal arrangement from the United States to Britain, and that is absolutely wrong. I would abuse my position, however, if I discussed that now.

It is absolutely essential that we have a degree of co-operation and co-ordination on asylum policy. Otherwise, anything that we do is likely to be meaningless because of the free movement of citizens within the EU, and I think that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden signed his name to that document. It is important that we have a common view on how to manage asylum and immigration issues properly.

I do not view the Law Society as the ultimate arbiter, nor do I view it as naïve, as does the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins). It assessed the Tampere process and broadly supports it because it believes that the agreement is in the interests of justice. That is an important accreditation.

Sometimes, the European Commission is its own worst enemy. An example of that is in its wording on qualified majority voting:

> "The legal and institutional constraints of the current Treaties, where unanimity in the Council generally remain the rule, partly explain these difficulties. The Member States are sometimes reluctant to cooperate within this new European framework when their interests are at stake."

I should hope they are unhappy and reluctant to co-operate when their interests are at stake. If the Commission thinks that that is not the proper role of sovereign Parliaments and member states within the European Union, it needs a lesson in what the proper attitude towards subsidiarity is. That is the sort of language that allows the straw men to be put up by people who have no interest in what is contained in the documents, but want to foment an argument within the country that they believe to be to their electoral advantage. That is a sad reflection on the state of oppositional politics.

On this occasion the Scrutiny Committee has it about right.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale) (Lab): I intend to please you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and to disappoint Opposition Members by sticking to the Scrutiny Committee report and the subject of today's debate. I am pleased that the Leader of the House has given us this opportunity. I support earlier comments that it is a pity that we do not have more than one and a half hours to discuss such an important issue.

The European Scrutiny Committee published in July its report on the Commission's programme for the next five years. We say in the report that these proposals relate to matters that are "at the core" of our national sovereignty. Therefore the programme directly affects the lives of individual citizens. I am pleased that the report has been so widely supported in the House and in particular that the Government also support it.

Under the treaty of Amsterdam, the European Community acquired in 1999 a new objective:

> "to provide citizens with a high level of security in an area of freedom, security and justice."

In that year the European Council held a special meeting at Tampere to set priorities for the European Community as > "an area of freedom, security and justice."

That meeting approved a detailed programme for action for the next five years, covering civil and criminal justice, asylum and immigration, and police and customs co-operation. As we know, the measures under title IV of the EC treaty on visas, asylum and immigration and other policies relating to the free movement of people do not apply to the United Kingdom unless it expressly opts in to them. At Tampere, the actions were agreed by unanimity.

These new Commission proposals failed, in the Committee's view, to evaluate the practical benefits achieved so far as a result of the Tampere programme of 1999, in relation to > "creating an area of freedom, security and justice, covering criminal and civil justice, visas, asylum and immigration, and police and customs cooperation."

Our report questions whether there is a risk that the expression is encouraging the notion that such an area is a unitary state separate from the member states which make up the European Union. Regardless of the countless assurances from Ministers, it is not easy to be comfortable with the Commission's rhetoric throughout its proposals.

> "an area of freedom, security and justice"

On harmonisation of asylum policy, the European Scrutiny Committee argues that we should not go beyond the establishment of reasonable common minimum standards. The proposals for the creation of a European public prosecutor and a European corps of border guards and to give Europol some investigative powers excited the Committee. The report states:

> "We have not yet seen sufficient justification for giving the European Union its own prosecutor, border guards and police force."

Again the Government have indicated support for that view.

The extension of the Community's activities into crime prevention could conflict with the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. We also agreed that the scope of measures relating to civil and criminal justice should be strictly confined to those which are necessary for mutual recognition, and should not affect purely internal cases or otherwise encroach on the integrity of the legal systems of member states; otherwise there would be no limit in practice to EU competence to harmonise national legal systems. Our concerns are compounded by the Commission's apparent wish to rely on qualified majority voting to secure the adoption of its justice and home affairs legislation against the wishes of some member states. As has been pointed out, the Tampere agreement in 1999 was agreed by unanimity.

Mr. Connarty: Obviously it is a joy to hear such a clear elucidation of the points that we considered and put forward and with which, as my hon. Friend said, the Government have agreed. Does he not think it essential that in summing up our Minister makes it quite clear that, in terms of the motion before us, negotiation will always be approached by the Government on the basis that they will stand by the commitments they gave to support the points put forward by him and by our Committee?

Mr. Hood: I certainly would agree with that; indeed, the last paragraph in the report asks the Government to do that. The Minister's contribution suggested that she has taken on board the comments we made; we should welcome that.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hood: All hon. Members, including Conservative Members, know that I always try to be courteous and polite in the House. However, as you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, I am also a member of the Chairmen's Panel, and we do have conventions in the House. It is a bit rich for the shadow Home Secretary to come in half way through the debate and then seek to intervene on a contribution by an hon. Member who has sat here from the beginning, so if he will excuse me on this occasion, I intend to carry on with my speech and not accept an intervention.

The Commission states that substantial progress has been made in most aspects of justice and home affairs since 1999, but that the original ambitions of Tampere have been hampered by institutional constraints and sometimes by the lack of sufficient political consensus. The proposals state:

> "It was not always possible to reach agreement at European level for the adoption of certain sensitive measures relating to policies which remain at the core of national sovereignty. The legal and institutional constraints of the current Treaties, where unanimity in the Council generally remains the rule, partly explain these difficulties.
> The Member States are sometimes reluctant to cooperate within this new European framework, and when their interests are at stake they do not hesitate to threaten the use of the veto . . . in order to lower the level of ambition of the Commission's proposals and reject [the European] Parliament's opinions."

The Commission says that once legislation is adopted, the limited role of the European Court of Justice and the restricted powers of the Commission are an obstacle to ensuring it is effective.

The Committee criticises the fact that the communication does not evaluate the practical benefits and measures already adopted, and says that it is therefore not possible to judge whether expected benefits have been achieved.

> "Moreover, the Communication does not state what practical benefits the Commission expects from the priorities it proposes for the next five years.
> We consider that it would be prudent, therefore, for member states to withhold commitment to the inclusion of these proposals in the work programme until they are presented with, and have considered, such a statement."

The European Scrutiny Committee adds, on unanimity:

> "It seems to us reasonable and proper for member states to withhold their agreement from measures they do not support and which, to use the Commission's own words, 'remain at the core of national sovereignty'. It bodes ill for the future if, on such sensitive matters, the Commission envisages reliance on QMV to impose on Member States legislation to which they are opposed".

Mr. Djanogly: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Is it therefore the view of the Committee that QMV should become a red-line issue for the Government; in other words, should the Government insist on not giving up our national veto?

Mr. Hood: The Committee would agree with the view that QMV is not suitable when deciding the issues that are contained in the proposal.

On visas, asylum and immigration, I refer to the Commission's proposals again. One proposal is the development of an integrated border management system and visa policy. The external agency and co-ordination mechanisms must be > "supplemented with the long-term objective of establishing an European Corps of border guards to complement the national border guards."

Visa policy should address the security of documents—including biometric identifiers—and improved consular co-operation.

Another proposal is a common policy on the management of migration flows, including proposals relating to links between legal and illegal migration, such as legal admission for employment purposes, better integration of legal migrants, targets for legal admissions, an effective policy on returns and readmissions and partnerships with countries of origin to deter illegal immigration and trafficking of human beings.

The Government support the development of a common EU asylum policy, which quickly and fairly identifies those in need of protection.

Caroline Flint: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. Does he agree that one thing that the Government secured is that even where there is QMV, on asylum and immigration issues we have an opt-in to any measures that protect our frontiers? Also, in regard to criminal procedural law, we have an emergency brake which would mean that any issue that we felt undermined the judicial systems throughout the United Kingdom could be put to a European Council where a decision would have to be made unanimously?

Mr. Hood: Yes I certainly agree and the Committee accepts that in its report.

As I said, the Government support the development of the EU asylum policy, which quickly and fairly identifies those in need of protection whilst tackling abuse and inefficiencies in the system. They support a more practical approach to EU co-operation, in particular through partnership with countries of origin and transit, but are not convinced of the need for further harmonisation of EU asylum policy. Again I took comfort from what the Minister said earlier.

The European Scrutiny Committee says:

> "the Commission has not presented a sufficient justification for the proposal" for the creation of a European corps of border guards. We say that the Convention did not support a reference to such a corps in the draft treaty and that the proposal is objectionable in principle. We say:

> "Control over admission is a good illustration of the sensitive matters which remain at the core of national sovereignty."

The Scrutiny Committee also notes that the common policy on asylum is not necessarily the same as a uniform policy and, while recognising the importance of common minimum standards for asylum, agrees with the Government that the case for further harmonisation remains to be made.

Mr. David: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way and I agree with the comments and criticisms of the European Commission made by the European Scrutiny Committee. However, does he agree that what we need to do is ensure that in future the European Commission is held to account to a greater extent both by national Parliaments and the Council of Ministers, and that is not in any way an anti-European argument?

Mr. Hood: I will not surprise my hon. Friend when I say that I very much agree with him. As Chairman of the Committee and as a member of the 16-member Committee, I should say that we were very much maligned by some sections of the press recently for our scrutiny successes. However, I can say that as a Committee we very rarely, if ever, follow party lines in our deliberations. We see our function as looking after the national interests of this Parliament, and anything that we do and say and anything that we report on has that at the core of its considerations.

Mr. Denham: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons why the debate on the proposals becomes so polarised is the truth that the Commission has produced an extraordinarily poor-quality JHA document? In fact, if it came to my hon. Friend the Minister in her red box this weekend as a work programme from officials, she would chuck it back in the box and say, "Go away and do it again." Should not one of the messages that we send to those in the Commission be that, if they produce such vague and ambiguous documents, they lay themselves open to the type of misinterpretation that we have heard from the Opposition today?

Mr. Hood: I thank my right hon. Friend for his intervention and for making that important point. In accepting it, I can reinforce the fact that much of our work identifies what I would class as incompetence. Such things are, by their incompetence, provocative and cause unnecessary provocation in national Parliaments of other member states as well. That message should go out loud and clear, and it is one that the Committee often sends to the Commission, both in our reports and, if we are given the opportunity to meet or take evidence from individual commissioners, in Brussels.

On civil and criminal justice, the Commission proposes the creation of a European judicial area, respecting the legal traditions and systems of the member states. It says:

> "The development of the European judicial area has neither the objective nor the effect of challenging the legal and judicial traditions of member states, and total harmonisation would be neither proportionate nor appropriate . . . For this reason, the principle of mutual recognition has been placed at the heart of European integration in this field . . . However, mutual recognition requires a common basis of shared principles and minimum standards."

It adds:

> "It will be necessary to avoid a situation where in each member state there are two separate legal regimes, one relating to the disputes with cross-border implications and another purely on internal disputes."

Mr. Hawkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hood: No. I am sorry; I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

Measures proposed include the definition of fundamental guarantees, the conditions of the admissibility of evidence and strengthening the protection of victims. The Commission calls for a coherent crime policy to enable the European Union to fight serious crime effectively and for action to define fixed-minimum penalties for certain offences.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hood: In a moment.

The Commission also calls for a European public prosecutor's office to be created from Eurojust. On the European public prosecutor, the Government say:

> "We support strong action to tackle fraud against the Union's interests. But any role of a European Public Prosecutor in this area is dependent on our agreement. We will not agree to anything that is not in the national interest."

On minimum standards, the Government have

> "reservations about the statement that mutual recognition requires a common base of shared principles and minimum standards, which suggests that criminal procedural law measures are a pre-condition for mutual recognition."

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hood: I will in a moment.

Mr. Cash: We have not got many moments.

Mr. Hood: In a moment.

The European Scrutiny Committee emphasises that the principle of mutual recognition does not necessitate uniformity of procedural or substantive law. We regard

> "such uniformity both as unnecessary and as prejudicial to the integrity of the different legal systems of the Member States."

The Committee is concerned by the implications of the Commission's view that it is necessary to avoid a situation where each member state has separate legal regimes for disputes with cross-border implications and for purely internal disputes.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hood: Yes, I certainly will, briefly.

Mr. Cash: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I should have liked to say much more, but I shall keep it to some simple points. First, the European Scrutiny Committee has condemned the proposals. That is basically what the report boils down to. Secondly, when the vote takes place, I hope that hon.

Members who have contributed to the report will follow me into the Lobby. Thirdly, in 1967, the then Labour Government said:

> "Nothing in Community law would . . . materially affect the general principles of our criminal law . . ."— and the same was repeated in 1975. In a nutshell, the fact is that, as the Leader of the Opposition said at the Conservative party conference:

> "Politicians . . . have made promises they have failed to keep."

This is about the existing treaties, and those treaties must be renegotiated, repealed and amended.

Mr. Hood: For my sins and for reasons better known to some higher authority, I am rather fond of the hon. Gentleman. He served on the European Scrutiny Committee before me, and I have served on that Committee for 17 years. I always leave him to make his own points, even though I do not necessarily understand them too clearly.

The Committee's report says:

> "We draw attention to the danger that measures which are ostensibly concerned with mutual recognition will have the effect of creating uniform rules which will then apply to all cases, whether they have any cross-border implications or not. As we have commented before, Commission proposals on the 'area of freedom security and justice' have appeared to treat this 'area' as synonymous with a unitary State, with only one legal system. We do not believe that there is any treaty basis for such an approach, or that it complies with the principle of subsidiarity. If Parliament has not chosen to unify the separate legal systems of England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, we see no justification for this being attempted by the European Union."

Angus Robertson: I agree with every word that the hon. Gentleman has said until now. Is he concerned that the explanatory memorandum on that very issue—he notes the important separate legal systems—has had no input from the Scottish Executive, as noted in the paper itself?

Mr. Hood: I accept the point that the hon. Gentleman makes and has made on previous occasions. Indeed, the report covers that issue as well.

In trying to reach my conclusion, I wish to say that the Commission's proposals include strengthening the role of Europol, including giving Europol some powers of investigation, extending the work of the European police college and creating a legal framework to improve the sharing of intelligence between enforcement authorities and possibly making Europol a Union agency, financed from the Community budget.

Mr. Davidson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hood: No, I am sorry. I will try to be fair.

The Commission's proposals include counter-terrorism activity, including the creation of an information exchange centre, action to combat the financing of terrorism, and action in the fight against serious crime, such as public-private partnerships. The European Scrutiny Committee recognises the possible benefits of further co-operation between member states and improved exchanges of information—

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 16.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Union document No. 10249/04, with ADD 1 and ADD 2, Commission Communication on the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice: assessment of the Tampere Programme and future orientations; notes that the Communication forms the basis of negotiations for the next European Union Justice and Home Affairs Work Programme; and supports the Government's position that the Work Programme should focus on measures that complement the efforts of Member States and will be of most benefit to European Union citizens.

HORSERACE BETTING AND OLYMPIC LOTTERY BILL (PROGRAMME) (NO.2)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 6 November 2003],

That the following shall apply to the Horserace Betting and Olympic Lottery Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 8th January 2004.

Consideration of Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement at this day's sitting.

Subsequent stages

2. Any further Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any further Question being put.

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.—[Mr. Ainger.]

Question agreed to.

Clause 10

CONTROL WHEN NO EXCLUSIVE LICENCE

Lords amendment: No. 1.

3.15 pm

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I was almost not in my place just now. That will serve me right for believing the Whips when they told me that there would be three Divisions, not two. I would also like to apologise for the absence of the Minister for Sport and Tourism, who has guided the Bill through its many stages. He cannot be with us today as he has ministerial duties elsewhere, but he sends his apologies to the House and has left me to deal with this last stage of the Bill.

I propose that the House accept this amendment that was made to the Bill in the House of Lords. In the original draft of the Bill, provision was made for point-to-point racing to be made exempt from regulatory requirements. During the discussions on the Bill in another place, concern was expressed that those provisions were not generous enough, and that the original maximum of four days proposed by the Government risked bringing a number of point-to-point races within the regulatory structures.

The Lords amendment that we are now considering reflects the Government's positive response to representations. The Government wished to avoid such an unnecessary regulatory imposition, and accordingly tabled an amendment to raise the maximum exemption to seven days of racing. Representatives of point-to-point organisations have welcomed the amendment, as I do now. I hope that the House will accept it.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Before I comment on the amendment before us, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Members on both sides of both Houses who have worked so hard to scrutinise the Bill. Although we are considering only a few amendments today, the important debates that have taken place have played their part in ensuring that the Government are aware of the concerns of racing. In a Bill that frequently requires Parliament to trust the Government to keep their word, it is important to get commitments clearly on the record, if not always in the Bill.

I would like to pay particular tribute to the dedication and hard work of my colleagues, my hon. Friends the Members for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), who have brought their considerable experience, knowledge and passion for racing and sport to the Committee. I believe that the debates were the stronger for that. I should also like to pay tribute to Lord Moynihan in the other place, who was ably assisted by the noble Lord Luke. He clearly did a first-class job, and the Bill is the stronger for it. The British Paralympic Association has particular reason to be grateful, as we shall hear later.

I should highlight the fact that we are considering Lords amendment No. 1 entirely due to the foresight of my colleague Viscount Ullswater, who has ensured that the interests of point-to-point racing have not been forgotten. Currently, the Tote does not run pool betting at point-to-point races. However, it has been prepared to grant authority to the secretaries of the various point-to-point committees to run their own pool-betting operations for a nominal fee. In 2003, 82 point-to-point fixtures ran their own Tote.

Clause 10(1) amends the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 by substituting a new section 4. Under the Bill as drafted, the new section 4(4) allowed for a point-to-point exemption certificate to be applied for from the Gaming Board. However, that application had to specify a maximum number of days, not exceeding four, on which horse racing could be carried out. In the other place, Viscount Ullswater rightly pointed out that two point-to-point courses, Garthorpe and Larkhill, were to hold more than four meets in 2004.

I welcome the Government's decision to look again at this provision. On Report, the Government tabled the amendment that we see before us today, which changes the limit from four to seven. I acknowledge that the amendment represents a step forward by the Government in protecting point-to-point racing. I am interested, however, in understanding exactly how the Government reached the figure of seven meets. I accept that it is a compromise, but why that particular figure?

Viscount Ullswater called for the limit to be scrapped completely. Why have the Government ignored that option? So far, the Government have failed to provide a justification for maintaining a limit of any sort. Indeed, the Minister in the other place provided a curious answer:

> "My Lords, seven is better than four . . . Seven is satisfactory for all point-to-point racing, except for Larkhill, as far as I can see. This is a compromise; I hope it is an acceptable compromise."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 19 July 2004; Vol. 664, c. 43–4.]

That does not really let us know a lot about the Government's thinking.

We do not intend to overturn this amendment, which is certainly a considerable improvement on the original drafting of the Bill. It would be useful, however, if the Minister could give the Government's reason for choosing seven rather than any other number.

Estelle Morris: I readily acknowledge the work of Viscount Ullswater in the other place and accept that the amendment came about because of the work that he did and the representations he made. That is the spirit in which the legislation has gone through its stages in both Houses. That is not unique, but it is unusual, and I pay tribute to that. I read the same bit of Hansard as the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), which is why I was smiling a little as he quoted it.

Unfortunately, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a scientific explanation as to why it is seven and not four. It is a compromise, as the Minister in the other place said. It has been accepted by those with a keen interest in the issue and it was accepted by Viscount Ullswater. I think that we should accept that and move forward. The amendment will not jeopardise any point-to-point races in coming years and if a change is thought necessary in future years, the Government will by then have evidence against which to set any further amendment. This is a case of test it and see. Given that no point-to-point race will be discriminated against, I hope that the House will agree the amendment so that we may make further progress.

The hon. Gentleman raises a legitimate question. All of us like to think that legislation is rooted in extensive evidence and careful logical thought, but sometimes we have to estimate what will work best in certain circumstances. When I read the report of the debate in the other place, I thought that that had happened in this case. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will accept that explanation. In any case, I welcome his general comments on the amendment.

Lords amendment agreed to.

ABOLITION OF LEVY

Lords amendment: No. 2.

Estelle Morris: I hope that this second amendment will find favour with the House. It is an important, although not a major point. It acts on the recommendation of the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee of the other place. Clause 15(1) will enable the Government to commence, under order-making powers, the abolition of the horserace betting levy system. In the Bill as originally drafted, no parliamentary procedure was specified. The Committee was concerned that consequential amendment could be made to primary legislation without Parliament having the opportunity to consider it. The Government accepted that recommendation and moved an amendment to provide that the negative resolution procedure shall apply to all orders made under clause 15(1), and not the positive resolution procedure.

Hugh Robertson: Given that the occasions when the Government decide they should give more power to Parliament rather than keep it for themselves are few and far between, I can only welcome the amendment. We should be grateful to the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee's seventh report, which recommended that clause 15 should be amended. The Committee wrote:

> "Clause 15(1) provides for an order, subject to no Parliamentary procedure, activating repeals and the dissolution of the Horserace Betting Levy Board . . . Clause 15(2)(c) enables the order under clause 15(1) also to make consequential provision which can include amending enactments. The Committee normally expects such provisions to be subject to the affirmative procedure but, in this instance, since the provision is limited to consequential provision and in the light of Schedule 4 to the bill, the Committee recommends that the appropriate level of Parliamentary procedure in this case is negative procedure."

If Members understand that, they are doing much better than me.

Accordingly, in Committee, the Government tabled an amendment to provide that the negative resolution procedure will apply to all orders made under clause 15(1). It is right that the Government responded appropriately to the recommendations and I am grateful to them for doing so.

My colleagues in the other place expressed several concerns about the timing of the abolition of the levy and have sought assurances to protect the legacy of the Horserace Betting Levy Board's good work. Unfortunately, despite the force of our arguments, we did not manage to convince the Government that they should make important changes, so, given that the amendment places a check—albeit a small one—on the Government's power to abolish the levy, I offer it our support.

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I echo the words of the Minister and of my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson). The Committee proceedings were conducted with a conviviality that is not usual in political affairs; the whole Committee came together in a single drive to ensure that, in particular, the Tote was returned to a racing trust. I was surprised and delighted by that atmosphere and only wish that our other debates could be conducted in similar fashion.

I welcome moves for the abolition of the levy. It has been a source of friction over the years. I can understand the Secretary of State's wanting to get rid of it at the earliest possible opportunity, but there have been a number of difficulties.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman about the spirit in which our deliberations in Committee were conducted. In view of his belief, which I share, that the most appropriate sale would be to a racing trust, does he acknowledge that some difficulties were created in another place by some of his colleagues who took a rather different view? Does he disagree with them?

Mr. Page: I am very disappointed that the hon. Gentleman endeavours to bring friction where there was peace and unanimity. However, bearing in mind the political party he comes from, that situation can be taken as the norm. My noble Friend was simply trying to tease out further the Government's commitment to a sale to a racing trust. He in no way wanted to scupper the Bill or see it destroyed; he did what he did for the purposes of clarity and explanation. Personally, I would have gone about things slightly differently, but there we are. We all take individual approaches to our aims and objectives in life.

I welcome abolition of the levy, but I want to ensure that what takes its place will be for racing, so I welcome the Minister's statement that the provisions will be subject to resolution by Parliament. It is extremely important that the statements by Ministers over the years that the sale will be to a racing trust actually come to pass. We take the racing industry very much for granted in the UK. It is not fully appreciated that 100,000 people are employed in the industry and if it is put at risk it could go abroad, as so much of our manufacturing has done. All the trials and tribulations and dramas of the past year or so have actually put our racing industry on to a strong basis.

Some of the major owners—the gentlemen from the Arab states—have behaved with a dignity and maturity that I can but admire, and in some cases wish was emulated in the rest of the industry, and have given tremendous support. I want nothing that would drive them away. The amendment offers further reassurance about the way forward, so I can only hope that when it reaches the statute book the Government move quickly to see the Tote put into the hands of a racing trust for the benefit of racing.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I fully support the racing trust concept for the future of the Tote and welcome the acceptance of the amendment, which applies some additional parliamentary protection in respect of the abolition of the levy. I want to make three points about why that protection may be important.

The levy has been criticised; it has been a matter for dispute. One advantage enjoyed by the levy board is that by custom and practice it has always included an independent Scottish member to protect the particular interests of Scottish racing. That provision was not in the legislation, but came about through custom and accord. Many Scottish Members are worried that the successor organisation, the British Horseracing Board, has no such organisational connection with Scottish racing. Some of us held a cross-party meeting with the BHB this morning to discuss that point, and we await its proposals on how it will accommodate the specific dimension of Scottish racing in its structures. The Minister for the Arts will know that the Minister for Sport and Tourism has expressed his sympathy and support for, and interest in, the matter, so I hope that she is aware of the situation.

3.30 pm

My other two points relate to the funding of racing. We read in this morning's Racing Post that the future system of support for the racing industry will depend on hypothecation relating to betting turnover. However, at least one major bookmakers firm, Ladbrokes, intends to try to charge the industry to supply it with information on which to base the hypothecation. While a firm may legitimately charge a fee for commercial data, the future funding of racing will depend on that information, so it will not be commercial data. Incidentally, that information cannot come from only one company because it must be produced by all bookmakers and betting exchanges if it is to provide a solid base of information for the future funding of racing. What is the Minister's view of a company that apparently wants to hold the rest of the racing industry to ransom by demanding payment for information? Such an arrangement would put a question mark over the basis of the new funding settlement.

Whatever the faults, trials and tribulations of the levy board, it provided a balance so that informed judgments could be made on developments in racing that were for the good of the sport as a whole. The various interested parties in racing have reached an agreement that in addition to the hypothecation from betting revenue there will be a development fund. The fund will apply to races that might not be especially commercial and might involve only a few runners, yet are essential preparatory races for other events because if they were not to take place, the eventually championship races up to which they led could encounter considerable difficulties. The development fund will be part of the new concept, but it might make up only as little as 6 per cent. of racing's overall revenue. It cannot be right that the money available to support racing as a sport should be such a small percentage of the overall revenue generated by the racing industry.

I support the amendment, the Government's willingness to accept it and the camaraderie with which we will, I hope, proceed towards a racing trust running the Tote. However, before we all celebrate the departure of the levy and the levy board, we must remember that that system of funding included vital protections. It is up to the Government to tell us that those protections will continue to be offered under the new framework towards which we are moving.

Estelle Morris: I thank the hon. Members for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) and for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) for their contributions. It is clear from our short debate that it is essential for us to accept the Lords amendment. There is general agreement about the course of action that has been taken, but understandable worry about whether the benefit that has accrued to the industry will continue under the new arrangements. Indeed, the industry is thriving and it contributes to our nation economically and in other ways.

I hope that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan will appreciate that I have come to the Bill exceptionally late in its passage and, if I am honest, I have not taken a day-to-day interest in it throughout its stages in the Commons and the Lords. I shall refrain from commenting on the article in today's Racing Post.

I hope that the procedure that we are adopting means that there will be an opportunity for both Houses to discuss legitimate concerns about percentages, the meaning of data that may be sold as a commercial activity and the protection of the industry. I hope that the general principles are agreed and that debates on detail will be held in both Houses.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 31

DISTRIBUTION POLICY

Lords amendment: No. 3.

Estelle Morris: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this we may discuss Lords amendment No. 4.

Estelle Morris: As this is the final group of amendments, I join the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Robertson) in taking the opportunity, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism, to thank him and to congratulate all hon. Members, officers and officials who have worked so hard to get the Bill through both Houses.

The amendments, tabled by Lord Moynihan, Lord Luke and Lord Glentoran, are sensible. It is right that they be included in the Bill. It was no one's intention to rule out discussion or consultation with the British

[Estelle Morris]

Paralympic Association. The amendments add the British Paralympic Association to the list of bodies that the Olympic lottery distributor must consult when preparing or revising its distribution policy and to which the distributor must send a copy of any policy or revision.

The Government fully endorse the central role of the British Paralympic Association in our bid for the 2012 London Olympics and Paralympics, and the other place was happy to accept the amendments. I propose that the House accept both of them.

Hugh Robertson: I am delighted that the Government have accepted our amendment. It is even more satisfying when the purpose is so important and the cause so patently just. Lord Moynihan rightly identified that the Bill failed to include the British Paralympic Association in its list of statutory consultees on the Olympic lottery strategy. I am pleased that that omission has been corrected.

It is right and just to take stock of the achievements of our Paralympic athletes and their association. Our Paralympic athletes gained 35 gold medals, 30 silvers and 29 bronzes in Athens. It is right that we should pay tribute to that outstanding achievement. I and other members of my party had the privilege of meeting at our conference in Bournemouth two gold medal winners—Darren Kenny in cycling and Danny Crates in athletics. I am sure that other hon. Members had the same opportunity at their conferences.

Each performance is an individual achievement, but our Paralympians receive an outstanding service from the British Paralympic Association. It is clearly best placed to advise on the specific specialist requirements of its athletes and their sports. The Bill, as amended, will allow that expertise to be tapped into by the new Olympic lottery distributor. That is why I support the amendments.

Mr. Don Foster: Many of us had the opportunity to congratulate our Olympic team and I now echo the words of the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) in praise of all members of our Paralympic team.

We fully support the amendments. We are delighted that the Government accepted them, although we acknowledge that they intended to involve the Paralympic organisations at all stages. However, it is an important gesture to include the British Paralympic Association in the Bill because that demonstrates the importance that this House and the Lords place on the Paralympic games. They are a crucial part of the package for which we are bidding in 2012. We are not bidding just for the Olympics to come to London, but for the Paralympic games as well. Both those games will bring an enormous benefit to London and all parts of the UK. It is for those reasons that the Liberal Democrats fully support the activities of the team that is working so hard to ensure that the bid is successful and both games come here.

I share the comments made by others about the effective way in which the Bill was scrutinised in both Houses. I pay tribute to all the members of the Committee, who worked hard on the Bill. Will the Minister, who has taken up the baton at short notice, pass a message on to her right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism, congratulating him on his work on this and related issues? Nevertheless, there remain a number of concerns about the Olympic lottery fund, which the amendments address.

Members on both sides of the House believe that the new Olympic lottery game will begin if—and I hope that this is the case—we mount a successful bid for the 2012 Olympics. The money that the game will raise, however, is unlikely to be sufficient to meet the overall lottery contribution to the funds. As a result, there will probably be a modest reduction in the money made available to other good causes, and the House understands that the loss will be distributed equally among them. I would be enormously grateful if the Minister confirmed that that is the Government's intention and that nothing in the lottery Bill expected in the Queen's Speech will change that plan. I congratulate the Minister on picking up the baton at such short notice, and I apologise to her, because the House will have noted that she was late for the start our debate, and had to rush into the Chamber. I plead guilty to detaining her, for which I apologise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Minister responds, I hope, with regard to the final remarks of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), that she will not stray too wide of the mark. The amendments before the House are narrowly drawn, so she may decide to respond to the hon. Gentleman at a later date.

Estelle Morris: It will not be the first time that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has led me astray, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am grateful to the hon. Members for Bath and for Faversham and Mid-Kent for their favourable welcome for the amendment. I join them in congratulating our Paralympic athletes on their achievement, and I emphasise that the Paralympic games are very much part of the 2012 bid. Our strength in that area will help to make the bid attractive and, we hope, successful. I underline the importance of cross-party support for the bid, and appreciate the backing that our preparations have received from members of all parties.

It is not for me to say whether lottery legislation will, or will not, be announced in the Queen's Speech. How much money will be raised by an Olympic lottery is very much a guesstimate. We do not know how many people will buy tickets or how much will be raised. We hope that the lottery will raise £750 million, but the hon. Member for Bath is right that it is unlikely to raise sufficient funds for other recipients to remain unaffected and I am not going to pretend otherwise. It would be wonderful if that were not the case, but that is not the likely outcome. However, although our figures are very much guesstimates, the "fair share" funding for recipients has worked well since the inception of the lottery. The hon. Gentleman must wait for the contents of any lottery legislation introduced after the Queen's Speech, but I am happy with the success of that funding scheme. He ought not to be afraid that any single recipient will bear undue losses in the effort to provide more money for the Olympic bid. We must wait, however, for any such legislation and, as Mr. Deputy Speaker said, to go further may be to stray from the subject of the amendments. However, the hon. Gentleman's question was half-legitimate, so I was happy to answer it.

I hope that the amendment will find favour in the House. I thank hon. Members for their consideration of the Lords amendments, which was indicative of the Bill's passage through both Houses. I also thank them for their patience during my short, late and not very knowledgeable appearance.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 4 agreed to.

School Sport

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Stephen Twigg.]

3.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I am pleased to have the chance to set out the Government's strategy on school sport and physical education. Strong support exists on both sides of the House for the promotion of sport in schools and for increased participation and physical activity levels among children and young people. As a minimum, every child, whatever their circumstances, should spend at least two hours a week on high-quality physical education and school sport, both within and beyond the curriculum, and our national strategy is about turning that ambition into reality.

By March 2006, we will have invested more than £1 billion in transforming sport in our schools. We will shortly confirm how much we will spend on school sport in 2006–07 and 2007–08 as a result of the 2004 spending review settlement, and I am confident that we will again make a significant investment further to improve physical education and school sport. Our public service agreement to increase the percentage of five to 16-year-olds who spend at least two hours a week on PE and school sport to 75 per cent. by 2006 and to 85 per cent. by 2008 is ambitious but achievable.

It goes without saying that sport has a proven and essential role to play in many of our priority areas in education. Sport is worthwhile in and of itself, and it contributes to the central educational goal of raising standards. It is crucial to our cross-Government work to enhance the nation's health, not least by tackling childhood obesity, an issue to which I shall return later in my speech. It has an important role to play in improving attendance and behaviour in our schools, issues of which all hon. Members on both sides of the House are well aware, not least in our constituencies.

Sport offers some children their first chance to succeed at school. Such success builds confidence and social skills and engages such children with education, which leads to less disruption for not only them but the school community as a whole, thereby enhancing other pupils' learning opportunities and impacting on academic attainment and standards. For example, one primary school that benefits from the sporting playgrounds programme found that after it zoned its playground, the number of antisocial incidents in the playground fell by about two thirds and the number of children involved in purposeful physical activity significantly increased.

Let us not underestimate the importance and impact of doing well on the international sports stage. May I join hon. Members who participated in the previous debate in congratulating the teams at the Olympics and Paralympics on their performances in Athens and, of course, in wishing our bid for the 2012 games every success?

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): I should like to take the Minister back to the grassroots, where he began. I share his objectives, but I want to put two points to him. This lunchtime, I was at

[Simon Hughes]

Ilderton primary school in my constituency. I asked the head how much swimming the children did, and she said that only one year goes swimming for two hours a week. Does the Minister agree that every child in every year should have the opportunity to go swimming, for all the obvious reasons?

Will he consider the idea that part of the Government's plan for an 8 o'clock-to-6 o'clock package of provision for young people should be to provide sports and swimming alternatives between 3 o'clock—or the end of the formal school day—and 6 o'clock, which would allow every primary school child to take part in those activities every week if they wish to do so?

Mr. Twigg: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments. On his first point, I agree that the extended school day provides incredible opportunities to enhance learning, including in the field of physical education and sport, of which swimming is a part. However, I am not in a position to make the firm commitment that he seeks.

On the hon. Gentleman's second point, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), is pioneering, with Brent council and schools in the borough of Brent, a scheme precisely along the lines that the hon. Gentleman outlined. It aims to extend the school day and to provide opportunities for sport as part of that. Additionally, earlier this year we launched a swimming charter that set out some important requirements for school swimming. The Mayor of London funded certain boroughs in east London to ensure that they can offer swimming during the Easter holidays, and he is looking to build on that for future years.

Good things are happening on the ground, and part of our job is to monitor them and to encourage other places to take up those opportunities. I certainly regard swimming as an important element of our physical education and sports strategy, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for drawing that to the House's attention.

The broad strategy on school sport is jointly led by the Department for Education and Skills and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. We seek to achieve several things. First, we want to build a national infrastructure that invests in people so that we have people who can really make a difference in physical education and sport. Evidence from Ofsted shows that the quality of PE teaching in primary, secondary and special schools has improved dramatically over recent years.

Secondly, we want to do all that we can to make a step-change improvement to the facilities for school sports.

Thirdly, we want to deliver opportunities for professional development to enhance expertise and subject knowledge.

Fourthly, we want to strengthen links between schools and sports clubs to create a culture that supports participation in clubs and, importantly, offers young people leadership and volunteering opportunities that will improve their skills and employability.

Fifthly, we want to ensure that there is better support for our most talented young athletes—the Olympians of the future—to help them to excel both in sport and in their wider education.

Sixthly, we want to address an important issue that has been in the headlines for years by doing our best to protect school playing fields. I am very pleased that we recently reached an unprecedented partnership agreement with the National Playing Fields Association. In August, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills was able to announce the strongest ever protection for school playing fields. The new arrangements build on the legislation that was introduced in 1998, which has already stemmed the tide of uncontrolled sales by making it clear that the sale of a playing field must be the absolute last resort; that the proceeds need to be used to improve outdoor school sports facilities wherever practicable; and that the new facilities must be sustainable for at least 10 years.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the Minister agree that there is a real distinction between PE and other sports and that it is essential to have people with sufficient skills and qualifications to teach cricket and rugger, as well as other sports such as football? Is that not reflected in the fact that pupils at Christ Church middle school in my constituency, who have just reached the national finals at Headingley—a tremendous achievement—received coaching from outside, not inside, the school, and that that problem should be addressed within the state system?

Mr. Twigg: First, I congratulate Christ Church middle school on its success in getting to Headingley. We want to do two things: strengthen the expertise of teachers in schools and tap into resources in the wider community. I do not think that that needs to be an either/or. In some communities, people will come from clubs and coaches will come from elsewhere to work in school gyms and classrooms and on the playing field. We need both.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I seek clarification: are there any circumstances in which a school playing field could be sold off and the proceeds go to anything other than school sports facilities?

Mr. Twigg: The only slightly wider circumstance is the proceeds perhaps going to the broader facilities of a school. They could not be used for other purposes that go beyond sport and education.

John Mann: In other words, is the Minister saying that a local education authority could subsidise its capital programmes for school buildings by selling off playing fields?

Mr. Twigg: That would be a very last resort. An LEA would have to clear a series of hurdles before it could even present an application. Such an application would then go before a panel including the National Playing Fields Association before it could even be considered by me. Ultimately, it would come to me for approval. I have not approved anything along those lines.

John Mann: I am delighted that the Minister has not accepted any such application so far. Is he aware of, and does he expect in the next three months, any application in respect of which he might consider doing anything other than allowing the proceeds of the sale of school playing fields to go into sports facilities only, rather than subsidising the capital programme of a big-spending LEA that receives a lot of rates?

Mr. Twigg: I suspect that my hon. Friend may be referring to a particular example, possibly in his constituency. I shall await any news that I might receive on that, either from him or from the applicant, rather than speculate on how I might respond to it.

I shall now try to make progress, because a number of hon. Members want to speak and only two hours remain in the debate. We have conducted a large and comprehensive survey of school sport in England, which was published on 29 April. It shows some of the progress that is being made. For example, overall, 62 per cent. of pupils in the 6,500 schools surveyed spend at least two hours in a typical week on high-quality physical education and school sport. We believe from this that we are on course to achieve the 2006 and 2008 targets. I put on record my thanks to the teachers, coaches and volunteers who have done so much to make that possible.

What we need to do now is consolidate what has been achieved, to press on and do more. For example, we need to increase participation among some of the youngest children in education and to encourage girls, pupils from ethnic minorities and those with special needs or disabilities to take up their entitlement to sport on an equal basis with everyone else.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): While it is good that more and more schools are reaching the two-hour target, does the Minister agree that a message needs to be sent to schools that it is a bare minimum? It is not "job done" when that target is reached and schools should go on to provide many more hours of sport as well as a diverse range of sports to take part in. Achieving the two hours is the first box ticked.

Mr. Twigg: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. He is known for the hard work that he has done and is doing in this area, and he is absolutely right to remind me and the House that the two hours is a minimum. We shall certainly look kindly on schools that can reach a much larger figure. Clearly, with 62 per cent. of pupils achieving the two hours, we still face a big challenge in getting the other 38 per cent. to follow. That has to be our priority. I will certainly do all I can to encourage, support and recognise those schools that find themselves able to go beyond the two-hour minimum.

Sport is a powerful medium to re-engage young people. It is now widely accepted that learning should not start and stop at the school gate or at the end of the school day, and that partnerships beyond the classroom are essential if we are to enable children to realise their potential.

One programme that does that very well is Playing for Success. There are now 83 Playing for Success centres—state-of-the-art study support centres—at football and other professional sports clubs. We have set a target of at least 100 being open by 2006, and there is every sign that we will meet that target a year ahead of schedule.

The centres support young people who may be struggling with literacy and numeracy, getting them back on course, strengthening their motivation to learn and improving their self-esteem and confidence. Every FA premier league club has a centre. Many clubs in the football league do too, but it is not just football clubs—rugby, cricket, basketball and tennis clubs are also involved.

I recommend that hon. Members on both sides of the House visit a Playing for Success centre to see some of the marvellous work that is done to motivate young people. It is not something woolly about motivation—the centres are having a serious impact on standards. Independent evaluation by the National Foundation for Educational Research has found that the centres significantly improve pupils' skills and motivation and that they make significant progress in independent study skills and self-image, which help them when they return to their schools.

Since 1997, specialist sports schools, the sports colleges, have been raising sporting and academic standards, establishing successful partnerships with the private sector and working with the wider community. We now have 291 schools that specialise in sport, including four of the academies, benefiting more than 250,000 pupils. We aim to reach 400 by 2006, which will represent one in nine of all secondary schools.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Is there any evidence at this stage to show whether the academic achievements of schools that specialise in sport have remained the same, got worse or improved?

Mr. Twigg: I thank the hon. Gentleman for anticipating the next paragraph of my speech. Performance in PE at GCSE, A and AS-level is improving in sports colleges, as one might expect. More interestingly, there is a wider benefit—it is the case with all specialist schools. The curriculum focus is used to drive improvement across the school. The percentage of pupils in specialist sports schools achieving five or more A* to C grades at GCSE, the standard measure, increased from 41 per cent. in 1997 to 48.7 per cent. in 2003—almost double the national average increase for all schools. The hon. Gentleman highlights an important feature of the programme. It brings not only what we would expect—benefits with respect to PE and sport— but a broader benefit across the board.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Is there not a problem if we insist that specialist sports schools have to achieve rigorous academic qualifications? Work carried out by social anthropologists at Stanford shows that people who cannot read and write need to do sport, art, music and acting first in order to get the confidence to return to maths and English. I wonder whether that is a core dilemma in the specialist sports school concept.

Mr. Twigg: I do not think that it is. We are certainly not saying that, in order to be a specialist school, it is necessary for that improvement to happen. The improvement is in large part a consequence of the curriculum focus that comes from specialism. On those figures, 51.3 per cent. of pupils did not achieve five or more A* to C grades at GCSE, but they enjoyed some of the other important benefits that my hon. Friend rightly describes.

Mr. Cash: This is an interesting issue. I do not think that the Minister has mentioned the word "competition" yet. One cannot be good at games unless one is highly competitive. Surely that transfers across to an ethos within the school, which the Minister demonstrated from the figures, that some do better than others in school work as well as in sport. Does he agree that it is psychologically important to get across the idea that there is nothing but good to come from competition?

Mr. Twigg: Hon. Members are kindly anticipating different sections of my speech. I shall deal with competitive sport later—and, by way of reassurance, I shall be saying very much what the hon. Gentleman has just said. I intend to wrap up my remarks because several hon. Members wish to speak.

School sport partnerships are clustered around the sports colleges, establishing a network of 400 such partnerships—families of schools—which receive additional funding to enhance sports opportunities for all children. We have reached a position where just over half of all schools in England are within this network of 313 partnerships. Last week, I had the opportunity to attend their national conference at Nottingham university, with about 1,000 people. There was a powerful sense of dynamism, energy and enthusiasm, sharing the benefits of specialism in secondary schools with other secondary schools and, importantly, primary schools, special schools and the broader community.

More than 1,700 secondary co-ordinators and 10,000 primary and special school link teachers have been appointed and are in place within the partnerships, sharing best practice, organising competitions and activities, and building and strengthening subject leadership, particularly where it is seen to be most needed—in the primary sector. The prime objective of the partnerships is to enable pupils to take up their entitlement to the minimum of two hours of high-quality PE and sport.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has left the Chamber, but it is at this point that I should like to reiterate the Government's strong commitment to competitive school sport. The PE national curriculum requires that all pupils are taught competitive games. After years of decline, the co-ordinators and link teachers, with support from sports clubs and volunteers, are turning the tide to breathe life back into local, regional and national school sports competitions. For example, the Ellis Guildford partnership in Nottingham has just won a national development award for setting up six new competitive junior leagues in basketball, hockey, tennis, netball, cricket, rugby union and softball, involving 1,400 children from 36 schools. This is precisely the direction that we want to take, and competitive school sports are at the heart of our PE and school sport strategy.

At the beginning of my speech, I mentioned that I wanted to place the sport strategy in the broader context of healthy living and the positive role that schools can play in promoting good health and, in particular, tackling obesity. We are working closely with colleagues in the Department of Health. Last month, we published the healthy living blueprint for schools, which re-emphasises not only the importance of PE and sport, but the broader benefits of physical activity, as well as focusing on issues such as food in schools. We want to build on that blueprint when the public health White Paper is published shortly.

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): The two sports colleges in my constituency are concerned at their inability to engage local NHS bodies, such as the primary care trusts, in their operations and in cascading out the local schools sport partnership. Would he be prepared to have words with his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department to try and ensure that that particular gap is filled?

Mr. Twigg: I am happy to do that.

Bob Russell: Joined-up government.

Mr. Twigg: As the hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position, the success of this relies on different parts of government, nationally and locally, working well. If my hon. Friend wants to write to me with more details on that specific instance, I shall be happy to look into it, but I want to send out a general message that for the healthy living approach to work, it requires schools to take it seriously, which itself is a challenge, and effective working together, locally and nationally. That is the way to make a success of this, and primary care trusts have an important role to play.

Let me finish by saying something about the European year of education through sport. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Stone is back in his place for this part. He sadly missed the part of my speech in which I think he and I would have been in full agreement, on the role of competitive sports, and I look forward to hearing him give his full endorsement today to the European year of education through sport. We would all agree that, to be world class, it is necessary to be aware of the wider world, and it is encouraging that the work that we are doing on sport is increasingly regarded by many of our international partners, including in the European Union, as a positive example from which lessons can be learned.

Mr. Cash: I am sorry, but the Minister's remarks have tempted me to ask another question. He would, I am sure, repudiate the remarks of Romano Prodi, who suggested that we should be represented as Europeans at the Olympics. Could we just get that one completely out of the way?

Mr. Twigg: I am reliably informed by colleagues behind me that Mr. Prodi did not say that. However, I can certainly reiterate that we have absolutely no intention of doing anything of the sort and that we want to build on our nation's success at Athens. We hope to do that not only in Beijing, but in London in 2012.

The European Union has designated 2004 the year of education through sport and we are playing an active role in that, helping to share best practice and to strengthen links with our friends in continental Europe.

The prime objective of the year, very much mirroring and complementing the approach that I have been describing this afternoon, is to identify and showcase the contribution that sport is making and can make to education and to raising educational standards.

The European Union has invested nearly £500,000 in 16 projects across the United Kingdom, including an international camp run by the Easington school sport partnership in Durham, where several hundred young people from across Europe took part in a camp focused on promoting healthy lifestyles. A project in Hull targeted young people at risk of under-performing and used sport as a medium to motivate and raise their expectations. Working with the British Council, we are developing a broader international perspective at the sports colleges and in the partnerships. For example, Angley school in Kent has developed links with a school in Bangkok, and through the dreams and teams programme, pupils at the schools have gained a greater awareness of each other's cultures and languages. The British Council is extending that programme to 21 countries, using the Department for Education and Skills' global gateway to help foster and sustain international school links—a positive example of sport as a medium not just for education but for promoting international ties and breaking down barriers between different nations and cultures.

A great deal is already happening to promote school sport and increase participation. I pay tribute to school sport co-ordinators, link teachers, coaches, volunteers and others who are working hard to see this strategy through. We are on track to meet our targets, but I absolutely accept points made in interventions that many of those targets are minimums; we want to go beyond them. I believe that we can go beyond them and, in doing so, that we are on track to transform physical education and sport and place it at the heart of what schools do. By increasing participation in school sport, we shall enhance children's health, raise educational standards and better prepare young people for adult life, laying sound foundations to encourage their lifelong participation in sport. That is a set of objectives that Members in all parts of the House can support.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): May I say what an enormous pleasure it is that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are in the Chair? You are well known as a school sportsman of some distinction, as was your son, I believe, so it is a particular pleasure that you are in the Chair today.

It is also an enormous personal pleasure for me to speak in this debate on school sport not only because it is such an important and worthwhile subject but because I know that I gained an enormous amount personally from playing sport at school. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that my experience of playing sport at school shaped much of the rest of my life.

During my two years in the Whips Office before taking on this job, I attended, I am sad to say, a considerable number of debates on Thursdays on a one-line Whip. Despite the unappealing timetable, they were often excellent debates, precisely because the hon. Members who contributed cared deeply about the subject and often had personal expertise to bring to bear. I have no doubt that this debate will be no exception and that we will hear a number of interesting and thought-provoking contributions.

My only regret is that my opposite number, the Minister for Sport and Tourism, is not here to listen to those excellent speeches. Of course, it is an enormous pleasure that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) is here, but a visible sign of commitment from my opposite number would have been welcome. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are the Tories?"] Quite a few of my hon. Friends are here.

I should like to remind the House of exactly why sport is so important to young people, and I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House can agree about that. Sport is good for young people because it gets them fit, which is good for their health. It teaches them about the benefits of exercise, so they are more likely to maintain a healthy lifestyle throughout their adult years—something that the Minister touched on. It teaches them about leadership, commitment, teamwork, success, and of course, occasionally, failure. It keeps them occupied and channels their energies towards worthwhile and rewarding activities. It may well provide future career opportunities and, probably most importantly, it is fun.

Before I address the main issues that affect sport in school, it is important to emphasise that not all young people play all their sport at school. Sadly, some traditional school sports have virtually died out in some state schools, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said; cricket and rugby are two excellent examples, as anyone who reads the trade press on those sports will know. There are also several sports where the necessary coaching expertise can be found only in clubs. For example, I was struck by a recent article in the Sunday papers about Kelly Holmes, because it was immediately obvious that the majority of her early athletics training had come, quite properly, from her local athletics club. It is vital, therefore, that the House recognise the crucial role that clubs play in encouraging young people to play sport and that the link between clubs and schools should be strengthened. I hope that the Minister will address that in his closing remarks.

There is a consensus that sport is good for young people and needs to be encouraged and promoted, and the Government certainly recognise that, as I would be the first to admit. Their 2001 manifesto stated:

> "We pledge a sport entitlement for all children, giving them access to at least two hours a week of sport in or after school."

The Department for Culture, Media and Sport was given a new public service agreement target in the spending review—shared with the Minister's Department—to increase the proportion of schoolchildren who spend a minimum of two hours a week on high-quality PE and school sport to 85 per cent. by 2008, and to ensure that at least 75 per cent. of schoolchildren are in a school sport partnership by the same year.

On 4 March this year, DCMS published to statistics on the take-up of PE in schools that have been part of the school sports partnership for three years. The results come from a sample of 1,807 schools that were surveyed, of which 74 per cent. replied. I thought that that survey found that 68 per cent.—the Minister said 62 per cent.—

of pupils in schools that have been in such a partnership for three years are spending at least two hours each week on high-quality PE and school sport. Let us all admit that that is greatly to be welcomed. However, even after three years of being in a schools partnership, it sounds as though 38 per cent.—I thought that the figure was 32 per cent.—of pupils are not doing so.

Mr. Stephen Twigg: We are both right. The hon. Gentleman quotes a figure that relates to those schools that have been in the partnership for the full three years. The 62 per cent. figure includes schools that have come into the partnership in the second and third year of the programme.

Hugh Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister for clearing that up, not least because his figures suit my argument better than mine do. That means that 38 per cent. of pupils—one in three—are not spending two hours a week on sport, and I am sure that we would all agree that that is far too many.

Furthermore, 26 per cent. of schools did not reply to the survey, so it is probably safe to assume that they are not meeting the target. A number of schools have not been part of the school sport partnership for three years, so are not eligible to be included in the figures in the first place. If we break those ~~figures down~~, we see that that leaves 68 per cent.—or perhaps 62 per cent.—of the 74 per cent. that replied, as opposed to a target of 75 per cent. by 2008. We would all agree that there is much left to do.

Several hon. Members have already asked why a mere two hours a week should be the holy grail. I am always nervous, particularly in the company of one or two of my hon. Friends who are here today, of drawing lessons from Europe, but France, for example, specifies three hours. That is an example from the continent to which we could safely aspire—and if we are to do so, funding is the key.

The national lottery, which will soon celebrate its 10th birthday, and of which my party can rightly be proud, is a welcome source of funding for sport. Many Members on both sides of the House will have facilities in their constituencies that have been improved since 1994 with the help of lottery funding. Four years ago, in his keynote speech to the Labour party conference, the Prime Minister said:

> "Today we set out plans to invest £750 million of lottery money in schools and community sport as part of a £1 billion investment over three years".

However, last January, more than three years after that speech, we discovered that only £8.5 million of that £750 million had been spent. There cannot be one MP in the House who regards that as satisfactory.

Andy Burnham: I was at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport when that policy was developed, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman that my constituency, which previously had no floodlit Astroturf pitches, now has two, at Bedford high school and Westleigh high school, and there are two more to come under that policy. It takes time to put such facilities in place, but they are now coming through, and they are very welcome.

Hugh Robertson: I am delighted to hear it, but by the same token, the hon. Gentleman will admit that £8.5 million out of £750 million—

Andy Burnham: More than that.

Hugh Robertson: That was the figure to which a DCMS Minister admitted one Question Time, when we had an exchange on the subject, so clearly he could not produce better figures. Perhaps we could clear the matter up by asking the Minister to confirm how much of that lottery money has been spent, and what plans his Department has to improve the situation.

I want to mention three further factors, the first of which is school playing fields, which the Minister has already touched on. I have no wish to enter into what could only be described as a sterile party political debate on school playing fields. I am well aware that Labour Members will criticise the Conservative Government for starting the sales—although I have never seen any great statistical evidence to back that accusation up. We will inevitably respond by pointing out that the Government have been in power for seven years, and have had ample time to honour their commitments. However, I am sure that we would all agree that the record is, at best, mixed.

On 4 March the DCMS published statistics on the applications for developments on playing fields relating to applications made between April 2002 and March 2003. There were 1,297 applications relating to playing fields, and 807—62 per cent.—were approved. The remainder were either rejected or are yet to be decided. Of the 807 approved applications, in only 212—26 per cent.—did the redevelopment provide new or improved sporting facilities. Nineteen per cent. of the applications related to changing rooms, access or floodlights—although I would be the first to agree that floodlights allow people to play sport for longer. Thirteen per cent. of the applications were simply like-for-like replacements. Those figures, as the Minister has been big enough to admit, give cause for concern. The fact that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills felt compelled to announce last August that new regulations are to be introduced is a sure sign that things are not going well. That announcement is welcome and I pay tribute to him for making it. However, we must wait and see its effect before we pass judgment.

John Mann: The hon. Gentleman's comments have been commendably precise and I am sure that he will want to give a commendably precise answer to my intervention. What advice would he give the leader of Bassetlaw council, whom I am meeting on Monday? In the past few weeks, he has received £2 million from the sell-off of playing fields that schools use. Should all that money be spent on sporting facilities, or should it go into subsidising the general council budget?

Hugh Robertson: The hon. Gentleman tempts me. Since he has listened to the introduction to my speech, I suspect that he knows where my sympathies lie. However, given that I know nothing about Bassetlaw, the council budget or the facts behind the case, it would be unfair to get off the fence.

In his winding-up speech, will the Under-Secretary confirm the Government's intention about the sale of school playing fields, and especially deal with the concerns of several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), who believe that the new regulations will not protect smaller school playing fields? The hon. Lady has appeared in the press about the matter a lot recently.

My second point is the time available to teachers to coach or supervise sport. Once a school has a playing field, the next obvious requirement is for a teacher with the time and expertise to coach the pupils. There is no doubt that many teachers throughout the country give up a great deal of time to coach school sport. All of us would wish to pay tribute to them. However, many people—I have met them in my constituency on several occasions—feel so weighed down by the burden of bureaucracy that they are unable to free up more of their time to coach school sport. In a recent poll, 92 per cent. of teachers believed that the amount of red tape that they faced reduced the time available for preparing lessons. If that applies to academic work, it is easy to appreciate its detrimental effect on school sport. The Under-Secretary has expertise in the subject and I hope that he can tell hon. Members about his proposals for reducing teacher bureaucracy to free up more time for teachers to coach school sport.

Mr. Cash: Let me take my hon. Friend a little further. Should not the people who are prepared to acquire the necessary skills to teach cricket, rugger and tennis be paid a bonus? One cannot expect people to act entirely out of love; they need an additional incentive. Does my hon. Friend agree with that as a matter of principle?

Hugh Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. I suspect that the time when people did such things purely out of public spirit has passed. We need concrete proposals and firm incentives.

Mr. Truswell: We are listening to the hon. Gentleman's pious comments, but did not the Government that his party formed create the backlash from teachers in the dispute about teacher contracts? Did not choking off revenue and capital and alienating teachers help to dig the grave for school sports? The Government are trying to get us out of that predicament.

Hugh Robertson: I said a moment ago that I believed that there was little point in a sterile party political debate because the obvious answer to the intervention is that the Labour Government have been in power for seven years—nearly two terms. Ten and 11-year-olds who currently play school sport will have never known this country governed by anything other than a Labour Government. The Government have had ample time to put the matter right.

My third point is about the compensation culture. A plethora of rules and regulations governs almost every aspect of every game. It is regrettable that parents are all too quick to sue if something goes wrong. I shall give two recent examples. First, the regulations that came into effect on 1 May this year that prevent an adult from taking more than two children into public swimming baths—

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Hugh Robertson: I knew that the hon. Gentleman would want to intervene at that point.

Mr. Reed: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Only today, I received a letter on this matter from the Institute of Sport and Recreation Management, which is based in my constituency. I have raised the issue with my local authority, as I have two young children, and we are often unable to take them to the local swimming pool. I have received reassurances that the guidelines are very old, and that there is flexibility within them. I have arranged a meeting with the institute to see whether it can reissue the guidelines to remove this ridiculous anomaly, which makes it very difficult for families to take young children swimming if only one parent is available.

Hugh Robertson: The hon. Gentleman and I discussed this issue in the Lobby some weeks ago, and I am delighted to hear what he says. He will also be aware that we raised it at Department for Culture, Media and Sport questions three weeks ago, and that I have written to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills about it. The Minister was extremely helpful and promised that he would take the matter up, which I imagine will help us to get a response.

A further example of a ridiculous situation involved a cricket match between two teams of 12-year-olds that took place this summer. Every 12-year-old who plays cricket nowadays has to wrap himself up in a helmet, despite the fact that hardly any 12-year-olds have the physical strength to bounce a ball head-high in a game of cricket. As a result, six of the players on one side were run out when the player at the far end could not hear the call because he was wearing a helmet. I cannot believe that that is in any way defensible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) recently introduced a private Member's Bill offering protection to teachers who take children away for adventure training. That idea has now been adopted by my party in the form of a teacher protection Bill that would give teachers protection from prosecution unless there was an unambiguous case of clear negligence. I hope that the Government will look at that issue.

I would like to pay tribute once again to all those who do so much to encourage sport in schools. It would, however, be wrong to conclude that everything in the garden is rosy. I hope that the Minister will be able to address the five points that I have raised. First, will the Government introduce proposals to strengthen and encourage the key link between clubs and schools? Secondly, will the remaining £741.5 million—or whatever the figure is—of lottery money allocated for school sport be rapidly distributed? It really is a sad state of affairs that only £8.5 million has been distributed thus far. Thirdly, will the Minister address the question of school playing fields, and particularly the concerns of the hon. Member for Vauxhall? Fourthly, will he outline the concrete steps that the Government are going to take to cut teacher bureaucracy and free up more teacher time for sport? Fifthly, will he address the question of legal protection?

School sport is almost universally a good thing. We would all agree on that. It is vital for us, as politicians—whichever side of the House we are on—to create the conditions in which it can flourish.

4.32 pm

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): It has already been noted that this is a crucial debate, and I do not intend to reiterate why sport is a good thing. The fact that it is carries the consensus of the whole House. It worries me, however, that levels of physical activity in Yorkshire and the Humber are, at 30.4 per cent., lower than the national average, and that only 28.3 per cent. of our region's adults take enough physical activity to benefit their health.

The other crucial statistic that concerns me is the investment per person in sport. In this country, it is £21; in Germany, it is £30; in Australia, it is £51; in Canada, it is £76; and in France, £112. We have a long way to go. I do not want to engage in a party-political knockabout on this issue, but we have heard nothing from the Opposition about what exactly they would do in terms of investing in sport. The Government's PE, school sport and club links programme, and the accompanying £454 million, represent a brilliant start to addressing this challenge. What is most daunting, however, is the fact that so many different strands have to come together to haul school sport out of the doldrums into which it has fallen over many years.

Two specialist sports colleges serve all the schools in my constituency: St. Mary's comprehensive school, Menston, and Priesthorpe high school in Pudsey. They are highly valued for the way in which they are cascading their expertise and support to more than 70 primary schools and 10 high schools. They deserve credit, but this Government also deserve credit for having set them up.

There are many positives to report and I shall sprint through some of the headlines from the monitoring report:

> "Much improved quality of teaching and learning in PE, which are reflected in PE department results . . . huge expansion of activities provided for students out of school hours . . . large increases in uptake of exam courses, leadership courses, and post 16 sport related qualifications . . . massive improvement in partnership working between schools—both primary and secondary—and a willingness to share expertise . . . and greater and more positive links with local sports clubs—improved training for volunteers has led to better quality of provision within the clubs for young people."

Unfortunately, as with everything in life, there are also negatives. These include poor facilities, especially outdoors, and lack of access to other facilities. As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) said, we need to ensure that the resources that are available are effectively targeted in support of specialist colleges and school sport partnerships.

It is significant that very few of the high schools in my constituency—I am sure that it is also true of many others—have decent cricket pitches. The best school facilities, not to mention coaching, are invariably found in the private sector. It cannot be a coincidence that private schools are disproportionately visible at representative level in sports such as cricket.

Hugh Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. A perfect illustration of that came a month or so ago when I turned out for the Lords and Commons cricket side against a Hackney community college side, a smashing institution that was set up to try to encourage young people to play sport and obtain a formal qualification. The problem is that there is not a single local authority cricket pitch on which they can play in the London borough of Hackney.

Mr. Truswell: Given the time available, I should not allow myself to be diverted on to that issue, but the historical problem was the choking off of resources, especially capital resources, in the 1980s and the early 1990s. That made it very difficult for schools to maintain cricket pitches. The school that I attended—it feels like it was 101 years ago—no longer has a cricket pitch. It has been subsumed into the general parkland across the road from the school. Therefore, to some extent, there is a party political response to the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

I mentioned links with local health bodies to my hon. Friend the Minister, and I am pleased that he has agreed to take them up. Other problems include transport, especially for people with disabilities. The sports colleges in my area are trying to get people with disabilities more involved in their activities.

At least one of the colleges is experiencing a shortage of PE staff to cover all the posts that need filling because of the introduction of the liberating concept of sports colleges. I hope that we are moving away from the old Woody Allen observation, based on the wisdom of George Bernard Shaw, that "Those who can, do; those who can't, teach; and those who can't teach, teach gym." Perhaps the specialist colleges and sports partnerships are already sowing the seeds necessary to address that problem, with all the young people who are taking GCSEs, A-levels and other sport leadership initiatives.

The Central Council of Physical Recreation has campaigned vigorously to secure two hours of quality PE time in the curriculum. Specialist colleges are beginning to deliver that provision, but teachers can provide safe, high quality PE only if they are appropriately trained. I would welcome the view of my hon. Friend the Minister on the CCPR recommendation that a minimum of 30 hours should be devoted to PE in the initial teacher training for primary school teachers.

The National Council for School Sport recognises the need for school sport and national governing bodies to align their approaches, which in my experience does not always happen. We need coaches to go into schools, but we also need to accept that teachers are in schools, day in and day out, and they are crucial to the development of sport in their schools.

The NCSS stressed the need to support and acknowledge the volunteers who run major national sports events. I give just one example: the London Schools Cricket Association, which organises four or five week-long cricket festivals for county teams, including girls, at Ampleforth college in North Yorkshire. I was fortunate enough to be able to attend two of those weeks during the summer. The fact that London should go to Yorkshire to stage such an event is refreshing.

I agree with the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent that there is a definite role for coaches in schools where the school does not have the necessary expertise. I know from the experience of my sons and their peers, who are keen and accomplished cricketers, what coaches can do in enthusing and in developing skills and thus enjoyment. They can point players towards clubs and engage parents.

My great sporting love is cricket—that great male bastion. Indeed, it is so much of a bastion that even many males find it difficult to break in, so it was uplifting when visiting a local primary school to find a cricket coach in attendance and even better to find that the coach was a woman. In later months, I was delighted when she raised an all-girl under-13 team that acquitted itself well in the Airedale and Wharfedale league, beating several all-male teams. Women in cricket and so many other sports are not there simply to make the tea, drive the transport or wash the kit; they have a valid role to play, which that team demonstrates locally.

An important point, made forcefully by the Women's Sport Foundation, is that there is consistent evidence that the conventional school sports system too often fails girls. We know from figures produced by Sport England two years ago that girls as young as seven begin to show negative attitudes to sport. From research undertaken by the Youth Sport Trust, we learn that 40 per cent. of young women have dropped out of physical activity by the age of 18. Research published by the University of Bath last week stated that 79 per cent. of girls want to be fitter, compared with 68 per cent. of boys, and that 49 per cent. of girls do not feel comfortable exercising in front of other people.

That is why I support the foundation in its request for key measurements, with an evaluation of PESSCL programmes to be broken down on a gender basis and I would welcome the Minister's view on that. The future targets for PESSCL also remain generic. There is no specific reference to the need for girls to be given the chance to catch up with boys in sport.

I also welcome the Government's gifted and talented programme. I accept that a line must be drawn between targeting talent and ensuring that resources are targeted on promoting involvement and activity for all. Indeed, those who will never aspire to the greatest heights are probably more important to sport than the stars. They are the club players, the volunteer organisers, the coaches, the parents and the fans of tomorrow, without whom sport will die.

I have an interest to declare. My 12-year-old youngest son returned from Denmark on Monday after representing England at badminton. He also plays cricket for Yorkshire schools and has been chosen for the north of England squad. Incidentally, he has been wearing a helmet since the age of 6.

Andy Burnham: Has he been run out?

Mr. Truswell: Many times, but youngsters are run out not because they wear helmets but because they cannot gauge a run. That is well known in cricket circles. That is why I think the example given earlier was farcical.

For the present, my son is obviously gifted and talented, although such things are often transient in young people. Even with hindsight, how he progressed from where he was four years ago, when he was simply whacking a shuttlecock as hard as he could at his decrepit old dad, to becoming an England player is almost impossible to explain. There was certainly no clear route. We learned as we went along and made many mistakes. I hope that such routes will be better signposted under the Government strategy to which my hon. Friend the Minister alluded.

Truswell minor is an expensive and exhausting individual to run, although my hard-pressed wife, on whose shoulders most of the burdens fall, and I are not personally looking for any support—financial or otherwise. But what happens to all those young people who do not have parents who are supportive in general or are specific sport enthusiasts, or who do not have the resources to fund their children's sport?

There must be a worry about the possible clash between school and sport—not sport in school. Michael Truswell might be an outstanding sportsman at the moment, but he is no academic leviathan. Such a situation must be a worry to many parents of gifted and talented children. I know of schools in my constituency that have gone the extra mile to support talented youngsters. One school has a young woman whose international prowess demands that she train far from home during the week. It has provided her with a customised GCSE timetable, with a senior teacher acting as her mentor, so that her schoolwork does not suffer. Youngsters at other schools must take a day off a week for football or half a day for tennis and they are receiving similar support. I suspect that such good practice is the exception rather than norm, but I hope that it will become the norm as the Government roll out their gifted and talented strategy.

I shall cite an example of the benefits of not taking too idealistic a view of school playing fields. Crawshaw high school in my constituency spent years trying to persuade the local authority to sell a small section of its playing fields that was virtually unusable because of its slope. It succeeded at long last and used the money raised to install drainage to waterlogged rugby pitches, to pay for a floodlit all-weather pitch and to help to fund its new Sir Leonard Hutton sports centre, which has been named after one of Pudsey's greatest sons who attended school on that site 80 years ago. There are advantages to taking the constructive approach on school playing fields that the Minister suggested.

I realise that I have already taken up far too much of the House's time by scratching the surface of some of the challenges that we face, but I know that the Government are making a real and genuine effort to address them to a greater extent than their predecessors.

4.46 pm

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I realise that the clock is against us. The allocation of little more than two hours to debate such an important subject indicates that those who set the rules of the House do not regard the matter as highly as those of us who are in the Chamber. I suggest that the Minister discuss with his colleagues whether we should have more time for such a debate. Although there are differences among us on emphasis and issues around the edges, there is clearly more that unites us. I urge him to continue with the consensual approach that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) also adopted.

School sport is a great idea, but not everyone agrees with that. Hon. Members in the Chamber agree with the Minister that sport should be at the heart of what schools do, but I suspect that the mandarins at the Department for Education and Skills and those at Nos. 10 and 11 Downing street do not share that view, because I have seen no evidence that sport is at the heart of what schools do. I was grateful to the Minister for his response to my intervention, because the evidence shows that schools that promote sport, physical exercise and health have better academic achievements than those that do not promote a healthy lifestyle. One of the problems of recent years has been an emphasis on academic achievement and school league tables to such an extent that head teachers and the educational establishment in general has felt that sport and music must be excluded or pushed to the sidelines so that schools can concentrate on academic subjects. However, a sporting environment promotes both greater academic achievement and young people's enjoyment. I sometimes get the impression that young people are not supposed to enjoy life, so we must get away from that.

Not all people want to engage in competitive sports, so we must cast the net more widely and loosely. "Sport for all" was a great slogan, but it might have discouraged those who did not think that they were good at sport and thus considered that it was not for them. Our aim should be participation regardless of ability. I would hope that that would create a broad-based pyramid that would lead to different degrees of attainment ranging from beginners and those who simply want to engage in sport for fun through to elite performers.

Obesity could be good news for sport. Thanks to the Health Committee's report on obesity, the ticking time bomb of a looming health crisis provides sport with a chance to get its rightful place on the political agenda. Schools must use the report as a means to do that, and the Department for Education and Skills must take the lead. Hitherto, successive Governments have seemingly only shown an interest in sport to bask in the glory of an international sporting triumph.

Sport is a neglected activity and has been for years, locally and nationally. Sport provision has been the Cinderella and one of the first things to face cuts. The educational establishment has failed sport. Different figures have been given, but however we look at it, a large number of the nation's children do not get the minimum two hours' physical recreation a week that they should. I am concerned that the Minister repeated the Government line that the two hours should be within and beyond the curriculum. For many parts of the country, anything beyond the normal school day is not an option. School buses do not hang around. Public transport does not exist. Safe cycle routes do not apply. So the two hours must be the minimum within the school curriculum. Anything beyond that is a bonus, but unless we get those two hours in the curriculum, everything else we talk about cannot come to pass for a vast number of children.

I recognise that many other hon. Members wish to participate in the debate. The subject is not party political in the broadest sense. I finish by urging the Minister to go back to his business managers to get longer and more frequent debates. If sport is at the heart of what schools do, we must prove it. The only way to do that is to have more discussions, more debates and more conclusions. The Government must get going on all the good things that they say they want to do, so that after seven years we see more fruit than we have hitherto.

4.52 pm

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): I agree that the subject is not party political. It is about lifestyle and is beyond politics. I have always taken part in competitive sport and still do. I love competitive sport, but my comments do not relate entirely to it; they relate also to non-competitive sport. I could talk about competitive sport all day and there are excellent examples in my constituency of local sports clubs playing an important role. Such clubs are essential if there is to be a link between the community and the schools.

Role models are important. It is crucial in my constituency that Newcastle United has provided community teaching and sports facilities on a wide scale since 1997. In fact, my son is a beneficiary of that. Newcastle Falcons rugby club does the same thing. It has extended contact to 30,000 young people in recent years, which is an excellent example. My local amateur cricket club—Benwell cricket club—has an excellent winter coaching scheme with youngsters in Walbottle school. I am sure that colleagues have similar examples. Such initiatives are important. I support them and want to see more of them, but although I want people to benefit from competitive sport, not everyone is prepared to take part in it.

I do not know whether hon. Members remember the film "Kes". Perhaps I am one of the few old enough to do so. The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) will certainly remember it. I always recall the scene in which the gym teacher is playing football with the two sets of kids. He thinks he is Bobby Charlton and scores a goal. "Charlton 1" flashes up on the film. Meanwhile, the little boy—he is fascinated by falcons but has been forced to play competitive sport—is swinging from the goalpost without any interest at all in the proceedings. That sums up many people's reaction to competitive sport. I very much support the need to achieve our fitness goals. I do not believe in preaching, but I am annoyed when I see youngsters in my constituency with a sedentary lifestyle. They eat the wrong food and hang about with nothing to do for much of the time. Some of them probably smoke cigarettes and others probably get involved in worse things. After all the development and growth that we have experienced in this country, I am annoyed that we still have those problems. "Everyday Sport" is a campaign set up by Sport England in co-operation with the Department of Health, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Skills with the aim of trying to improve the fitness of the whole community in different ways. If it is to meet its targets it must reach young people—if we do not get people to do sport when they are young we will not get them to do it when they are older. Some individuals may change their ways when they are older, but it is better to get people to adopt a healthy lifestyle in their teens, as at least some of them will maintain it.

It is crucial that such a programme be linked to school activity. The Department of Health wants to introduce "Everyday Sport" activities, the school system thinks that they are a good thing and the local authority thinks they are wonderful for the area, but finding someone to organise them is a big problem. The Government are doing excellent work, but there is more to do, as I am sure the Minister recognises. Although the campaign is backed by the Department of Health, I urge him to accept that implementing it for young people should be the responsibility of his Department. The only facilities in most communities, apart from some community centres, are in schools, and, as has been said for a long time, we must use them outside school hours. Someone, however, must take charge of the programme, which is not cheap, even though the nation would save on health spending by investing in it. If 75 young people take part in sport between 4 and 6 pm a professional coach will be needed, although a teacher may be prepared to help out, along with four or five other people, who will be needed to police activities.

Teachers' duties were different when I was at school, when the geography teacher took me for cricket and the maths teacher took me for football. That does not happen in state schools to such an extent today, and someone needs to be responsible for the fitness regime after school, in the holidays and so on. The Government have proposed paying someone for two hours extra a week so that they can contribute to the scheme, but I think that that is inadequate. We should go right to the top—a deputy head teacher should be charged with the responsibility of administering the scheme, working with the local offices of the Department of Health, the council, the principal gym teacher in the school and others to try and co-ordinate activities. We are not necessarily looking for someone with a background in sport, although we need someone who is sympathetic to the aims of the scheme. It is an administrator's job. I do not usually like to call for administrators, but in this case we need one, and the job requires someone with the status of a deputy head teacher. Their contract should not be a traditional one, but should reflect the need to cover holidays and after-school activities. I could say much more about this subject, about which I am passionate, but many colleagues wish to take part in our debate, so I thank the House for listening and hope that the Minister is prepared at least to look at that suggestion.

4.59 pm

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I begin by apologising to the Minister for unintentionally missing the beginning of his speech. Despite that, I hope that he will join me in congratulating two schools in my constituency. Coopers' Company and Coborn school achieved specialist sports college status about two years ago and Emerson Park school achieved it more recently—the London borough of Havering has a good reputation for school sport.

I worked in a special school for many years, where one of my responsibilities was running a riding for the disabled group. Some of the children were heavily disabled wheelchair users and others had invisible disabilities such as diabetes and epilepsy, but they all participated in the riding for the disabled group. The freedom that comes from being mounted on and controlling a horse is unimaginable for children who are unable to walk in other circumstances. That non-competitive sporting activity was extremely worthwhile.

I also took the children swimming. Once children who are unable to walk are in the water, they experience freedom and can exercise in a way that would otherwise be impossible. Once a year, I used to organise an inter-special schools swimming gala for about eight London boroughs. The gala was competitive, and I used to announce the children's names and the lane in which they were swimming. After each race, the children would come up to the table and ask, "Which school won? What was my time? How did we do? How many points has my school achieved?"

After many years, somebody decided that competitive sport was not good for those children, and a non-competitive annual gala was introduced. The first year was such an anti-climax: I announced the children's names and their lanes, and they gave their all to get from one end of the pool to the other—children who cannot walk swim surprisingly quickly because their upper-body strength is high—but it was pointless to reach the other end first. The children came to the table and asked, "Who won? Did I win? How many points does my school have?" The event fell flat, and the children did not get half as much enjoyment from the non-competitive gala as they did from the competitive gala. The gala continued to be held in a non-competitive spirit for a time, but interest waned.

Sport is not only a question of getting fit or being part of a team. One of the most important lessons in life is learning to win and lose with good grace, and school sport is the most important vehicle for teaching children that essential life skill.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): If there were time, I would talk at some length, which I will not do, about competitive sports. Suffice it to say, last week a highly competitive riding and angling competition occurred between a Labour Member and a Conservative Member. The House will be delighted to know that the Labour Member won the angling competition by a significant amount, and the Conservative Member, who will remain nameless and who called for a steward's inquiry after an unexpected swerve to the left by my horse, had to concede defeat in the racing too.

I want to raise the issue of facilities, including school playing fields. These days, one cannot play competitive sport in the streets and back alleys, which we all did, because the speed of motor cars and constituents' expectations precludes such activities. The Government rightly say that they will not sell off playing fields, and a recent press release states:

> "the sale of a playing field is an absolute last resort with local authorities having to demonstrate that they have exhausted all other sources of funding for the required school sports facilities".

Nottinghamshire, which is one of the largest local authorities in the country, recently received £126 million-worth of DFES private finance initiative credits to rebuild secondary schools in the county, specifically in and around my constituency. That is the largest investment in secondary schools in any one district or constituency, and I fought tooth and nail for it. I would trust that the same Government and the same Department would not look kindly on an amalgam of local authorities that subsequently announced that it has a funding gap in building the new schools, because if that were the case they would presumably have put in a different PFI bid. Even more strangely, the funding gap emerged despite the fact that on the site in contention two schools have merged into one, so the amount of capital required is less than it would have been.

As a big supporter of the PFI schools programme, I think that the bid was well constructed but highlights several anomalies. In a speech on 27 August, the Secretary of State talked about land surplus to the needs of other local schools and the community. Who defines the "other local schools" that might use playing field facilities? More interestingly, who defines "the community"? Who is to determine the community demand for sports fields? Will it be the local authority that wishes to sell off the school fields? I invite the Minister to meet "the community" before taking a decision that will be referred to him because of objections made by me, by the vast majority of local people and by Sport England to the selling off of playing fields at Portland school in order to fill a funding gap that has arisen not at that school but somewhere else in the local authority's budget.

Before my hon. Friend makes that decision, I invite him to meet the Manton Spitfires boys' and girls' football teams, to whom I will present new kit at 11 o'clock on Saturday morning. Unfortunately, the many new community youth football teams organised by volunteers from the Manton Spitfires do not have fields on which to play. He could then go and meet the Blyth Bombers, a long-established set of youth teams who have just lost their field for playing community football, and the Worksop Town football club juniors, who comprise nine different teams that are soon to be expanded to 18. Again, they do not have fields on which to play football. I suspect that local authority submissions suggesting that they need to sell off said playing fields do not take any account of that demand, because the community view has somehow been lost.

Adjoining those playing fields are three primary schools: Holy Family, a Catholic school that would like to use the facilities; the Priory Church of England school, which has never had grass fields in its history; and Ryton Park, the school that produced Danny Thomas, an England footballer, despite the fact that it is a purely Tarmac-based old redbrick school without a sports field. Are their views to be taken into consideration, given that they are not contained in any LEA documents?

There is a further anomaly. Rather unfairly, I questioned the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) about the situation at yet another school with a PFI bid, where playing fields have been sold off for £2 million. In this case, the decision does not go to the Minister. The fields belong to the district council, not the local education authority, so it is allowed to sell them off although they have been there for as long as houses have been there. Will it spend the £2 million on sports facilities? Well, it gave no indication of that, although a small amount will be spent on them. I understand that it proposes to contribute to the establishment of a private gym opposite the fields that are to go for ever and be replaced by buildings, but why is there this anomaly whereby a local authority but non-LEA school sports field can be sold off? How can it get away with that?

I shall wind up my speech after making a final point, rather than taking up any more of the House's time. We look for leadership. Last night, I was with a constituent of the Minister's and we discussed leadership among those on the Government Front Bench. We agreed that the Minister is a particularly strong and bold leader, and I shall be looking for such leadership in his decisions.

In considering the application I have described or any other comparable application, will the Minister simply accept the science thrown at him by a £500 million-worth LEA—which can put forward every fact and figure it can construe without bothering to consult any primary schools or community sports organisations and without raising the issue of current use—that wants to sell off playing fields, pocket the money and put it in its budget?

If an LEA needs money for buildings, it should provide it by having the guts to go to the people to demand more out of taxation or by going to the Government to demand more. It should not, through nefarious means, try to sideline playing fields that are desperately needed by schoolchildren and the community. In Nottinghamshire in particular, I hope that the Minister will address joint use between district and county council—the ruse that has been used repeatedly to sell off playing fields by giving promises that one side will do this and the other will do that.

In this specific example, neither side will fund new facilities such as replacement swimming pools, so we lose a swimming pool. Neither will fund replacement athletics tracks, so we lose an athletics track. We lose not only the playing fields, but other sporting facilities, all in the name of progress. I hope the Minister considers this application very closely when it is put before him and backs Government policy of putting playing fields and schoolchildren first.

5.12 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Other Members want to speak so I shall be brief and move rapidly to the point. I believe that sport is a fundamental ingredient of education. Recently, however, successive generations in both political parties have failed to recognise that, so I very much welcome the debate.

The question is, does the sportsman or the person who can excel in sports acquire his sense of achievement and his sense of competition, which is essential to most sports, from his character or from the sport? I think the two interact. It is apparent that people such as Don Bradman or some of the great West Indian cricketers lived in extremely deprived circumstances but became brilliant merely because they wanted to excel. They did that without any facilities or resources to speak of, yet I could not for a moment imagine that it is not essential to try to provide the best-quality sporting facilities in schools if it is possible to do so.

A point has been made about private schools. On the whole, they have extremely good facilities. It is utterly disgraceful that state schools have found themselves selling off playing fields. Indeed, the Staffordshire Playing Fields Association is still concerned about the extent to which school playing fields have been sold off. It is a disgrace. However, without incentives for teachers, it is not practical to imagine that the quality of sport that is required to give satisfaction and fulfilment to those children will be achieved. Those children must be taught by people who are sufficiently skilled to enable them to do well.

I have clubs in my constituency that work with schools, including Eccleshall cricket and rugby clubs, Cheadle cricket club and Blythe Bridge. There are so many of them. One of the reasons why Staffordshire was top of the minor counties cricket league for so long was the interaction between Stone cricket club and local children as they grew up and got into clubs.

There is an interaction between the human spirit and the facilities that are available in a school to generate that competitiveness and a desire to excel. The latter is an essential ingredient and is as important as intellectual achievement. Of course, there are some who manage both—I think of Mike Brearley, who got a double first and a double blue. In a slightly different context, my son played cricket for the Middlesex second XI when he was 16. I heard what the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) said. Look at Richard Hutton and Len Hutton. It is a fact that, in a competitive environment, people can take enormous steps.

In relation to swimming, life-saving is also an important skill that needs to be cultivated and on which training needs to be provided. Sport gives confidence and builds self-esteem. Those who are not intellectually gifted must be given the opportunity to excel. That is of fundamental importance to the nature of our education. I have already mentioned the excellence of Christ Church middle school's performance in getting to Headingley earlier this year.

For me, sport has always been fundamental. In fact, at Oxford, I read cricket and history in that order. I was fortunate to have the opportunity to do that and I know that that combination has had an enormous effect on my life, not least on my sense of competition, which is visible in some of my political activities, particularly on the European front. I do not understand how it is possible to be beaten.

Andy Burnham: One question intrigues me. When the Ryder cup is on, whom does the hon. Gentleman support?

Mr. Cash: Jointly and severally.

There is an element of adventure and risk in sport that needs to be cultivated. This is about human nature, the soul, the way in which people interact with their fellow beings. It is so important. I do not believe that two hours a week is anything like enough. In the 1980s, during my first years in Parliament, I tabled an amendment to the Education Bill calling for the compulsory provision of sport, in consultation with the Central Council of Physical Recreation. There was a lot of correspondence in The Times about it afterwards.

For the reasons that I have given about the interaction between sport and human nature and the importance of giving people opportunity, sport should be a compulsory provision at school. That is not to say that every person should be driven to do whatever is prescribed but schools must have the necessary facilities. Furthermore, they must have the staff who can teach. If the money has to be found, find it. For the nation, as well as for schools, it is as important that pupils should be able to participate in sport and do well as it is for them to achieve intellectually.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) on taking up his position. In case the House thinks that peace has broken out, let me explain that our constituencies are coterminous and we often work together.

Hon. Members have mentioned the Women's Sports Foundation. I am proud to say that I was its founder in 1985, but after the first three meetings I was asked to leave as I was a man. It was an interesting time and I was inspired to do that by Billie Jean King and Donna Verona in America. I am pleased to see how well it is doing.

Before talking about school sport, one must talk about sport in society. The one weakness in the whole sport debate is that we do not have a think tank for sport. Every other Secretary of State has a think tank. We do not have a Royal Academy for sport. Nearly every other science—chemical, engineering—architecture, theatre and art has a royal body, but sport does not. In this House we can become a fellow for business, a fellow in charity, a policeman and an Army fellow, but we cannot become anything to do with sport. I am pleased to say that we will be announcing a change to that in the new year when we introduce a sports fellowship programme for MPs and peers. Sport is at a disadvantage because it is not in the core culture and it is certainly not in the core culture of politics.

Time is short, so I shall ask a series of questions. For 20 years, there was a debate inside the Foreign Office about the Department for International Development. Finally, in 1997, we brought it out. That Department now prospers, with a bigger budget than that of the Foreign Office. It is now time that we had our own sport and health education Department because until we have a Secretary of State for sport and health education covering sport education at school, sport in the wider community, the business of sport and the policing of sport, society will not give us the credibility that we need.

Yesterday, a report on BBC 3 and BBC 4 was published. The £148 million that has been spent on them would buy about 600 primary school swimming pools, yet no one is watching. Could we persuade Ofcom not to provide the three-hour new public sector service, but to create a broadband channel for sport education? We want from the BBC a 24-hour channel on sport education, sport psychology, sport science, sport motivation, sport history—everything to do with sport. That is what we want from a public sector broadcaster and tomorrow is not quick enough. It is appalling to see the lack of interest inside the BBC to service the public need for sport and sport education.

[Mr. Derek Wyatt]

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) has left the Chamber. Some premier league rugby and football clubs do the most astonishing work. I am a shareholder and season ticket holder at Charlton Athletic. We do more work than any other professional club in Britain with the disadvantaged, with women, with homework clubs and on race issues. We do not work just in Woolwich or Greenwich; our work extends all the way to the A2. We are starting in Dover and coming up to Sittingbourne.

People want to rub shoulders with the famous. We need a memorandum of understanding between the great football, rugby league, rugby union and cricket clubs and our county councils to create a sport charter mark that is second to none and covers the areas that I have mentioned. We have to grab sport out of schools. Kelly Holmes is one of Kent's heroes. What are we going to do with her? We should give her a hundred grand for a three-year contract to run round schools. We need a leadership campaign that takes gold, silver and bronze medallists around our schools as part of the scheme. They should form part of the memorandum of understanding and should focus on that.

We tell our children on their school report cards how bright they are. Could we not also tell them how physically advantaged or disadvantaged they are? Could the report cover step-ups and body fat, how fast the children are over 20 yards? Is there some way that we can tell parents, "The national average is this; your child is minus one. We must try to improve on that"? What about encouraging some sort of affinity card so that we can say, "Look, that gap gets you salsa dancing, quad biking or rifle shooting"? We need to provide incentives to get children back into the system, rather than just saying, "You're fat and awful and you do no exercise."

For 30 years we have been talking about opening up schools. It is time to stop just talking about it. Let us appoint an overall director of each school and separate head teachers for daytime and for after school, so that schools are not just open from 8 am to 6 pm. I want all my local secondary schools to open until 10, 11 or 12. In Washington DC, where floodlit basketball is the most successful school sport, it starts at 2 in the morning—and it does so in schools that used to close at 5 pm. We have to foster a different mentality about school buildings. The heads are holding things back; they will not let their school building go. Until we appoint a director, and a headmaster or headmistress for the daytime and someone else for the evening, nothing will change.

Groundsmen are essential. These days, cricket fields have all-weather wickets. That is because, sadly, we got rid of groundsmen and librarians: they were the two categories that fell off school staff. Can the the lottery or the Secretary of State be persuaded to bring back groundsman training in further education colleges? We have hairdressers and plumbers, but we have no groundsmen. We could sponsor something that would change overnight the quality of fields in our secondary schools, which are a disgrace, and which get closed down by health and safety people because they are unsafe. That cycle will go round and round unless we grab it and get the further education people to come round.

I could go on, but I shall make just two more points. This summer, my local police, Swale police, did something amazing. With their own funds they created an excess energy club for 150 of the poorest in the community, so that every day, at a cost of £3, they could do exactly what they liked to do—exciting, dangerous things. And guess what? Crime is down. But why should the police pay for that, and why did they have to rent the land off a farm? What the hell were the schools doing? We need these partnerships to ensure that the Home Office and schools do this together.

May I make a radical suggestion? Who knows whether we shall all be here in five years, but if we have this debate then, and if by that time we have not increased the activity of schoolchildren by more than 2 per cent. or 5 per cent., so that 25 per cent. are still not taking activity, why do we not take PE and games out of schools altogether? Why do we not set up pilots, giving the money to rugby, cricket and football clubs to teach schoolchildren? I bet we could get 95 per cent. participation by adopting that very different approach.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): It has been a fascinating debate. There is rarely a spirit of unity across the House, but for the first time since I have been in this place I have agreed with every word from the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), so it was certainly worth being here this afternoon.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) said, we are seeing a lot in the media about the problems of antisocial behaviour teenage obesity. We have a ready-made answer in sport, yet we seem not to exploit it to its full potential. It still has far too low a priority in politics and in public life.

Before we ask questions of schools, local authorities or anyone else, perhaps we should ask ourselves in this House whether we are doing enough for sport. I would argue that we are not. I checked up before the debate and found that 354 Members list sport of some kind among their interests in "Dod's". Why on earth is that interest not translating into making sport a hard-edged political priority that is backed by investment, with a proper structure underneath it to lever change? That has been done in France, Australia and New Zealand, but it seems to be beyond us.

We all know that sport is a unifying force like no other in our communities. Leigh Centurians rugby league club in my constituency won a hard-earned promotion to the super league on Sunday night. It will lift our town as nothing else can. It is a fantastic achievement, which will boost participation in our schools, yet we do not recognise the importance of sport enough in terms of funding.

Having worked in government as a sports adviser for a while, I would argue that a prejudice against sport runs through much of Whitehall. Sport is the poor relation in meetings at the Cabinet Office. Sport is not taken seriously, and that must change. We can change it here if we act together, across the House, when we agree—we do agree on many of these points—to give it greater priority. Let us have some statutory responsibilities to provide high-quality sports facilities. In the cultural sector, councils' only responsibility is to provide a full and comprehensive library service, whereas there should be clear responsibilities to provide good sporting facilities.

Unlike the arts, sport is seen within government as sufficiently wealthy and with enough volunteers to look after itself. That thinking partly allowed the demise of the sporting infrastructure in this country in the 1980s and '90s. Let us give credit where it is due: John Major introduced the national lottery, which has helped, but it is a drop in the ocean. We need far more investment if we are to make changes.

Some Opposition Members and those on the right in this country must accept the argument that sport needs investment, but we must accept that sport is about competition. Let us make no apology for the fact that sport encourages competitiveness. That is where its true value is realised; it is how young people learn vital life skills: teamwork; loyalty; discipline; the responsibility that comes with representing their schools and the loyalty that they feel when doing so; performing under pressure; and dealing with winning and losing. Scoring a match-winning penalty or holding a high catch at mid-off is one of the most life-affirming things that they can do at 12 or 13 that is legal, yet those on the liberal left can still be heard arguing against competitive school sport.

Peter Wilby, editor of the New Statesman, wrote in The Observer Sport Monthly:

> "Organised competitive sport is agony for many children: it can lead to humiliation and indignity."

Perhaps it does for some children—some children may not like it—but is that an argument for denying it to those who will thrive on it and seek to gain most from it? There is a generation of liberal thinkers in journalism, public life and education who allow their own painful memories of school sport to become a justification to deprive others of it. Many people love sport. As the Minister rightly said—he was spot on—it lifts the self-esteem and self-confidence of some young people who may struggle in the classroom. That is one of its real benefits. So we must confront those arguments head on. We cannot allow the corrosive notion to succeed that competitive sport is in any way controversial to run, and we must do something about that.

The Government have done a lot—we are definitely moving in the right direction—but I argue that the manifesto should take us a lot further and push sport right up the political agenda. I am afraid that the figures show, regretfully, that sport in this country is far too class based. At the Sydney Olympics, 80 per cent of our medallists went to private schools. Some analysis of the Athens games shows that 40 per cent. of the winners went to private schools. I have nothing against people from private schools, but it cannot be right that the talent of so many young people in our state schools is not coming through. We need to do much better by them. Loth as I am to say it, private schools have shamed some public sector schools in providing quality sporting opportunities.

In closing, I want to give the Minister a few ideas. What would I do if I had the opportunity and chance to sit where he is sitting? I would expand the entitlement and begin it at primary school, with the competitive, playing-to-win ethos at the very core. I would ensure that children not only have access to inter-school competitive fixtures in the main sports, but the right to receive qualified coaching in them. How many children go through our state system never having been told how to play cricket with a straight bat, how to hold the seam across a cricket ball when they are bowling or how to hit a tennis ball properly? They go through school without ever learning how to do that. That is talent lost to our country.

Like the hon. Member for Stone, I would go further: let us guarantee three hours of sport in schools and do away with traditional notions about which sports are acceptable. If girls want to play football in school, they should do so, and they should play organised, competitive football in school. Likewise, if boys want to play hockey, they should do so. Whatever the demand, schools should seek to meet it.

Why do schools let their children go out at lunchtime, cause mayhem on high streets and buy chips and biscuits? Schools should keep children in for the full day and provide a full range of sporting activities in the lunch-hour break, giving their pupils more chances to take part in sport. It seems to be a case of out of sight, out of mind, with people saying, "Off you go. Go and cause trouble somewhere else." Lunchtime activities are part of the solution, but the core of my argument is that we need a vibrant, competitive school league structure in all the main sports, starting from the age of 7, and that schools should be required to provide teams in all those categories.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) said, let us make sport the personal responsibility of a senior person in schools—perhaps the deputy head or possibly the head teacher. It is too important to be an ad hoc arrangement—something that may happen and may not. Let us make it someone's direct responsibility. Let us have extended Wednesdays, when everyone knows that a whole slate of competitive sports will take place and the school day will continue until 5 or 6 o'clock.

Let us shatter some of the prejudices. Personally, I would have no problem about boxing being provided in state schools, if there were young people who wanted to do it; it appeals to a particular hard-to-reach group, and has an edge over other sports in terms of personal focus, discipline and fitness. Let us provide what young people want to do. If there is a demand, let us not have hang-ups and prejudices about what is right and what is wrong, but let us provide what they want. Sport must begin at the beginning, with high-quality coaching and a play-to-win ethos from the very bottom of British sport.

5.35 pm

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I shall make my remarks short, as much of what I wanted to say has already been said by others.

I welcome the Minister's statement, and the development of a policy that has been overdue for the past 30 years. In another life, I was one of those enthusiastic but inept comprehensive school teachers who ran a football team, and I hate to think how many budding international footballers I must have ruined with my coaching. We must have a far more professional approach, and a recognition that sport is a vital part of education, but also that education is a vital part of sport.

That is particularly relevant to areas such as mine, where there is a proud sporting tradition, involving not only the fanatical following for West Bromwich Albion and Wolverhampton Wanderers, but athletics, with clubs such as Tipton Harriers. Despite that sporting tradition, there are very low educational aspirations—but we have a sports college, Wood Green high school in Wednesbury, which has brought enormous benefits to the area in both sport and education.

Someone asked earlier about academic qualifications. Not only is Wood Green high school a sports college, doing great work in linking with the 50 other schools in the local area to raise standards, it is also the highest performing academic school in the borough. There used to be a feeling, especially in the state sector, that schools were either sporting but not academic, or academic but not sporting. That has been totally disproved by our experience, which shows the success of the policy at the grass roots.

Wood Green high school is also breaking new ground in providing sporting activity before conventional school times for primary school pupils. With the help of the local authority, it is bussing in primary school pupils at 8 o'clock for an hour of PE and lifestyle education, which will not only help them through their lives but will also break down the barrier involved in moving between primary and secondary education.

Let me say a few words about competition. I love competition in sport, but we must have a broader perspective. We have moved a long way from the historical caricature of sport in schools, with the sadistic schoolteacher humiliating inept schoolboys or schoolgirls—if it ever existed. However, the fact remains that if we force young people to take part in a sport that they are not good at, it undermines their self-confidence and puts them off sport in general.

We must have not only a sports strategy in schools, but a physical fitness strategy, involving a range of activities. Those who want to play competitive sport and excel in it could do so, but others, who may not want to do that but who want to be fit, to feel on top of things and to have self-esteem, could take part in other activities—even just plain walking—to reach a certain level of physical fitness. I see no reason why schools should not have some measure of the physical fitness of their pupil population, as well as of their academic competence.

I shall finish with a couple more points. I welcome the Academic Coaches Ensuring Success—ACES—initiative that West Bromwich Albion runs. It is a new scheme, which is designed not for the most under-achieving pupils but for those who have potential and are not fully realising it. It is intended to help them through their GCSEs. It was launched in my borough this week and I await the results with interest.

I want to underline the problem of the drop-off in young women's participation in active sport in their early teenage years. It requires serious consideration and, if necessary, serious investment in schools to tackle it. In addition, in ethnic minority communities, cultural issues overlay the problem. I simply flag that up to the Under-Secretary as a matter that needs to be addressed.

When I learned about the target of two hours of PE a week, I could not believe that it was so low and that we are so far behind. However, we are getting there. We have made good progress so far but much remains to be done. I hope that the debate will contribute to that.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak, given that I managed to secure an Adjournment debate on the same subject only a few weeks ago, which shows how vital the issue is. Hon. Members wanted our élite athletes to do well in Athens and want them to do well in Beijing—and in London in 2012—but that will not happen unless we begin to generate support for the next group of athletes. Many of those who will compete in Beijing or in London in 2012 are still at school. We still need talent identification to ensure that we provide the right support for athletes at places such as Loughborough so that they are ready to win medals next time around.

However, mass participation is as crucial as picking the best to become élite athletes. For the majority of us, such participation is vital not only at school but throughout life. We have already heard many examples of the problems of obesity and antisocial behaviour. Sport can tackle that. It has enormous potential to do so much good in this country, yet, as hon. Members have said, we have missed the opportunity.

Sport has never spoken with a single voice. It has been pushed aside by the arts or other organisations. It is now time for hon. Members who are passionate about sport to convince others in Whitehall and our colleagues who are not present that sport has a vital role to play. We shall do that by building on our current position.

There is a mish-mash of initiatives and money is coming in. Although it is great that so much is going on, we have had to act in that way because of our starting point in 1997. We inherited a poor picture. I would not have designed the current position, but that is where we are. How can we make it succeed and how can we progress?

First, we must ensure that teachers have enough experience and time in their initial teacher training to do the basics at primary school. The school-club link is vital for the future. I still kick around—and sometimes catch—a rugby ball on a Saturday afternoon. I play at my local community college, where I have played since I was 18 and at school. I would never have gone away and joined another club. That is most people's experience. If they do not play school sport and do not have the club link, they drift away at 18. My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) highlighted a specific problem, especially among girls, of people who drift off much earlier. The drop-off rate at the age of 13 or 14 is significant.

As Professor Gratton stated in a recent article, if people stop participating by the age of 16, it is much harder to get them to return to the clubs later in life. They do not have the experience or the skills, and returning is a daunting prospect. We need to develop the club link, and that means support for the clubs.

My club struggles. We have a small committee of people and willing players, but giving up time to do the coaching is difficult. Modernisation and work with national governing bodies is vital to ensure that the coaches, who are fit for the purpose, are in the right place at the right time. It is harder now, because in our day we had cricket and athletics during the summer and football during the winter. Now, however, there is a much greater choice of sports, so the links need to be made not only with the traditional clubs; they need to go much wider. Girls, in particular, have a much greater requirement in this regard. Our talks with the Football Association earlier this year showed how many girls want to play football, for example, yet their chances of doing so at school are limited. The FA is doing a lot of work on this, but the Department for Education and Skills needs to work with it to ensure that girls get that choice.

I got myself into a bit of trouble following our last debate on these issues, when a local newspaper misquoted me. I had cited an example from the Youth Sport Trust's Nike report, which said that one of the reasons girls were put off sport was that they found it uncool and too sweaty. As hon. Members can imagine, the media had great fun with that, saying that I was accusing all girls of thinking that they were too sweaty. Unfortunately, my Tory opponent jumped on the bandwagon and made a complete fool of herself on the same issue, without even trying to get the facts. We have to recognise, however, that such barriers might exist.

Mr. Doug Henderson: My hon. Friend reminds me of an important point that I meant to make. A survey conducted by Sport England showed that about two thirds of young women would rather go dancing than participate in any other sport. Does my hon. Friend agree that dancing is a very valid activity that should be included in any fitness programme?

Mr. Reed: Yes, I was about to come to that. We need a wide variety of sports. A lot of girls want to play football, although many are still happy to play traditional sports such as netball or hockey. There is, however, a vast variety of sports out there competing for their attention—basketball, dance and aerobics, for example—and they should all be available.

With regard to facilities such as changing rooms, many people have now had experience of private clubs and find school facilities inadequate for many of the activities that have been mentioned. That brings me to one of my real bugbears. I really feel passionate about the use of school sports facilities and the idea that we should be able to use them 24/7. We have all stood here and agreed on that in numerous debates, and the Department knows that we all agree on it, yet when I go back to the school where I play rugby every Saturday afternoon, we are the only ones using the facilities there. There are 10 pitches, and there must be 12 or 13 tennis courts, yet we are the only group using the facilities every weekend. It cannot be rocket science for us to put in place a plan to ensure that this improves.

Sport England is looking at a multi-club approach to providing sport across the communities. Most communities have some form of educational facility. When we look across the water to France, we see the idea of the community stade—which I think most Members quite like—in which lots of clubs use the same facilities. They share the shower and changing facilities, and there are lots of athletics tracks, football pitches and other amenities available. We could do that in the schools that exist in almost every community here. We do not need to reinvent clubs up and down the country. In some cases, it would be difficult, but we just need to take the idea one step further. We need to ensure that there is someone responsible for the programme in each location, working not in isolation with the educational facility but with the county sports partnerships to ensure that facilities are available for all children as near as possible to their homes. We are not that far away from achieving that. Many of the facilities are there, but they are underused at the moment.

I want to refer briefly to the number of initiatives being undertaken. I recall that, when I became chair of East Midlands Sport, we were in charge of 57 initiatives relating to distributing lottery money, Sport England programmes and other things. Fortunately, that number has been reduced, and Sport England now takes a much more strategic approach. My fear, however, is that we are still generating more initiatives. I have a list of some of them here, which includes the sports colleges, the co-ordinators, the step into sport programme, and club links. Each of these is great on its own, but we have all been in head teachers' offices when they have shown us how much has come in from the Department that week. We need to consolidate many of those initiatives in order to get sport back into schools and get it going.

I take a slightly different view from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) on the role of the BBC. The coverage of the Olympics this year was a fine example of how good the BBC can be. That and other facilities such as its website and the sports coaching programmes in which it is involved offer a fine example of why we need to keep as much sport as possible on terrestrial television, so that as many people as possible get to see their sporting heroes. I have not been able to watch a premiership rugby game for several years, because coverage has been sidelined and tucked away on Sky. I am unwilling to pay the £40 a month extra it would cost me to watch a few games. I do not know how many other people are missing out on watching their sporting heroes in cricket, rugby, football and other sports. Without those national sporting heroes, our children do not have an incentive to get out and play sport. I urge those responsible to ensure that our sporting heroes are not seen only on television, but go around schools to encourage the sportspeople of the future.

I would say to my hon. Friend the Minister, "A lot done, a little way to go; three hours would be better; not 85 per cent., but 100 per cent.; and 2010. Get on with it."

5.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): That is quite a challenge. We have had 11 contributions to the debate and I shall do my best to do justice to each of them. I will not be able to respond to every point raised, but I shall happily respond to specific points that I cannot cover now in writing to hon. Members.

I welcome the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) to his new position on the Front Bench. We have had a constructive debate. I also wish to apologise to the House on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism, who is away on Government business; otherwise, he would certainly have been with us here today.

Several hon. Members talked about how we can ensure that sport is at the heart of the mission to educate. That is a significant challenge and it sits well with the broader debate about schools policy. I shall return to that point when I answer the challenges posed by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent.

My hon. Friends the Members for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) and for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) and the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) asked how we can recognise sport and physical activity as being on a par with some of the academic and other achievements of a school. We have consulted people in education and beyond about school profiles, whereby we would not simply define a school's achievement according to academic outcomes, tests and examination results but more broadly according to its performance in sport, the arts and citizenship. Some of the points raised today are relevant to that idea in general. They are also relevant to a consultation that is under way at the moment on how we can build on the successes of the active mark and the sports mark, perhaps through the development of a new sports partnership mark. I encourage hon. Members to participate in that consultation, which will run for another two and a half months, and to engage with schools, clubs and young people in their constituencies on the subject.

Almost all hon. Members made the point that two hours is a minimum. Some powerful points were made by Members on both sides of the House about the entitlement to much more than two hours. I would like to think of the two hours as a minimum. I have heard what has been said about an increase to three hours, but more important is a broader entitlement for those who want to do much more. That will be necessary if we are to achieve all the different aims we have.

My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) made the point that the extended—or 24/7, as he put it—school idea is one that has been around for some time. Its time has now come, not only for sport and physical activity, but more broadly. We have an incredible opportunity over the next 10 to 15 years in our secondary schools, through the building schools for the future programme, to provide the best possible facilities right across the curriculum. Facilities for sport and physical education must be a part of that.

I shall try to address the five points that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent put to me, many of which were reinforced by points made in the rest of the debate. The hon. Gentleman referred to the decline in the teaching of rugby and cricket in schools. The survey that we both mentioned from earlier this year showed that 97 per cent. of schools provided football, unsurprisingly, but that 86 per cent. provided cricket, 67 per cent. provided rugby union and 12 per cent. provided rugby league. I am not saying that those figures are good enough, but they demonstrate what a majority of the state schools surveyed are doing and the difference that the school sport partnerships can make.

The hon. Gentleman asked about clubs and schools. The links between clubs and schools are vital. Through the school sport partnerships, about one in five young people participate in high-quality club activity, which is a big step in the right direction, although we clearly need to do much more. Other programmes are relevant to those links. I was interested in what my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey said about Charlton, as there are some extremely good examples in football, rugby and other sports of links that enhance not only sporting and physical achievement but academic achievement.

I referred to playing for success. Arsenal's Double Club makes a big difference in London, working with some of the most challenging inner-London schools in Islington and Tower Hamlets. It has a remarkable and proven record of enhancing literacy, numeracy and other basic skills. That is of great importance.

There has been contention about how much of the lottery money has actually been spent, so I am pleased to be able to assure the House that as of 5 October grants totalling £446 million have been awarded. That means that 2,000 new facilities have been given the green light; 127 are already completed and open, and a further 595 are on site. It is fair to say that the money was not spent quickly, but I would rather we spent it well than spent it quickly. I am confident that the programme is on course and that the vast majority of projects will be completed between this year and 2006, as was always envisaged.

Playing fields were mentioned several times during the debate. With the recent announcement to which I referred in my opening remarks, we seek to strengthen the available guidance and protection. In the last two years, 90 per cent. of the approved planning applications relating to playing fields have led to the provision of better sport facilities, or have left sport facilities unaffected. Over that two-year period, the approved planning applications for playing fields have led to an investment of almost £540 million in new sport facilities. We have allowed the loss of only 148 school playing field areas since 1997, 60 of which were at schools that were closing. In all cases, the proceeds were used to provide better sport or educational facilities for schools—most of them for sport. I shall come to the specific points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) in a moment.

Voluntary organisations, such as the National Playing Fields Association and the Central Council of Physical Recreation, raised serious concerns about the number of playing fields that were sold in the 1980s and early 1990s. That is why we legislated and, more recently, acted as I described to strengthen the follow-up from the legislation.

The fourth point made by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent was about red tape, which poses a serious challenge. Work force reform is an opportunity for other professionals to go into the classroom and support good sport education. The implementation review unit is at the heart of the Department for Education and Skills to ensure that we minimise unnecessary bureaucracy and the burdens it can bring for schools. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about his fifth point on legal protection.

In the remaining minute and a half, I shall pay tribute to the other speeches in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) and the hon. Member for Colchester, who spoke for the Liberal Democrats, made powerful points about the importance of enjoyment as well as excellence in education. That is certainly reflected in developing policy, not simply on sport and physical education but more broadly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) made an interesting suggestion about a deputy head having specific responsibility to lead on matters of sport. I shall discuss that further in the Department and with colleagues.

The hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) paid tribute to the two specialist schools in her constituency. I am happy to associate myself with her remarks.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw invited me to meet objectors to a proposal. I shall be happy to meet him and some of his constituents to discuss that, but for reasons of balance I shall then have to meet people who hold the opposing point of view.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) made a thoughtful speech, with which everyone in the House could agree. I have already responded to several of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey.

My hon. Friends the Members for Leigh (Andy Burnham), for West Bromwich, West and for Loughborough are closely associated with the issue and raised significant points. My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West asked how we can ensure that physical fitness is at the heart of what schools do. I would like—

It being Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

PETITION

Crowlands Junior School

6 pm

Mr. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): I rise on behalf of no fewer than 264 of my constituents who send their children to school in, or reside in, the Crowlands and London road area of Romford. They have collected the petition to ask the House of Commons to take urgent action to ensure that adequate numbers of secondary school places are made available for children who attend Crowlands junior school. They find it unacceptable that so few such places are made available for the community and that schools do not ensure that sufficient places are available so that every child and parent can have a free choice of schools.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of Parents of pupils of Crowlands Junior School

Declares that there are not enough secondary school places in the Crowlands and London Road area of Romford to accommodate pupils who leave Crowlands Junior School. This results in children from the area having to take left over places from distant schools instead of being given a proper choice.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons calls on the Secretary of State for education to ensure that all parents in the area have the choice of quality education at secondary level in the local community.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Medicinal Cannabis

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kemp.]

6.2 pm

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): I cannot claim to be an expert on science, and much less so on pharmacology. I also accept the precautionary principle in the licensing of medicine, especially for new drugs about which insufficient is known or those on which there is room for significant doubt about their safety or efficacy. However, an exceptional case can be made for medicinal cannabis for reasons on which I shall elaborate. The art of good government is to know when to exercise compassion and discretion, and there is no more a pressing need for that than when its object is to relieve pain and suffering, which is the case that I shall make today.

I became involved in the campaign to legalise medicinal cannabis when my constituent, Kate Bradley, who is no relation, visited my surgery four or five years ago. Her story is compelling and poignant. In earlier years, she was a drug squad officer with West Midlands police until she took medical retirement. She was subsequently diagnosed as suffering with multiple sclerosis. Prescription medicines do not work for her, and she cannot legally obtain the one medicine that does work—cannabis. She is forced to procure what she regards as her medicine in her wheelchair on the streets from the kind of people whom she was locking up a few years ago.

The problem is not that Kate Bradley fears arrest, because I do not think that that is a significant risk, but that she cannot obtain a suitable supply of her medicine. In addition to the physical torment that MS visits on her, she suffers bitter humiliation. She and thousands of others do not wish to break the law, but what choice do they have when the only medicine that relieves the pain that they suffer is placed beyond their reach?

My concern is not about the Government's approach, because Ministers have been sympathetic. They are not unwilling to find a solution to the difficult problem, and I cannot believe that they are unable to do so. When I first raised the matter with the Department of Health in a parliamentary question in January 2001, it was confirmed that trials were under way on the GW Pharmaceuticals product Sativex, and that a report was expected in 2003.

There was a major step forward in October 2001 when, in reply to a further question of mine, a Home Office Minister confirmed:

> "the Home Secretary has made it clear that if a product licence is recommended by the Medicines Control Agency he would approve the necessary changes to the Misuse of Drugs legislation. These changes can be made swiftly".—[Official Report, 29 October 2001; Vol. 373, c. 500W.]

That was encouraging, but since then progress has been painfully slow. We expected approvals by the end of 2003, perhaps with medicinal cannabis on the market by now, but on 3 November last year the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), told me:

> "The Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency", which had succeeded the MCA,

[Peter Bradley]

> "has yet to complete its evaluation of the safety, quality and effectiveness of the medical preparation of a cannabis-based drug developed and tested by GW Pharmaceuticals."—[Official Report, 3 November 2003; Vol. 412, c. 708.]

She went on to assure me that once marketing approval had been received, the Government would act quickly to ensure that the necessary changes were made to legislation.

The Minister then wrote to me on 12 May to tell me of a further setback in the process and that the MHRA had asked for further evidence from GW Pharmaceuticals. I stress that I am not criticising the Minister or, for that matter, the MHRA. They are doing things by the book. However, while delay follows delay, patients with MS are suffering and that suffering is unnecessary.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): I endorse every jot of my hon. Friend's case. Does he agree that there is a danger that with Parliament and the Home Office downgrading the recreational use of cannabis from a class B to a class C drug, unless action is forthcoming quickly MS patients and others who require the medicinal use of cannabis will resent the fact that the Government can take action on the drug in respect of its recreational use but drag their feet when it comes to its medicinal use?

Peter Bradley: My hon. Friend anticipates my case and, indeed, makes it for me. He will forgive me if I do not respond immediately, because it will become clear that I agree with him.

Earlier this summer, Kate Bradley sent me an e-mail, which makes the case on its own. She said:

> "The spasms I suffer are sheer hell. From the soles of my feet all through my body into my brain is a searing, crippling, unholy pain. It is so powerful it can force my body to crunch into a foetal position one moment and switch to plank-like rigidity the next. Only cannabis unlocks them. Following this my legs are then attacked by pain akin to that of a blow torch burning my skin off. Cannabis is the only relief from this too. There is nothing orthodox medicine can do. Only cannabis helps. The government has said that if its medical advisers give the go-ahead, it will legalise medicinal cannabis and that's been very encouraging. But the waiting is almost too much to bear."

Kate Bradley is not alone. According to the MS Society:

> "in a recent survey of 100 patients, 43 per cent. said they used cannabis. Of the people who said they have never used it, 76 per cent. said they would do so if the drug were not illegal".

I do not want to make statistical claims that are too strong, but based on that survey, my calculations suggest that of 85,000 MS sufferers more than 36,000 will have used medicinal cannabis—albeit illegally—and a further 36,000 would have used it if were it legal. That adds up to 86 per cent. of all those people who suffer from MS. So 86 per cent. of them believe that cannabis could relieve their symptoms.

This prompts the question of why patients should have to choose between controlling their pain and breaking the law. That is why I asked the Minister in the summer whether, pending the approval from the MHRA, the Government would allow the limited and controlled cultivation, and dependable quality monitoring, of cannabis for those for whom their GPs prescribe it, which is the arrangement in Canada.

In repeating that call tonight, I believe that I have a simpler and much more acceptable proposition, which I shall come on to.

I said earlier that an exceptional case can be made for the legalisation of medicinal cannabis. A huge amount, for example, is already known about the drug's medicinal qualities and properties as well as its side effects. It has been in use as a therapy for 5,000 years. Queen Victoria used it as a tincture, and it has properties as an analgesic, anti-emetic and appetite stimulant. MS is the principal condition that it can alleviate, but it has also been argued that it can help patients suffering from AIDS, arthritis, cancer, chronic pain, epilepsy, glaucoma, menstrual and labour pain and migraine. Recent research by Dr. John Zajicek of the Peninsular Medical School in Devon suggests that it may not simply relieve the symptoms of MS but arrest them.

There is a dispute about the side effects of medicinal cannabis, and some people believe that it contributes to memory loss. Those side effects, however, are unlikely to be significant and I doubt that much will be discovered now that has not been known for many hundreds of years. Alternative pain treatments are far more harmful and, in some cases, dangerous than cannabis. Some, for example, can damage the liver severely. A single overdose of morphine can kill. There is no recorded death from cannabis—at least, I am not aware of one—in the past 100 years, and I have been advised that someone has to take many thousand times the normal dose of cannabis to die from its toxicity.

Cannabis is legal in Canada and eight US states. A growing body of opinion in the UK supports its legalisation here. The MS Society said:

> "On the evidence now available . . . those who might benefit should have treatment prescribed on the NHS".

The British Medical Association says that > "the law should be changed to allow the therapeutic use of cannabis", although it wants further research to isolate its therapeutic properties. The Lancet said that > "it would be reasonable to judge cannabis less of a threat than alcohol or tobacco".

Indeed, before it stopped taking the drugs, the Daily Express said in an editorial on 10 January 2001:

> "The Government must legalise the use of cannabis for medical purposes immediately. Otherwise we are going to get many more instances where normally law-abiding citizens are forced to go to the criminal underworld to get the one drug that can help relieve a devastating medical condition."

A growing number of medical practitioners share that view. I recently received a letter from Paul Davies, a consultant neurologist at Northampton general hospital, who has been involved in the trialling of GW Pharmaceuticals' new product Sativex, a spray that is applied under the tongue. He said:

> "I have seen some very beneficial effects of this drug in some of my patients. Of course there have been others who have not been helped, and we have had a few side effects but none has been serious. My own judgement based on experience and available data to date, is that Sativex is a safe drug and can be very helpful to treat symptoms in patients with multiple sclerosis, who have not obtained benefit from currently licensed products."

Dr. William Notcutt of the James Paget hospital in Great Yarmouth has campaigned to have medicinal cannabis recognised for 10 years or so, and I pay tribute to him for helping me to develop my knowledge and views. He told me that

> "when patients ask why they cannot be prescribed what they know will relieve their pain and will most likely be more effective and less harmful than what they are currently taking, I simply have no answer for them. It is a matter of common sense as well as humanity that medicinal cannabis should be made available to patients whose doctors wish to prescribe it and without further delay".

Patients who participated in the recent trials were lucky, as medicinal cannabis worked for 80 per cent. of them. In September, the Home Office agreed to license the continuing prescription of the drug to more than 500 of those patients. That enlightened decision prompts the question—why, if they are allowed access to a pain-relieving drug, cannot the other 85,000 people with MS, whose problems and pain are just as bad, receive it?

Although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) said, recreational cannabis was recently reclassified from class B to class C, medicinal cannabis remains on schedule 1 under the misuse of drugs regulations. It is grouped with LSD and ecstasy in schedule 1 as a drug with no medicinal value, which is patently absurd given cannabis's 500-year history as a therapy, and schedule 2 includes drugs that are far more dangerous than cannabis such as morphine, heroin and cocaine.

If cannabis were in schedule 2, or for that matter any other schedule, GPs and other doctors could legally prescribe it even if it were not approved by the MHRA, which happens with many other well known, often used and perfectly safe drugs under MCA guidance note 14. Despite cannabis's known therapeutic value, it cannot be prescribed, which is nonsensical. It was removed from the British formulary comparatively recently—1971—and I simply ask for its restoration to the position that it occupied for many hundreds of years.

It is only in the past few decades that cannabis, a drug which has been used as a medicine for 5,000 years, has become associated with recreational abuse, but most therapeutic drugs can be abused. Tranquillisers such as Valium and diazepam, hypnotics such as Temazepam and painkillers are frequently abused, but there is no question of banning them. If all drugs that could be and are abused were banned, few medicines would be left in the cabinet. The argument is that cannabis, which has become known as a recreational drug, also has medicinal properties and arguably greater benefits and less dangerous side effects than drugs that are in common use. It should not be proscribed; it should be prescribed.

MS patients are suffering because we have a hang-up about the 1960s. The generation that grew up with recreational cannabis should not deny patients access to cannabis's medicinal properties. The solution is simple: we should apply to cannabis the same exemption as already applies to many other treatments under the MCA guidance note of February 2000, which is entitled, "The Supply of Unlicensed Relevant Medicinal Products for Individual Patients." If cannabis were exempt, doctors could prescribe to individual named patients who, in their professional opinion, would benefit from it, which is, as I said, already common practice—cannabis could not be marketed until it received its approval.

In making that plea, I simply echo the recommendations made some time ago by the House of Lords Science and Technology Committee. In 1998, in a report on the scientific and medical evidence about cannabis, it said:

> "the Government should take steps to transfer cannabis and cannabis resin from Schedule 1 to the Misuse of Drugs Regulations to Schedule 2, so as to allow doctors to prescribe an appropriate preparation of cannabis, albeit as an unlicensed medicine and on the named-patient basis, and to allow doctors and pharmacists to supply the drug prescribed."

Three years later, the follow-up report criticised the "excessive and disproportionate caution" on the part of the MCA:

> "Patients with severe conditions such as multiple sclerosis are being denied the right to make informed choices about their medication. There is always some risk in taking any medication; patients and their doctors should certainly be informed about toxicological concerns that the MCA have raised, but these concerns should not prevent them from having access to what promises to be the only medication available to them."

Often, I do not agree with the views of the House of Lords—certainly not over the past few days—but I certainly agree with it on that matter, as do some 50 MPs from all parties who have signed my early-day motion calling for the legalisation of controlled cannabis for medicinal use.

Let patients make their own informed decisions whether the risk from the only relief from their excruciating pain represents a greater threat to their health and well-being than the disease from which they suffer. Who are we, as politicians, to stand between people suffering torments that we cannot imagine and the medicines that they need to make their lives tolerable?

My original plea to the Minister was to allow the production and prescription of herbal cannabis for therapeutic uses, but since then GW Pharmaceuticals has conducted successful trials, and the Home Office has granted a licence to prescribe to participants. It would be a small step to act out of common sense and compassion and move medicinal cannabis to schedule 2 of the regulations so that doctors can prescribe more widely on a named-patient basis as MCA guidance note 14 allows. As I said at the outset, the hallmark of a good Government is that they know the difference between the done thing and the right thing, and I hope that my faith will be supported by my hon. Friend the Minister's remarks.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) on securing this debate. I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), who is a patron of the Berkshire multiple sclerosis therapy centre, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann), who takes a keen interest in all issues to do with drugs.

I welcome my hon. Friend's acknowledgement that the Government are committed, both through the Department of Health and the Home Office, to take the necessary procedures to ensure that if a suitable product derived from cannabis can be licensed, it can be provided as a product for people suffering from illnesses that mean that they would benefit from such a drug.

The medicinal use of cannabis is a cross-party issue, as has been clearly shown by the support that my hon. Friend has received for his early-day motions. The Government, too, would like to contribute to easing the plight of those with debilitating illnesses such as multiple sclerosis and other intractable, painful conditions by bringing to their assistance whatever relief is to be had as a result of an appropriate medicinal use of the drug.

My hon. Friend mentioned the reclassification of cannabis, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West. We should be clear that we reclassified cannabis to class C not because it is not a harmful drug, but because it is not as harmful as drugs in classes A and B.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but she should not turn her back permanently on the Chair. That also has the practical defect of taking her voice away from the microphone.

Caroline Flint: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Cannabis was reclassified to class C because it is relatively less harmful than drugs in classes A and B. Since reclassification, we have been very conscious of lobbying from organisations linked to mental health and to young people as regards the problems associated with cannabis in several different forms. Cannabis is not a harmless drug, and we must be aware of that when we discuss its relationship with products derived from cannabis that could be used for medicinal purposes.

The Government have been clear and consistent in our position on the medicinal use of cannabis. I confirm again that we are prepared to license a medicine should it get the go-ahead from the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency—the MHRA. As we have heard, it has been assessing an application made by GW Pharmaceuticals for its cannabis-based product, Sativex. Like my hon. Friend, I hope that there can be a safe and speedy resolution of that application so that we know exactly where we stand on this issue. I understand his and others' disappointment about the time that it has taken to reach a decision. Discussions between the MHRA and GW Pharmaceuticals are ongoing. Obviously, the details of this particular application are commercially sensitive, but we hope that a conclusion will arrive sooner rather than later.

The MHRA has a responsibility to ensure that all medicines meet the required standards of safety, quality and efficacy before they are granted a market authorisation. Those standards are laid down in European pharmaceutical legislation, so this is not an area that allows for unfettered flexibility. Applicants have to demonstrate that they can produce the product repeatedly to a consistent standard and that it is stable. The MHRA is an Executive agency of the Department of Health, not part of the Home Office, and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on how it reaches its decisions in any particular case. However, a cannabis-based medicine, like any other prospective medicinal product, can be granted a marketing authorisation for medical purposes only when sufficient data have been submitted to demonstrate that the product is satisfactory for the intended use.

This evening, my hon. Friend has called on the Government to place cannabis-based medicine in schedule 2 to the Misuse of Drugs Regulations 2001. In an early-day motion in July, he also argued for authorising the controlled production and prescription of cannabis itself for medicinal use. Although I understand the motivations behind those two demands and am sympathetic to them, it is difficult for the Government to support those proposals.

It would not be appropriate to circumvent or undermine the well-established process attached to the evaluation of the safety, quality and effectiveness of all products that are prospectively prescribable by the MHRA. That process is designed to protect public health.

Comment has been made on why cannabis cannot be moved to schedule 2, like heroin and cocaine, so that GPs may prescribe it on a named-patient basis. Heroin and cocaine may be prescribed under the Misuse of Drugs (Supply to Addicts) Regulations 1997, but in very restricted circumstances in the treatment of addiction where a person has become so dependent on the drug that he has an overwhelming desire for its administration to be continued. I should add that, because of this issue, we are looking into other areas involving the prescription of heroin. We have a number of pilots under way.

I do not think that there is a real parallel with the prescription of raw cannabis for therapeutic purposes. The transfer of cannabis from schedule 1 to schedule 2 of the regulations on a named-patient basis would enable the substance's lawful prescription. However, allowing the prescription of raw cannabis of uncertain quality and strength as a medicine would seriously blur the distinction between misuse and therapeutic use. It might create its own health problems. For example, it would usually be smoked and there is no guarantee that those who suffer from severe illnesses such as multiple sclerosis would get access to the quality of product that would bring them relief, so we do not intend to depart from our consistent, long-standing stance of reliance on the role of the MHRA.

My hon. Friend mentioned the idea of Sativex being included in schedule 2 as well, but, as I have said, it is undergoing an assessment as a product for use by the agency. We do not think, therefore, that at this stage it would be right or suitable to undermine that process.

My hon. Friend also mentioned that patients who were on the GW Pharmaceuticals trials and have benefited from Sativex are being continued on that medication on a compassionate basis and for free by the company, pending the MHRA's decision. However, I should make it clear that they are being provided not with raw cannabis, but with a product that is inhaled—a derivative of cannabis.

We supported that position because we thought it was the right thing to do, given the nature of the trial. Therefore, I am afraid to say that I must disappoint my hon. Friend this evening because we think it would be wholly premature to move a cannabis-based medicine to schedule 2 now.

Peter Bradley: Will my hon. Friend explain why, if it is acceptable for the 500 patients who participated in the trials to have Sativex on an exemption from schedule 1, it is not possible to extend that to those whose symptoms are just as distressing and painful, pending the conclusion of the MHRA process?

Caroline Flint: There are a number of reasons for that. First, to trial a drug we have to pilot it with a group of people in the first instance. Therefore, there are clear boundaries within which that trial can take place, which are overseen by the company and those who have been part of that pilot.

To place the medicine in schedule 2 at this stage would raise issues about the role of general practitioners, the schedules that needed to be changed, funding, the number of people who may come forward for treatment, and how that would operate in practice—there would be all sorts of issues in terms of practicality. However, first and foremost, even though people have had the product as part of a trial, we should not give the green light to something that has yet to receive its full licence. I understand where my hon. Friend is coming from but, under the circumstances, the reasons I have outlined do stand. We hope that there is a speedy conclusion to the agency's investigation into Sativex as a possible solution to many people's pain.

I understand the sentiments of hon. Members on this matter. Anyone who has had a relative suffering from an illness such as multiple sclerosis naturally wishes them to have relief as soon as possible but, in terms of my hon. Friend's suggestion, in this situation, we do not think that it is right to set a precedent with regard to schedule 2.

Having said that, I recognise how important the issue is to many people. We want it to be resolved as quickly as possible, so I offer my hon. Friend a meeting with me and Lord Warner, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, to see what can be done to bring the issue to a conclusion more quickly.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order

[SYLVIA HEAL in the Chair]

Points of Order

9.33 am

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You have probably noticed in the press today that there is likely to be a decision announced on whether to build about 500,000 homes across the east of England. If that decision is to give the go-ahead to that building, I wondered whether you had had any indication that the Deputy Prime Minister is due to come to the House to make a statement. If the go-ahead is given to building these homes, which will blight many houses in the UK, it is important that the Deputy Prime Minister should be prepared to put himself before the House and subject the decision to parliamentary scrutiny.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have had no indication that the Deputy Prime Minister is seeking to make a statement to the House today.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether you can help me. On Tuesday, on Second Reading of the Civil Partnership Bill, I asked the Minister about the report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights. The Minister assured me that she had written in extenso in response to the concerns expressed. I have been seeking, through the Library, to get a copy of what the Minister said in response. The Library, despite waiting all day yesterday, had not been able to get a response from the Minister. Today is the last day for the tabling of amendments to the Bill if they are to be in order for consideration in Committee on Tuesday.

I wonder whether you can advise me, Madam Deputy Speaker. My understanding is that if a document is referred to by a Minister in the House, that document should be made available immediately to Members, and especially so when the document is highly material to a very contentious Bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I advise the hon. Gentleman that perhaps it would be helpful to him if he contacted the secretariat of the Joint Committee on Human Rights.

PETITION

Fisheries

9.38 am

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): It is with great pleasure that I present the petition of Mrs. Carol MacDonald of the Cod Crusaders' community campaign.

The material allegations in the petition are as follows: first, it represents the ongoing national petition, which currently has gathered 111,000 signatures from the fishing communities of Scotland, England, Ireland and Wales; secondly, it marks the day when my Fisheries Jurisdiction Bill will not be considered in the House through lack of time, disgracefully, but will be re-presented in the new Session, so forcing a debate on a vital issue; thirdly, the petition comes immediately after the European Commissioner has made it clear that the new regional advisory committees will have no management role over fisheries, and therefore will be unable to improve the situation of our fishing communities; fourthly and finally, it comes after the Government have failed to take the opportunity of renegotiations on the European constitution to improve the situation of our fishing communities, following on from previous Conservative Governments who considered these communities to be "expendable" in terms of Britain's wider European interests.

The petition reads:

> The petition of the Cod Crusaders' Community campaign declares that the European Union common fisheries policy has failed to conserve fish stocks and that it has caused untold hardship for fishermen and their local communities . . . The policy has proved ineffective and inadequate in the conservation and management of fish resources, has resulted in bankruptcies, the uprooting of individuals and families, and the destruction of thriving communities with centuries-old Cultural traditions and Communal lives.
> There should be an obligation to the . . . future generations and therefore assurances should be made to safeguard the fishing industry for our children to follow in the steps of their forefathers.
> The petitioners therefore request that the house of commons urge the Government to restore . . . Sovereign Waters to National Control and free them from European bureaucracy.
>
> And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I beg to move, That the House do sit in private.

Orders of the Day

Christmas Day (Trading) Bill

Lords amendments considered.

A New Clause

PROHIBITION OF LOADING AND UNLOADING AT LARGE SHOPS BEFORE 9 A.M. ON CHRISTMAS DAY

Lords amendment: No. 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Kevan Jones.]

9.51 am

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I beg to move amendment (a) to the Lords amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to take amendments (b) and (c) and Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 6.

Mr. Knight: I congratulate the Bill's promoter, the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), on getting into the home straight. He is nearly home and dry. That in itself is an achievement. In all the time I have been in the House, I have never had the good luck to be in the top 20 of the ballot for private Member's Bills. I was, however, on one occasion able to amend the law when I was a member of the Committee amending licensing legislation. I suggested that the 10-minute drinking-up time be increased to 20 minutes. Much to my astonishment, the Conservative Minister said that there was no answer to my arguments and he accepted the amendment. So if I am remembered for nothing else, I am the person who gave people 20 minutes to drink up in pubs at closing time.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): My hon. Friend is rightly unstinting in his praise of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). Does he not think that it is especially to the credit of the hon. Gentleman to have done so well given that he is, in parliamentary terms, something of a virgin, having been elected only at the last general election?

Mr. Knight: We all have to start somewhere. The hon. Member for North Durham has shown himself to be expert at guiding the Bill. I hope that he has more success in the ballot in future.

I welcome Lords amendment No. 1 because it improves the Bill. I commend my amendments (a), (b) and (c) because they would improve it even further. However, I have a query on the rather strange wording of the Lords amendment. Proposed new subsection (1) states:

> "Where a shop which is prohibited by section 1 from opening on Christmas Day is located in a loading control area, the occupier of the shop must not load or unload, or permit any other person to load or unload, goods from a vehicle at the shop from before 9 a.m. on Christmas Day".

So far, so good. It was as a result of pressure from Opposition Members that the Bill's promoter agreed to the amendment being made in the other place. However, the proposed new subsection goes on to say:

"in connection with the trade or business carried on in the shop".

I am baffled as to why those words are necessary. Do they mean that if the owner of a large shop wants to bring in demolition contractors at 6 am to knock about the inside of his shop because he is redesigning it, they would be exempt from the provision? If that is the case, the words run a coach and horses through what we are trying to achieve. We want to ensure that people who live near a large shop do not suffer noise nuisance before 9 am on Christmas day. Why is that peculiar phrase included in proposed new subsection (1), which would be more effective without it? I hope that my fears can be allayed, because it seems that the owner of a shop could carry out redevelopment work at an earlier hour on Christmas day.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I would be grateful for your clarification of something that, given my position in the House, I should know the answer to, and I am ashamed that I do not. Are we embarking on a stand part debate or are we merely debating the amendments? Will you see fit to hold a stand part debate later, because my right hon. Friend is trying to introduce something that should be discussed then?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no stand part debate. We are debating the group of Lords amendments and the amendments to the Lords amendments.

Mr. Knight: I give way—

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Perhaps this is a naïve question to which there is an obvious answer, but if the shop is prohibited from opening on Christmas day, why on earth should it want to load and unload on Christmas day?

Mr. Knight: That is a logical question. I hope that most shops would not want to load on Christmas day. However, a shop that wishes to launch a presentation with gusto after the Christmas holiday may decide that the only way it can do that is by getting provisions delivered on Christmas day. Opposition Members, in particular my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who unfortunately cannot be with us, were concerned that the Bill may stop large shops trading on a Sunday, but deliveries could still take place. It has been accepted that that is a possibility. Remote as the possibility may be, however, the purpose of Lords amendment No. 1 is to ensure that it does not occur before 9 am.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend accept that that is especially relevant this year because Christmas day is on a Saturday, which is obviously followed by a Sunday? The temptation for a large shop to take deliveries early on Saturday morning so that the shop is fully stocked ready for Monday morning—perhaps for a sale—would be great, and the Bill will prevent that from happening.

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend makes his point well. That is precisely the scenario that we envisaged when we asked the Bill's promoter to consider inserting a clause on loading.

Christmas is important, whatever one's religious beliefs. It is a holiday that has been observed since 336, when the Christian Church in Rome observed the feast of the nativity on 25 December for the first time. Ever since then we have continued to regard 25 December as a special day, which for many people is not just a religious holiday.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I fear I have to correct my right hon. Friend. The holiday was not observed in the period of the Commonwealth which was one reason why, when the Commonwealth finally foundered, people were so heartily glad it was gone.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Further to that information, this House abolished Christmas in, I think, 1647.

10 am

Mr. Knight: I am glad that that is one decision that was reversed. While we are trading stories about Christmas day, I can tell the House that on Christmas day, 1830, the first regularly scheduled passenger train in the United States began operations. I mention that en passant.

Amendment (a), in my name, would mean that loading could not take place on Christmas day before 10 am, rather than 9 am. I think 10 am a more appropriate time because on Christmas day, just as at weekends, many families like to have a lie-in. They do not want to have to get up at the hour they normally do during the working week. I know that most families with children would say that the last thing they get on Christmas day is a lie-in; because of the excitement they get woken up even earlier. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) is an expert on that, because it used to be said in the Conservative Whips Office that he had so many children that he was the only Member who paid income tax at the higher rate on his child benefit.

My hon. Friend will well know the problems of having young children when Christmas day comes round, but there are many families and couples who do not have children and who like a lie-in on Christmas day. Why should they be woken up at 9 o'clock by the sound of vehicles loading and unloading at a nearby supermarket? The Lords amendment refers to 9 am, but if a supermarket were seeking to load provisions on Christmas day, the vehicle would probably arrive at 8.45. We all know that these are heavy goods vehicles with diesel engines, and we can imagine the scenario: the driver leaving his engine running while the gated area at the rear of the supermarket is unlocked.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I had better declare an interest as the director and major shareholder of a family retail business. I have not worked out whether it comes under the definition of a large store. It does when it comes to rates, I think, but at the moment, not when it comes to turnover.

My right hon. Friend is being rather optimistic in thinking that these lorries will arrive only a quarter of an hour before their allotted time. My many years of experience suggests that they arrive hours before, and not only do they keep their engines running, especially in the winter, but when they reverse into the yard there is the "beep, beep" noise of the safety warning, so I am not sure that, even with a start time of 10 o'clock, we would avoid the problem.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing his experience to bear in this debate. His remarks make the case for my amendment even more compelling. If the start time is 10 o'clock, however early the delivery vehicles arrive, it will at least be an hour later than it would have been under the Lords amendment, so I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House are convinced that the 10 o'clock start is better.

These vehicles will, of course, be loading as well as unloading. The reason for that came to my attention through a constituent who is a bit of a character. I saw him after Christmas day one year and he said that he had had a wonderful Christmas, with all sorts of provisions on the family table that he could not have afforded, but he had come across them for nothing. I asked whether he had a benefactor, and he said, "No, I went past my local supermarket and saw the shop assistants skipping some wonderful food items because they would have been out of date after the holiday. When they had gone, I emptied the skip. I took the food home and we had a wonderful Christmas." I do not know whether he was committing theft. I suppose that if the supermarket owner had skipped the items, one could argue that they had been abandoned.

Mr. Grieve: I fear that he was committing theft.

Mr. Knight: Well, I said that he was an eccentric, and I certainly did not encourage him in that behaviour.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) rightly referred to the noise that would likely be made by an arriving vehicle, but very typically, rather understated his case. Ought we not also to take into account the great probability that radios or CD players would also be in operation, possibly playing music of a very discordant character, which would be very unsettling?

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): It might be music of a seasonal character.

Mr. Knight: Indeed. That, too, would be unsettling at an hour when one was seeking to have a lie-in.

Returning to my eccentric constituent who, it appears, committed theft, I have noticed, since he told me about his behaviour, that every supermarket I have seen now has a compound, and the area where they dispose of their goods is behind locked gates, presumably to stop such behaviour. It is not, therefore, simply a question of a vehicle arriving, pulling up to the loading bay and starting to unload; often the gates have to be unlocked and the vehicle has to be reversed into the yard. As my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) said, most heavy goods vehicles emit a beep to warn pedestrians which is very piercing and annoying.

I know that because, a few years back, I took part in a classic car run during which I found myself in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst. I stayed at a rather upmarket hotel in his constituency, and at about 6 am I was rudely awoken by a heavy goods vehicle beeping as it reversed into the yard. I do not understand why, but it seems that every person I have come across who is involved in loading and unloading takes relish in making the loudest, most prolonged noise possible. Trays are thrown on the floor, loading racks are rattled and doors are slammed. That is why such activity should not take place before 10 am on Christmas day.

Mr. Leigh: I am sorry to be unhelpful to my right hon. Friend, but does he have any evidence that this is a problem at the moment? Given the costs of overtime and people's natural unwillingness to work on Christmas day anyway, is there any evidence that large numbers of our fellow citizens are being inconvenienced by loading and unloading on Christmas day?

Mr. Knight: When one is framing legislation, one should not always wait for a problem to be so acute that people are driven mad by it before one legislates. We are changing the law, and it is right and proper that in doing so we seek to pass good legislation that takes account of areas in which nuisance may be caused to nearby residents.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it is the practice of those who celebrate Christmas to attend midnight mass, which is followed by a long peal of bells, and perhaps a service early in the morning which is similarly celebrated? Does he believe that that is not a nuisance, but loading is?

Mr. Knight: At Christmas, one should have a charitable attitude towards those who are using the day for religious purposes, which is how it all started.

Mr. Randall: My right hon. Friend is being generous in giving way. One consideration, which he may have been about to come to, is the people who would have to do the unloading. They might want to have a lie-in, rather than being at work at 9 o'clock, or they might welcome an opportunity to go to the early morning service beforehand. After all, the whole point of the Bill is to give shop workers, which includes those who do the unloading, some rest on Christmas day.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for remarks that will, I hope, guarantee my amendment support from Labour Members.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Knight: I did not think that I had said anything provocative. I give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve).

Mr. Grieve: The point that has just been made is critical. If the Bill's purpose is to prevent large supermarkets from forcing their workers into work on Christmas day, which it was greatly feared they would do, and they could still carry out administrative, maintenance or unloading work on that day, that purpose would be circumvented.

Mr. Knight: That is an excellent point. I give way to the promoter.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am interested in the right hon. Gentleman's argument about loading and the related noise occurring before 10 am. On behalf of those who believe in Father Christmas, may I ask whether he will be covered by the legislation in respect of the sleigh bells that ring through the sky on Christmas morning, and so be prevented from going about his task?

Mr. Knight: I think that most presents are in place before midnight, so Santa Claus will be exempt from the provision.

The Government have acknowledged that the noise made by vehicles reversing is a problem. The website of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has a page relating to development areas. Under the heading "Controlling Environmental Effects", the ODPM states that, to reduce noise,

> "Management controls should be used to reduce vehicle movements within sites and provide alternatives to reversing alarms . . . minimise the impacts of vehicle movements",

and

> "minimise 'drop-height' of material and use chutes/conveyor covers."

The Government are already on the case of reducing unnecessary noise, and I welcome the action that they have taken. That is why I do not think that the provision is over the top. I think that it is necessary and will be welcomed.

The state of California has similar provisions. Ordinance No. 166,514,EFF1/24/91 sets restrictions to prevent people loading and unloading at certain hours of the day. The provisions prohibit the operation of > "any dollies, carts, forklifts, or other wheeled equipment which causes any impulsive sound, raucous or unnecessary noise within 200 feet of any residential building."

We are not going as far as California has.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend draws attention to the ODPM website, but does he accept that it is Government regulation that requires such noises to be emitted by reversing vehicles? If the Government removed that regulation, the problem would be solved, but the ODPM seems to want to have it both ways, by suggesting that it is against the provisions that the Government themselves have imposed.

Mr. Knight: What is new about one Department of the present Government not knowing what another is doing? The recent transport White Paper reveals that the Government want to expand Stansted on the grounds that there are no houses there—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is going very wide of the amendment under discussion.

Mr. Knight: I was, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I was using the example to illustrate yet another area in which one Department does not know what another is doing. None the less, I live in hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), will be able to pull all the threads of argument together and change the regulation that requires heavy goods vehicles to emit a piercing beep when they are reversing.

Mr. Grieve: Of course I do not wish to contravene your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, but may I point out that airports have been described as supermarkets with a runway attached?

Mr. Knight: It would be stretching even my ingenuity to argue that airports come within the scope of the provisions, but I take my hon. Friend's point.

On Gloucestershire county council's website, I found reference to the lorry watch scheme, which is > "A scheme operated using local observers, to detect the misuse of weight restricted routes by heavy goods vehicles in local towns and parishes."

I commend the council on its action in encouraging members of the community to "rat" or "grass" on any lorry that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the scope of his amendment and that his comments should relate to it.

10.15 am

Mr. Knight: That is what I was about to do. The lorry watch scheme seems excellent to me, and to ensure that the legislation is effective, perhaps there should be an ignorant loader or unloader watch scheme, so that when a vehicle arrives hours early and the driver leaves the engine running and plays loud music, causing nuisance and annoyance, neighbours are encouraged to report such behaviour to the local police or trading standards department, just as Gloucestershire county council encourages people to report when lorries deviate from their proper route.

Action is needed, and I believe that my amendment (a) will make Lords amendment No. 1 even better than it already is. Amendment (b) would add a new subsection to the Lords amendment so that a local authority could vary the time at which loading or unloading may start. That is necessary because, in some areas, even 10 o'clock may be too early. A local community might feel as a whole that loading should take place only in the afternoon. The Bill extends to Wales, and I can envisage communities there feeling that Christmas morning should be kept free for chapel and that those who would otherwise be doing deliveries should go to chapel, so loading should take place only after 2 pm. My proposed subsection would allow the local authority to determine what time it considers appropriate.

Mr. Leigh: Is my right hon. Friend, as a Conservative Member of Parliament, really in the business of giving local authorities even more powers to interfere in the proper conduct of local businesses?

Mr. Knight: There are many good local authorities. I would much prefer to give power to local authorities, which tend to be in tune with the local community, than to some large regional assembly. I think that it is Conservative policy to allow local authorities to serve their local communities in the manner that they deem appropriate.

Mr. Bercow: I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) is genuinely troubled on philosophical grounds, because he thinks that the amendment does violence to Conservative principles. I put it to my right hon. Friend, by way of underlining his argument, that the diffusion of power to the localities in the way recommended in his amendment is wholly consistent with Burke's idea of "the little platoon" of people at local level determining their own fate. Furthermore, the amendment's excellence lies in the fact that it will deter businesses that are considering behaving badly. Those that do not plan to behave badly can hardly complain that the provision entails an additional burden: palpably, it does not.

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): Earlier, the right hon. Gentleman complained about a lack of joined-up government. Now, I am concerned about a lack of joined-up opposition. Has he run his proposals by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who I understand is looking in great detail at regulation?

Mr. Knight: I have not run amendment (b) past my right hon. Friend, but the provision merely allows a local authority to vary the time should it decide to do so. It is not adding to the burden of red tape to insert such a provision in the Bill, so I tend to discount the Minister's point.

Mr. Leigh: It is ridiculous for my right hon. Friend to say that. He is opening up a whole new area of local government. Do we really want local government to tell businesses—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not want to open up a whole new area in this debate. Can we keep our discussion to the group of amendments that we are debating?

Mr. Knight: I advise my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough to calm down and re-read amendment (b), which says:

> "A local authority may vary the time at which loading or unloading goods under subsection (1) may commence."

This is not a matter of great moment. I am simply saying that if there are local reasons why 9 am, if amendment (a) is rejected, or 10 am, if it is accepted, are not applicable the local authority can vary the time. I should have thought that my hon. Friend would welcome amendment (b) with open arms.

Mr. Chope: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that amendment (b), which I, too, have signed, would not give local authorities the power to prohibit unloading altogether?

Mr. Knight: That is indeed the case. The word "prohibit" does not appear in the amendment, which simply says that local authorities "may vary the time". Doing so does not amount to a prohibition.

Mr. Leigh: Will my right hon. Friend give way again?

Mr. Knight: I do so reluctantly.

Mr. Leigh: I must take issue with my right hon. Friend. Is he claiming that a local authority in, for example, Wales may wish to vary the time because people want to go to chapel? That is a fatuous argument. Cannot he do better?

Mr. Knight: That was merely an example, and there may be a host of reasons why people in a particular locality prefer peace and quiet, and do not want loading or unloading to take place in the morning.

Mr. Randall rose—

Mr. Knight: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, who is an expert on these matters.

Mr. Randall: I want to raise a local concern. Tesco has submitted a planning application for a megastore that will be open 24 hours a day, and wants to put 220 dwellings on top. That is a prime case of the need for variation, because people are literally living above the shop.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. May I refer my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough back to my California example? The state has a 200 ft rule, and such activity cannot take place at certain times if the large store or supermarket is within 200 ft of a residential building. I assume that the dwellings that my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge spoke about would be within 200 ft of the large supermarket. My amendment therefore has merit and should be supported.

I ask the Minister and the hon. Member for North Durham whether Lords amendment No. 1 will be effective, whether or not my amendments are accepted? Could the Minister tell the House how the provision will be policed? Will it be a matter for the local police or for trading standards officers? I am concerned that even if there is effective policing, that will not act as a deterrent. The Lords amendment offers a disincentive to offend, which is why I tabled amendment (c). Yesterday, I looked at the recorded profits of some of our largest supermarkets. Sainsbury, which has been having a difficult time recently, made a whopping £125 million last year. Morrisons made £198 million and Tesco, £822 million. Large stores therefore make significant profits, but Lords amendment No. 1 would merely impose a level 3 fine on transgressors.

There is no limit on the size of a fine imposed when someone is convicted by the Crown court. Magistrates courts, on the other hand, are limited to the maximum level provided by statute for the offence of which a defendant is convicted. The standard scale of maximum fines was introduced by the last Conservative Government in the Criminal Justice Act 1982, and was designed to rationalise maximum fines and make inflationary increases easier to implement. The maximum level 1 fine is £200; the maximum level 2 fine, £500; the maximum level 3 fine, which the Lords deemed appropriate to impose on large, profitable supermarket chains, £1,000. It is a sure bet that magistrates would impose a fine significantly less than the maximum, and may fine stores half—£500—for loading or unloading outside the permitted hours, which is no more than a slap on the wrist. I question, therefore, whether a level 3 fine will act as a deterrent for stores that believe they will enjoy bumper sales the day after Christmas, and may do their damnedest to load stock early on Christmas day. I therefore propose imposing a level 4 fine with a maximum of £2,500, which is two and a half times as much as the level 3 maximum. I thought about proposing a level 5 fine with a maximum of £5,000, but I decided that it was better to err towards the more reasonable punishment of a level 4 fine.

Mr. Bercow: My right hon. Friend said that he was minded to err on the side of being reasonable, but it could be argued that he is erring towards being feeble. Given that he alerted the House to the possibility that a large store in anticipation of a bumper day immediately after Christmas might take the view that breaking the law was commercially worth while, would not a more sensible basis for determining the level of fine be the expected profits on that bumper day?

Mr. Knight: That is a good point, but my hon. Friend will know that politics is often the art of the possible. We are dealing with a fairly narrow Lords amendment, so I believed that it would be possible only to substitute a different fine level rather than open up the basis on which fines are imposed in magistrates courts. My hon. Friend has offered an excellent argument for a criminal justice Bill, and if he is lucky enough to reach the top 20 of private Members' Bills next year, I hope that he will run with it.

Mr. Leigh: My right hon. Friend has been very patient with me, and I shall try to be polite, but does he really think that reputable companies such as Sainsbury and Tesco are likely to break the law? The publicity would be bad, so they simply would not do so. There would be a further regulation, fine or imposition on business. Is that what he really wants?

Mr. Knight: I clearly do not have the same faith that commercial operators will obey the law as my hon. Friend. If the end result is profit, there is always a temptation to break the law, which is why we need to legislate in Parliament.

Mr. Grieve: It may be helpful for my right hon. Friend to know that before Sunday trading was allowed, the laws against it were regularly flouted by large supermarkets and retail outlets. They happily broke the law and paid the derisory fines that were imposed when the local authorities bothered to prosecute them.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough wants to leave the Chamber to digest his words in the light of that intervention.

I have concluded that level 3 is inadequate and that level 4 is appropriate. I hope the House will agree that amendment (c) is by no means over the top and should be supported. The other Lords amendments seem to be consequential only. I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm to the House that there is no item of substance in those amendments, which all seem appropriate.

We welcome Lords amendment No. 1. It would be improved by the addition of my amendments (a), (b) and (c), which are sensible, fair, appropriate and reasonable.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has not dealt with the concern which those opposed to the amendments have expressed: that if the amendments were passed, the entire Bill would be put in jeopardy. If the House passed the amendments, the Bill would have to go back to the other place, which might result in the Bill being lost, which I am sure my right hon. Friend would not wish to happen any more than I would.

Mr. Knight: When one is debating legislation, one needs to argue for and support what is right. Procedural matters are secondary. I am telling the House what I believe is the right and proper way to proceed. I therefore commend my amendments to the House.

10.30 am

Mr. Chope: Hon. Members seem rather timid about joining in the debate. They are still digesting the fantastic speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight). They are probably torn, as I am, between recognising the logic of his arguments in support of his amendments—would it not be good to go for those amendments?—but they may be slightly inhibited because they are worried that, were we to go for the amendments, we would jeopardise the entire Bill.

I supported the Bill originally because it is relevant to the upcoming season. With Christmas day falling on a Saturday and Christmas eve on a Friday, and with the ordinary Sunday trading rules applying on the Sunday and the prospect of bank holidays after that, there might be a great temptation for large stores to open on the Saturday. The temptation for them to start loading and unloading in anticipation of that long period when people would be able to shop—people who may not have had time to go shopping before that—would be very great.

I do not want the Bill to be lost, and although I have signed the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend and wholly support them, I am nervous about the knock-on effect. The Minister may be able to help us, and the promoter of the Bill may be able to share with us any insights he has into the prospects of the Bill being completed successfully before Prorogation if the amendments were passed in the House and found favour in the other place.

One thing has emerged clearly from the debate. This is the first occasion for many years when we have had what we call a private Members' Friday after the long summer recess. The advantage of that is that it enables Bills that have gone through this place and have been considered in the other place to be considered again in the light of any Lords amendments. Much private Members' legislation has gone on to the statute book imperfect because Members in the other House were of the opinion that it was better for it to be imperfect than not to be passed at all. They felt that were they to amend the Bill, there would be no opportunity for it to be debated again here and it would effectively be ditched. So I hope the Government will ensure that in future we can have one of the private Members' Fridays after the summer recess.

Next year or the year after, there might be more Lords amendments to consider. It is probably a little late in the day to consider ab initio Bills that come from this House, but Bills that have been through the other place and been subject to amendment could properly be considered. Even though he knew that we had the opportunity today to consider the amendments, the noble Lord who is promoting the Bill in the other place was inhibited about allowing the amendment because he feared that the consequence would be to place the entire Bill in jeopardy. I hope that the message has got across. I commend the promoter and his colleague in the other place for trusting that we would be able to deal with the Bill effectively today and improve it as their lordships have done.

I am grateful to the promoter and the Government for responding so positively to the concerns that we expressed on Report—again, a good example of the House at its best. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who is sorely missed today—

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): Where is he?

Mr. Chope: As I understand it, he is away on parliamentary business. I do not know where he is as I have not received any postcards from him, but he may well be outside the country. If he were in the country, I am sure he would have made every effort to be present today.

Mr. Gale: Hurricane relief.

Mr. Chope: I note my hon. Friend's suggestion. I am not sure whether he has gone east or gone west, but as we know, he is very much here in spirit. He will be disappointed not to be present this Friday. Perhaps on future occasions he will have to adjust his annual calendar to accommodate the fact that we will have a private Members' Friday in October, rather than finishing the whole process in July, as has been the case hitherto.

Mr. Greg Knight: Will my hon. Friend not leave this part of his speech without paying tribute to the Minister? He has been unique in the Government in that he has listened, heard forceful arguments and been willing to amend the Bill in the light of those arguments. He should be commended and we hope he goes far.

Mr. Chope: Certainly. I hope the Minister goes as far as he can prior to the general election. That is as far as I am prepared to go along with my right hon. Friend's comments. Seriously, though, we are grateful to the Minister. It makes so much difference to the way in which legislation is dealt with in the House whether Ministers listen and are reasonable, or whether they become rather arrogant and defensive and say, "We have a large parliamentary majority. This is what we are doing and so be it." As a result of the Government's flexibility, the Bill will be better than it would otherwise have been.

On the substance of the amendments, I strongly support the Lords amendment. Loading and unloading outside large shops is a serious problem, particularly for adjoining residences. Although the amendment states that the regulations should apply only before 9 am, that is a great deal better than the situation would be without any regulation at all. I supported the amendment that would have extended the restriction to 10 am.

If the prohibition runs till 9 o'clock, people attending the 9.45 service will probably already be getting out of bed by 9 o'clock, so they will not be disadvantaged. If the prohibition extended to 10 o'clock, people intending to attend the 11.15 service would probably be all right. Without the amendment extending to 10 am, people intending to attend the 11.15 matins on Christmas day might find that their sleep was disturbed earlier in the morning than they would have wished. No doubt that is small beer compared with what might happen if they were disturbed in the early hours of the morning.

One problem relates to transport and logistics. Policy on haulage and deliveries is largely forced by conditions on the roads. Those of us who have to leave London on Friday afternoons experience the nightmare of traffic congestion. A heavy goods vehicle travelling 100 miles from a distribution depot to a supermarket at that time will consume much more fuel, create much more pollution, cause its operator much greater cost and detain an expensively paid lorry driver for much longer than a vehicle travelling in relatively free-flowing conditions. One can thus understand the temptation for logistics companies and the large supermarkets, which are their employers, to make their lorries go to their destinations, as much as possible, through the middle of the night. I have no objection to that; it makes good common sense, but when we consider the impact of such a policy on the sanctity and peace of Christmas, I begin to be concerned.

The amendment addresses a problem that arises from the congested roads over which the Government preside and to which they contribute further congestion by refusing to implement reasonable improvements to the road network. Until those improvements are made, the incentive for heavy goods vehicles to travel in the early hours of the morning will be very great indeed.

Other Members may have received a copy of the Transport for London five-year investment programme, which came out this week—interestingly after the elections for the Greater London authority. I do not know what the Mayor and the authority had in mind in the paragraph that states:

"A sustainable freight distribution project is designed to reduce the impact of freight deliveries in London. It will include freight information on the journey planner and legal loading information."

That could mean anything, so it is important that the House accept the amendment, which is precise in its application, so that everyone knows where they stand. That will not only be good for people living near supermarkets; it will put less pressure on people employed by supermarkets to supervise the delivery process—the unloading, checking and so on. It will also put less pressure on lorry drivers to work over Christmas eve and Christmas day to fulfil their obligations to their employers. Much good will come from the amendment.

The amendment does not address loading and unloading at large shops that are exempt under the Bill—a point that we might address on a future occasion. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but my recollection is that when we discussed the measure on Report we were concerned that large shops that were exempt from the provisions of the Bill would be open on Christmas day and would attract deliveries. I think it was the intention of some of the people who spoke then that there should be some control over the delivery process for large shops that could already legitimately open on Christmas day. Perhaps the Minister would comment on that. It could be a problem as heavy goods vehicles are even more likely to be making deliveries to large shops that are in that category than to those that are not.

Mr. Greg Knight: Can my hon. Friend shed any light on the words to which I referred in my opening remarks? Lords amendment No. 1 refers to loading

"in connection with the trade or business carried on in the shop".

Does he share my concern that that could enable a coach and horses to be driven through the restrictions? If, for example, a shopkeeper was carrying out major construction work inside the shop, would not it mean that the delivery of materials that were not connected with the trade or business carried on in the shop would be exempt?

Mr. Chope: I note my right hon. Friend's point, but if we removed that limitation we might as well say that all activity should be restricted on the morning of Christmas day.

Mr. Greg Knight: Why not?

Mr. Chope: I do not support that. Christmas day, when shops are closed, may give people an opportunity to carry out improvements to their shops if they want to do so. My right hon. Friend may think I am being uncommonly open-minded. I am not sure about the scope issue, but arbitrarily to prohibit on Christmas day or Sunday any vehicular activity at a shop that is not connected with the trade or business being carried on there would be rather draconian.

10.45 am

Mr. Randall: Refurbishment could already be covered by the measure; it could be argued that that was in connection with the trade or business, as it would presumably be designed to enhance the business or trade. That could apply to maintenance work, too, unless it was essential maintenance, so I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) may be worrying unduly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) is right to point out.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that point. He has probably read the provisions rather more carefully than I have, and the concerns of my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire should be allayed by what he said.

Mr. Bercow: Might not the concern of our right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire be grounded in the possibility that a large store of that kind could be planning to take loads with a view to operating a mail-order business that would not be undertaken from within the physical confines of the shop? That is a possible get-out clause and we should be alert to it.

Mr. Chope: Yes, that may be so. In this ghastly internet world, that sort of thing might happen. My hon. Friend may be described as a moderniser, but he certainly anticipates the ghastly things that might happen in the future. Perhaps if he is successful in the private Members' ballot, he may want to bring forward a measure to address those awful developments. He is right to draw the House's attention to that concern.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): As one of the few Members of Parliament who holds a heavy goods vehicle operating certificate and who has had to organise for such vehicles to deliver, I can tell the House that drivers prefer to get up early in the morning and reach their destination at the earliest possible time. There could thus be a scenario where there is not simply one lorry at 9 o'clock in the morning but a queue of several lorries, so amending the time from 9 am to 10 am would have considerable benefits for local residents.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend has been rather reticent. We did not realise that he had such expertise in these matters and I hope that we will benefit further from it. He refers to the problems of lorries queuing up and although I am instinctively against regulation, we may need further regulation in future.

In the United States, there is a contractual arrangement whereby a lorry has a 20-minute window of opportunity only, so it has to be at the gates on time. If it is not, it loses its slot and has to come back several hours later.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is exactly right and that is precisely what happens in this country. If a lorry is not there on time, it loses its slot and the driver is told that, if he is lucky, he can come back later in the day. If he is not lucky, he loses the slot altogether.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are of course discussing amendments relating to Christmas day.

Mr. Chope: I am sure that my hon. Friend was addressing his remarks to the situation on Christmas day. If he is right and such distinct slots are used—I know that the slot system is used in north America, but

[Mr. Chope]

I did not realise that it is used in this country—the question is: what should vehicles do that arrive early in anticipation of reaching their destination? The problem will probably not be so great on Christmas day because, as I have said, in general the traffic on that day is much lighter and therefore more predictable. So there should be no need for vehicle operators to advise their drivers to allow a two or three-hour margin in case of possible motorway congestion, or of a motorway's being closed to all traffic because of an incident.

The situation on Christmas day is probably not as serious as on other days, therefore, and for that reason I agree with you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that there is a distinction to be drawn here that appears to favour keeping the Bill in its current amended form, rather than adopting the 10 o'clock provision. As Members can tell, I am slightly in two minds about this issue. Obviously, 10 o'clock would be better than 9 o'clock, but I am worried about losing the benefit that the Bill will bring.

The points that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire made about penalties and deterrents are very important indeed. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) reminded us just how cavalier a large commercial organisation can be when inconvenienced by the problem of fines. In the case of Sunday trading, in the end it was necessary for local authorities to seek injunctions—involving effectively unlimited penalties and the possibility of imprisonment—in order to bring these large organisations to book. So there is a need for a deterrent penalty, and probably even more so on Christmas day. We do not necessarily want to have to employ a huge number of police officers on Christmas day, and people from local trading standards departments probably do not want to be got out of their beds on that day. If a deterrent penalty can be established that is likely to result in greater compliance with the law, so much the better. Indeed, on that issue, it might be in the spirit of Christmas day to say that no speed cameras will operate on that day, for example. As a result, people from the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is wide of the scope of the amendments. Perhaps any further remarks might address them.

Mr. Chope: Okay, Madam Deputy Speaker. Perhaps that subject will have to be dealt with through a separate private Member's Bill on another occasion. On the importance of deterrents, I am far from convinced that the level 3 fine will succeed, but let us hope that it does. If there is compliance, there will be no need to amend the provision. But if compliance is not forthcoming, or if it appears that one of the large companies is collectively intent on defying the law, we should consider the possibility of obtaining an injunction against it.

I am enthusiastic about the Lords amendment and I am delighted that we have enabled such an amendment to the Bill by sitting on this Friday in October. I am also delighted that their lordships trusted that this House would not try to destroy the Bill in bringing it back here. I hope that, in terms of its future progress, its promoter or the Minister will advise us on the consequences of accepting one or more of the amendments.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Lords amendment No. 1 arose from our discussions on Report and the efforts of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who, sadly, cannot be with us today. In the course of piloting the Bill through this House in the past few months, I have had the benefit—on balance, it is a benefit—of getting to know the right hon. Gentleman very well. I should point out that his public and private personas are very different. He has played a very constructive role on this Bill, and he, the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) and the hon. Members for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) argued the case for the amendment—that a provision on loading and unloading should form part of the Bill—genuinely. In the spirit of the good will and good-natured debate that took place on Report—indeed, there have been good contributions and some good-natured debate throughout the Bill's passage—I gave a commitment to introduce an amendment, with the Minister's help, that deals with the loading and unloading issue. That is the process by which we arrived at the amendment before us.

I congratulate the Lords on the amendment, which does improve the Bill and is clear and tightly defined in its dealing with loading and unloading. I have listened carefully to today's discussion, and although I am flattered by the praise that has been offered for my piloting of the Bill through this place, as I said on Report and Third Reading, in order to get a private Member's Bill through one has to keep the definitions within it very tight. Some of the suggestions made today would widen the Bill's scope tremendously and thereby create problems not just on Christmas day, but in respect of other issues. That said, those suggestions were genuinely argued, and issues such as noise do arise, but I doubt whether this is the Bill in which to deal with them.

The Lords amendment introduces a core prohibition of loading and unloading before 9 am in loading and unloading control areas designated by a local authority, unless the large shop concerned has the local authority's consent, which might be subject to conditions. Subsection (2) of the amendment applies paragraphs 3 to 8 of schedule 3 to the Sunday Trading Act 1994 to clause 1. Paragraph 3(1) concerns a local authority's ability to apply conditions to consent given to loading and unloading. Paragraph 3(2) concerns the local authority's ability to vary the conditions under which consent was granted, and its giving notice of any variations made.

Paragraph 4 of schedule 3 deals with the procedure for applying for consent to load and unload in a designated area. It requires the applicant to apply in writing and to include the relevant information, which is the information that the local authority regards as fit to assess the application. Paragraph 5 is concerned with the fee payable. An applicant must pay a reasonable fee, which is determined by the local authority in question. Paragraph 6(1) establishes the grounds on which a local authority might refuse consent—namely, that loading and unloading has caused, or would be likely to cause, annoyance to local residents. As has been argued this morning and on Report, that is the core reason why the Lords amendment is needed. Indeed, the hon. Member for Canterbury argued the case for such a provision very eloquently on Report.

We have had a fascinating discussion on the issues raised this morning and on the amendments before us. I come back to the fact that the amendment is tight—deliberately so—and we need to ask whether it is ever possible to have an amendment that covers every aspect of a problem. I am not sure that we can. In this instance, we are dealing with large shops trading on Christmas day, though we have posed a range of other issues around noise and, fundamentally, the way modern society is structured.

11 am

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire explained that the point behind his amendment (a) was to restrict other activities in the shops and he referred particularly to demolition. I know from my days in local government that much of that would be covered by building control regulations and, in the case of noise nuisance, by anti-noise legislation. Many local authorities, including mine at the time, had what was called a considerate contractors' contract, where one of the key aims was to ensure that no nuisance was caused to neighbours. Thus I believe that other provisions cover [illegible] point and there is no need for the amendment.

Mr. Greg Knight: The amendment started out as a question: why were the words included in Lords amendment No. 1? It seemed to me that the provision would remain perfectly lucid without those words, so my main point was to ask why they were deemed necessary.

"in connection with the trade or business carried on in the shop"

Mr. Jones: They were included in order to relate specifically to the activity of trading and trading activities in a store. Bringing into the scope of the Bill the broader issues around other activities such as building works would present difficulties.

Mr. Sutcliffe: To shed a little further light on the point, the issue is about the scope of the Bill and the wording is a direct lift from the Sunday Trading Act 1994. Other issues are relevant—for example, someone might be living above a shop and want to move on Christmas day. My hon. Friend's position would stop that person from doing that, but does he really want to stop that sort of activity? The technical drafting of the Bill relates, as I said, to the Sunday Trading Act 1994.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to the Minister for that point. The broader issues—noise from delivery vehicles, for example—present a whole feast of material for future private Members' Bills. I have learned from what I have heard this morning that some Conservative Members have some exciting hobbies—hanging around loading bays, watching lorries delivering their goods and listening to the noise.

Mr. Randall: In case some people think that my retail days were a bit of a hobby, I want to point out that what I did was part of my job.

Mr. Jones: I am relieved to hear that, because the idea of the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) hanging around a Tesco loading bay on Christmas day—

Mr. Bercow: With his anorak on.

Mr. Jones: Yes, the hon. Gentleman with his anorak on is quite a thought.

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire, because I now know that there is a website called Lorry Watch. I know that as soon as hon. Members leave the Chamber today, they will rush to go online to discover that website. Equally, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister website includes material on noise nuisance and other issues. Overall, the issues have been well argued, but in order to preserve the Bill and maintain its relationship to the 1994 Act, I am inclined to reject the amendments.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): On that point, does my hon. Friend believe that it would be a great tragedy if the amendments to the Lords amendment were accepted and that, as a consequence, the Bill were wrecked on account of running out of time. We are trying to pass a Bill designed to stop shops trading on Christmas day. The Bill has much support and people in the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers have worked particularly hard to support it.

Mr. Jones: I totally agree with my hon. Friend, but it is not just USDAW. As has been said on other occasions, the churches, for example, support the Bill and I know from the letters I have received that many members of the public support it. It would also be very sad from the point of view of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst. He is not in his place today. Wherever he is in the world or in the UK, he may be watching our debate and it would be tragic for him to see the Bill fail after all the hard work that he has put into it over recent months.

Mr. Dismore: Does my hon. Friend know whether the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) has gone to the Christmas islands?

Mr. Jones: I have got to know the right hon. Gentleman rather well over the last few months and I have to say that I quite like him, though it may be a sin to say so for some of my hon. Friends. He has not yet, however, got to sending me postcards from wherever he is in the world. When I start receiving postcards from him routinely, I shall seriously start questioning my judgment on certain issues.

It is clear in the Bill that it is down to the local authority to appoint inspectors to enforce the provision. The costs were raised when we debated the money order. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I do not envisage armies of inspectors lurking around the loading bays of Tesco on Christmas day. There may be some volunteers, along with the hon. Member for Uxbridge. What I envisage is inspectors dealing with any complaints raised by the public, as occurs already with noise and other problems.

On amendment (c) and the issue of the level of fines, I agree with the point so eloquently made by the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) when he said that large supermarkets do not want to upset their local communities, which they rely on for their custom. The idea that they would flagrantly flout the law does not convince because that convention acts as a deterrent in itself. I would not want to make the fines as onerous as £1,000 to £2,000. Frankly, I do not think that it would make much difference. The deterrent is already there and, at the local level, stores do not want to upset local people. The big multiple retail outlets spend millions of pounds a year not just advertising their products, but on building up their image in local communities.

Mr. Bercow: I fear that the hon. Gentleman's generosity of spirit is getting the better of him. Is he not open to the possibility that a large store might calculate that the number of people whom it would offend by breaking the law would be outweighed by the number of people to whom it would be able to make successful sales and that the logic of the hon. Gentleman's belief that the company would not transgress, even if the fine were modest, is therefore flawed?

Mr. Jones: I do not accept that and I shall explain why. Sunday trading is different in the sense that what the Bill proposes is a popular outcome that many people really want. I am well aware from the large retail stores in my own constituency of the amount of effort that they put into winning the trust of communities. All credit to some of them who put money directly into local community groups and building partnerships. I am not convinced that the stores want to jeopardise that for the sake of being able to load up on a Christmas morning. I am sure that the hon. Member for Uxbridge could tell us about the ways in which the supply chain could be organised without upsetting local residents. If the local Tesco were to flout the law in my constituency, I am sure that the local newspapers would know about it and the stores would receive much bad publicity.

I said earlier that the Bill has widespread support. I give credit to hon. Members on both sides of the House who have genuinely tried to improve it. The Lords have succeeded in doing so with this amendment. I have made it clear that, in seeking to get the Bill passed, I was prepared to accept reasonable amendments. This is a reasonable amendment. I also give tremendous credit to my hon. Friend the Minister, who has worked hard—sometimes against internal opposition—to ensure that this amendment could be considered. I hope that we can ensure that the Bill becomes law today. To that end, I ask the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire to withdraw his amendments. They were well and passionately argued, but if they were accepted the Bill would fall at this very late stage. That would be sad, given the hard work that has been done by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House to get to where we are today.

Mr. Gale: As the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), who introduced the Bill—which commands widespread support—has just indicated, we are between a rock and a hard place. I take the mood of the House this morning to suggest that tremendous sympathy is felt for the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), with good reason. Their Lordships went part of the way down the road and many, both in and outside the House, would like to go further or, indeed, much further. I am one of them.

This is not the place for a Second Reading debate and I shall not rehearse all the arguments. I am sure you will be relieved to hear that, Madam Deputy Speaker. The opposition of some of us even to Sunday trading, never mind Christmas day trading, goes back a long way. We bear the scars—honourably, I hope—to prove it. Mine is one of the names on the apocryphal list in the black handbag after some 60 Conservative Back Benchers voted against the then Government to defeat the first Sunday trading Bill. We did so because we believed passionately that it was a bad thing. We believed that the Lord's day should be available for observance and held as a day of rest and recreation for those of other faiths who did not choose, need or feel obliged to go to church.

It was a glaring omission that Christmas day was inadvertently omitted from the precautions in the legislation that finally went through the House. The hon. Member for North Durham has done a tremendous job—I pay tribute to him—in seeking to redress that imbalance. The amendments are about peace and quiet. I do not share the view that because some large stores, which are exempted by the legislation, need to take deliveries on Christmas day in order to open on Boxing day that they should be allowed to do so. Indeed, I do not share the view that they should be allowed to open on Boxing day.

I am told that there are some sad people who have nothing better to do on the day after Christmas than go shopping. I recall a remark by the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), a longstanding friend of mine, who was standing almost exactly where I am standing today. He said—hon. Members should bear in mind the social sentiments of that time—that there were coffee table books called "The Joy of . . . ", such as the "The Joy of Music" and "The Joy of Sex", but that he had the feeling that if someone published "The Joy of Shopping" it might not be a bestseller. I subscribe to that view myself.

Some people wish to go down that road, but it is still not necessary to deliver on Christmas day. The people who drive the lorries have as much right to that day of rest as anybody else. We all accept that some key workers and some people who work in television and newspapers, as well as those who keep the trains running and the roads clear in the case of snow, have to work on Christmas day. Most particularly and honourably, that includes those who work in the medical professions. But why should a lorry driver have to drive at all on Christmas day, whatever time he arrives, just to ensure that a store can open on Boxing day? I do not accept that that is necessary and I would dearly like to vote against Lords amendment No. 1. Failing that opportunity, I would like to be able to support the amendments tabled by—Mr. Greg Knight: I have followed my hon. Friend's argument as far as his conclusion. He wants to vote against Lords amendment No. 1, but that would create a free-for-all in which loading could take place at any time on Christmas day. If he wants to discourage unloading on Christmas day, the amendment would at least be a step in that direction.

11.15 am

Mr. Gale: I indicated in an earlier intervention my less than mastery of procedure, but this is where we are between a rock and a hard place. Were I and others to chuck out the Lords amendments, the Bill would have to go back to the other place. That would provide the opportunity to re-amend the Bill. Unfortunately, because of the procedures of the House, which are arcane and less widely understood than we would wish, that is not possible. The amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend are an improvement on the Lords amendments, if only by one hour. I would have gone further. Indeed, I could have gone further and tabled an amendment to the effect that unloading would not be allowed until midday.

The difficulty that we have is that if we follow our natural inclination and vote as we believe we should—that is, with my right hon. Friend if he chooses to press his amendment—we would kill the Bill. It would have to go back to the other place and because, for reasons unknown to most of us, the House will not sit next Friday, we would have no further opportunity to consider an alternative Lords amendment and the Bill would fall, as will, it has to be said, many other Bills on the Order Paper today, including my own Criminal Justice (Justifiable Conduct) Bill. It will go the way of all private Member's Bills at this stage. We have run out of parliamentary time in this Session.

We are faced with a stark decision: we can run with the Lords amendments as they stand or lose the Bill, and none of us wants that to happen. There are issues that arise from the Lords amendments that have not been mentioned. It is the provision that gives the power to local authorities to vary the provisions of the amendment—the 9 o'clock rule. What worries me is that we could end up with a wide variation across the country in the restriction or lack of restriction that local authorities impose. That is unsatisfactory. If we are to make a law, it should be constant, universal and understood by everybody. I do not want lorry drivers to have to drive at all, but given that they will have to do so, we cannot have a situation in which a road haulier is in breach of the law because of a local authority variation of which he may be unaware. That provision is highly undesirable, but we are stuck with it. We keep it or we lose the Bill.

Mr. Bercow: I might have been under a misapprehension. I thought that the power of discretion allowed for later unloading. If, as my hon. Friend suggests, the discretion could be used to allow unloading to take place earlier than 9 am, I would be very alarmed.

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter; perhaps the Minister can clarify it. Paragraph (a) talks about variation "with the consent of the local authority for the area in which the shop is situated, granted in accordance with this section".

Mr. Grieve: My reading of the Lords amendment makes it fairly clear to me that the variation must apply to the period before 9 am, so the local authority is being given the power to allow for earlier deliveries upon application by the trader. I certainly do not read it as a device to enable local authorities to delay beyond 9 am.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend is much wiser in law than I, and if that is his reading I bow to his knowledge. I am sure that he is correct, so that makes matters worse rather than better. It means that the local authority can ride roughshod over the 9 o'clock rule and say, "Well, if you want to drive in at 4 o'clock in the morning on Christmas day, you can."

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Santa Claus.

Mr. Gale: We have heard about Santa Claus already. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was with us—

Bob Russell: I never am.

Mr. Gale: I do not think that he was with us mentally, physically or spiritually when Father Christmas came thundering across the skies earlier this morning.

Mr. Sutcliffe: We should not leave this issue without pointing out that there was a great deal of consultation on the Bill, for the reasons that have been outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), and that many of the major retailers wanted to see the Bill as a pre-emptive strike to prevent them from operating on Christmas day. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will look upon what we are trying to achieve in that spirit.

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to the Minister, and accept what he says, but the fact is that that paragraph in the Lords amendment could make matters worse. We would be voting for a 9 o'clock rule this morning. The Lords carried that amendment, so fine—although it is not what we would all like. We would prefer 10 o'clock, as my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire suggests in his amendment to the Lords amendment, or midday, as I might have suggested myself. However, I have not made that suggestion, because we know that we would lose the Bill if we went down that road. That paragraph, however, could negate the provision of the Lords amendment, so we are pretty much back where we started.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Surely any local authority worth its salt will listen to the local people, who will have a big impact on what it does. It would be a brave local authority that rode roughshod over local people's views and imposed a 4 am rule if that caused them nuisance. In my experience of local government, that does not happen.

Mr. Gale: I am aware—I suspect that deep in his heart, the hon. Gentleman is aware too—of local authorities controlled by all three major political persuasions that cheerfully ride roughshod over local people's wishes when it suits them. If a local authority were placed under duress by a major retailer, I think it highly likely that it would say, "Yes, that's all right; not many people live in that area." I do not care whether many people live in the area. This is about quality, not quantity, and if even one person lives in the area, that person has a right to rest on Christmas morning, and that is just as significant in principle as if 100 or even 1,000 people were affected.

Mr. Bercow: I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend has said. Is it not also important to give a voice to the voiceless when we debate such matters? I have a young son who will celebrate his first birthday at the beginning of December. Customarily, my wife and I expect little Oliver to start making a noise from about 7 in the morning—although it is conceivable that on Christmas day he will be minded to do so somewhat earlier. The thought that he might have his sleep wrecked by some unconscionably inconsiderate corporate lorry driver at 4 o'clock on Christmas morning is unacceptable to me, and I feel sure that it would be unacceptable to him.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend is probably right, at least in saying that his and his wife's sleep is more likely to be disturbed by the raucous behaviour of young Oliver at 4 o'clock on Christmas morning than by the horrendous reversing noises that we heard described earlier, from multinational supermarkets' vehicles outside.

I have made my point. We are in a difficult situation. I have the greatest desire to support the amendment moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire, but I have an even greater desire to see this modest, just and necessary measure go through the House and reach the statute book. We cannot have both, so with great reluctance I have to say to my right hon. Friend that I hope that he will concur with what I suspect will be the majority view and, when the time comes, see fit to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): In this brief contribution I shall first say that I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), who has a very distinguished history of contributing to the campaign to keep Sunday and Christmas day special. I concur with the conclusion to his argument, because we can all see how important it is that the Bill should complete its passage today. The hon. Gentleman is right: further tinkering and attempts to make further changes can only put it at risk.

I have been following the debate closely and have some sympathy with the arguments of the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) and others. However, as the debate has shown, they open up large areas of territory for consideration, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) said, could be the subject of other private Members' Bills, or even Government legislation, which would be popular with the public.

This is a very good Bill, and I join in the commendation of my hon. Friend's great work. He has made a great contribution and has worked with the representations that have been made to him and carried public opinion with him. He has the overwhelming support not only of shop workers and the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers but of the general public. Those who think that they could make the Bill more perfect by tinkering with it further are making the perfect the enemy of the good. It is an excellent measure, and the House should send it forward to a successful conclusion today.

Mr. Randall: Perhaps I should repeat my earlier declaration of interest—although as there will be thousands of people listening live to the debate or watching it on the Parliament channel, that might be seen as unfair advertising, so I shall simply refer to that declaration of interest.

I worked in a retail outlet for 18 years, and contrary to what Labour members might think, I worked upwards, and worked on delivery vans and as a shop assistant. I have great sympathy for shop workers, who have had a rough deal over the years. Our business has been in operation for more than 100 years—110, I think—and one sees cycles come and go. I can look back at earlier eras when opening hours were much longer, but because of shop workers' legitimate rights, the hours became shorter. I can remember when we first closed on Wednesday afternoon, and then all day Wednesday. That has now ceased because of public pressure and the pressure of competition.

I nearly lost a vote at the general election when someone said that they would vote for me, although they would not normally vote for my party, because they liked the fact that our shop never opened on a Sunday. I nearly lost the vote by replying, "Unfortunately, in this world you can never say never." However, I can categorically say that I would never open on Christmas day.

I have great sympathy with the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), but there are forces at work here, and they come from the public. The public say that they do not want something, but in fact they are happy to take advantage of it. I have to hold my hand up and say that when Sunday trading started I was absolutely opposed to it, yet I now find myself buying things on a Sunday.

Mr. Bercow: Ah!

11.30 am

Mr. Randall: It is a fact of life; it is more convenient. I, with a young family, could not see myself wanting to go shopping on Christmas day, but I can understand that, sadly, there are people who do.

I want to approach the situation from the viewpoint of those who have to go to work on Christmas day. The point that I tried to make with regard to the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire about the later hour of unloading is genuine: people will have to come in, and they might not want to be there at 9 o'clock, because in fact they will probably have to be there just before. But equally it could be that the sooner they get on with it, the sooner they can go home. The snag is that it is impossible to legislate for that. It is actually down to the good will of the people who are doing these operations.

Most of the concerns we are talking about are responsible. However, sometimes, to get one step ahead of the competition, they are inclined to do things that perhaps they should not, and it becomes a bit of a bidding war about which days they open and at what time. Who would have thought a few years ago that we would have 24-hour opening in supermarkets? I still cannot quite get my head around who wants to go shopping at 3 o'clock in the morning, but I have found people who have done it because they thought there would be shorter queues or something, and I can understand that.

My wife does not let me go shopping very often because I tend to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now going very wide of the amendment. Perhaps he would confine his remarks to it.

Mr. Randall: I am extremely sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker, and of course I will revert to the unloading time.

Although I have a great deal of sympathy with those who would like to change the hour, bearing in mind also the result that the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) has just mentioned and which other colleagues have talked about, I do not think that it will make much difference, because even if the large lorries are not to be unloaded at 10 am they may still arrive at 8.45, and it would be virtually impossible to legislate for that. It is a great pity that, for example—I hope this is still in order—there are plans in my constituency for a very large supermarket, and they are planning to put housing on top of it. We all know that we want housing, but those people who are living on top of that supermarket will have to—

Mr. Kevan Jones: Would not large lorries delivering to a store and leaving their engines running for an hour beforehand be covered by complaints that local residents could make under, for example, noise legislation? That is clearly not covered by the Bill, but surely it would be covered by other powers that local authorities have and could enforce?

Mr. Randall: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Noise of that level would probably not be covered. I am not an expert on the subject. It has nuisance value. There is a lot of ambient noise around—it seems to have increased over the years—but it probably is not covered by noise regulations, because it must be pretty loud to be covered.

I believe that the Bill should be welcomed by us all. I am sad in a way that it has to be necessary; I had hoped that people would realise that there are times when perhaps one should resist the urge to go shopping. I will try not to be sidetracked into discussing one of my favourite subjects, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, when I saw the hon. Gentleman on Parliament square this morning surrounded by Father Christmasses, my heart melted and I thought to myself that we must ensure that the Bill passed today. Therefore I will be urging my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire to withdraw his amendment.

Although in an ideal world the local authority takes consideration of matters such as lorries sitting with their engines running, I am worried about the variation that we have just been discussing. A case could be made for unloading earlier, and very often, unfortunately, the decisions are taken not by councillors but by council officers, who are not directly reliant on their electorate's votes. I know of decisions that have been taken which I think the elected representatives did not want, but which the officers sometimes felt to be appropriate; that is the politest way I can put it. Therefore I do not think on this occasion we should give councils those powers.

Mr. Greg Knight: My hon. Friend has great experience in this area and I think the House would value hearing from him at what times vehicles load and unload at his own shop premises. What is the earliest he will accommodate deliveries at his business and what is the latest hour in the day? That would help to give us a picture of how one large shop operates.

Mr. Randall: We have a system which my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) alluded to, which we call "booking in", so that we know in advance who is coming in. Because we are not such a large store, that will be done by and large by morning or afternoon on a particular day, in order not to have too much to unload all at once. I know from my experience of bigger stores that some of them have a very narrow window of opportunity. We open to the public at 9 o'clock. At 8.30 there are enough staff there to unload, and on many occasions I have unloaded myself when I have arrived. But—this is the point that I was trying to get to earlier—very often I will arrive at 8 o'clock in the morning to find Cricket Field road in Uxbridge clogged up with large vehicles waiting to deliver.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are discussing loading and unloading on Christmas day.

Mr. Randall: I understand that of course, Madam Deputy Speaker, but the point is that, whether it is Christmas day or any working day, drivers who want to do their job properly and be there on time will always try to get there early, and if they find that there is another lorry in front of them early, there will be clogging up. I have to say also that if they have come from abroad, as happens quite a lot these days—

Mr. Bercow: On the Autobahn.

Mr. Randall: On the Autobahn, yes, and various other ways into Uxbridge. We do even find them coming in the night before, so it is an incredible logistical problem, which is why it leads me to think that, whatever legislation we try to put in, and whatever times we try to put in, it will be very difficult to achieve the optimum, which would be some protection for the workers who are unloading, and of course the residents. I simply hope that those stores that might have been covered by such a provision will read the report of the debate and realise that there is a very real need to be responsible—to ensure that their delivery drivers and those unloading do it in a sociable way at sociable hours, do not play the radio too loudly, and do not too often shout "up your end" or "down that bit" or whatever delivery drivers are taught to say at an early stage.I think that if we were to support this amendment, unfortunately it would have the net effect of killing off an admirable private Member's Bill.

Mr. Leigh: I do not want to be the Scrooge of today's debate. I am personally very happy with the Bill; I think I spoke in favour of it and I think I originally voted, much to the disgust of other members of the no turning back group, against the Sunday Trading Act 1994. So I do not come to the House as the voice of big business and certainly have no commercial personal interest in road hauliers or big retailers. I live on Horseferry road in London, where I am driven crazy by people unloading at 5 am and so on, so I am very sympathetic to all the arguments that have been made today, but I feel duty bound, in this short debate, to strike a note of caution. That is why I think it right that somebody like me should come along and give the alternative point of view. That is what debate is all about, after all.

I often think that if normal Government legislation were debated as thoroughly as private Members' Bills are on Fridays, we should have much better legislation. We have very good debates on Fridays. One of the reasons for my occasionally taking the trouble to turn up on Fridays is that I think it right to give scrutiny to Bills generally, and particularly right to give scrutiny to Bills like this and other Bills that we consider on Fridays. They tend to be regulatory.

I hope my colleagues will forgive me for saying that there is a tendency for those who come along on Fridays to wrap themselves in moral fervour and, dare I say, play to the gallery. They tend to forget that we live in a commercial nation, and that those who run businesses, often in very difficult circumstances, have a right to be heard.

I am afraid I must tell my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) that I do not support his amendments. The obvious point has been made repeatedly this morning that if he forced them to a vote, that would effectively kill what is clearly a popular Bill. There is, however, another reason for opposing the amendments: they go too far. To be honest, I am not even very happy with the Lords amendments. I go along with the tenor of the Bill because there is plainly public support for the idea that shops should not be allowed to open on Christmas day, although I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) that people are very divided on that. As I have said, we can wrap ourselves in moral fervour and say that it is outrageous for shopkeepers to be forced to work on Christmas day, and ridiculous that anyone should want to go and shop on Christmas day. In fact, though, many people do want to do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not a Second Reading debate; we are discussing a group of amendments.

Mr. Leigh: I am worried about the Lords amendments. The Bill is fine, but they impose another layer of regulation, control and difficulties on businesses. I think that the point about loading and unloading poses a particular difficulty. As others have pointed out, Lords amendment No. 1(1) contains a confusing phrase. It states that the occupier of a shop prohibited from opening on Christmas day must not load or unload

"in connection with the trade or business carried on in the shop, unless the loading or unloading is carried on", and so forth.

To be fair to businesses, there may be circumstances in which, while they do not want to cause unnecessary inconvenience to the public, they have to do some sort of work in their shops on Christmas day. At an early point in my right hon. Friend's speech, I said that I did not really understand what was going on here. If a shop is prohibited from trading on Christmas day, why on earth should the occupier want any loading or unloading to be done? My right hon. Friend's immediate riposte was that he might be preparing to open on Boxing day, and why should he not do so? He is running a business.

Are we not pushing things too far? We have already made the point that people are to be prevented from trading on Christmas day. Fair enough: there is public support for that. But do we want to go on adding, like decorations on a Christmas tree, more and more bits to make it more and more difficult for people like my hon. Friend to run their businesses? They are not in the business of deliberately inconveniencing the public, and for all sorts of reasons it may be necessary for loading and unloading to take place on Christmas day.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend has just used a very infelicitous phrase. He said that it might be necessary for a business to load or unload on Christmas day "for all sorts of reasons"—over which, I am sorry to say, he then glossed. How many reasons are there? What are they? We ought to be told. I am not convinced.

Mr. Leigh: As I said, a business might want to open on Boxing day, or to have stock delivered. There might be a fault in the shop, or preparations might have to be made. I do not know—there are all sorts of reasons.

Mr. Randall: I do not necessarily want to side with my hon. Friend, but I can give some examples. Our shop was broken into on several occasions on Christmas eve; I had to go in on Christmas day and clear up, and—although we do not open on Boxing day—to get everything ready for the following day. I can envisage circumstances in which the occupier would need to be on the premises, and to get more stock in.

Mr. Leigh: It is useful for us today to hear from someone who has practical experience of working in retailing for 20 years. He has told us that he would never open on Christmas day. He is a local trader, completely in touch with his local community. I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), however, that there may be reasons for him to want to go in on Christmas day—perhaps to do some work on his shop—and in such circumstances loading and unloading may be necessary. Why, when so many problems confront people like my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge, should we impose another layer of control, regulation and difficulty on them?

11.45 am

I am very dubious about the Lords amendments, but I accept that they are now in the Bill. If I forced a Division, there would probably not be a quorum. Even if I had my way, the whole Bill would be killed. Therefore, I shall not push my argument.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is it not important for the quality of life of those living near supermarkets to be at least enhanced on Christmas day by a requirement for no loading before a designated hour? That is all that the amendments seek to do. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Leigh: That is an entirely fair point, but for reasons given by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge, in the real world a shop owner is not always in control of his suppliers and when they will arrive. Ensuring that they arrive at a certain time is just another thing to worry about. Now my right hon. Friend wants to make the situation even more prohibitive and difficult for such people.

The fact is that the Lords amendments will be passed, but why does my right hon. Friend want to impose even stiffer fines? He says that these are big businesses which can afford to pay. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) says that there is a history of people deliberately flouting Sunday trading regulations—but as Opposition Members have pointed out, most retailers want to operate with public support. They do not want bad publicity. What worse publicity could there be than being caught breaking the law on Christmas day? Is Sainsbury's or Tesco going to flout the law deliberately? I do not think that that is a fair point.

Even worse, my right hon. Friend wants to involve local government. My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham has a romantic view of local government as the voice of the local community, but surely, as a Conservative MP, he knows that that is not always the case.

Someone running a business does not want the burden of worrying about whether a delivery will turn up at 8.45, 9 am or 9.45. Now a local authority, perhaps playing to public opinion, may make the delivery even later. It does not add up.

For all these reasons, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire will accept that he is proposing a bridge too far, or a loading bay too far. I hope also that he will withdraw his amendments and give a fair run to business. Further, I hope that he will accept that it is our duty in the House not just always to support what seems to be what public opinion wants, but to remember that behind public opinion are those who are trying to run their businesses and provide a service to the public.

Ms Coffey: I, too, urge the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) to withdraw his amendments. I understand all the issues relating to noise on Christmas day. However, we are debating issues about noise because of the amendment to the original private Member's Bill, which basically seeks to prevent trading on Christmas day. It would be sad if we were diverted into other issues that could be the subject of another private Member's Bill, and in doing so wreck the original Bill.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on his skill in steering the Bill through this place to this stage. He has put in an enormous amount of hard work and made a huge commitment of his time to so doing. The Bill will be only the third private Member's Bill to be passed this Session. I understand that all of these Bills have been introduced by Members who came into the House in 2001. That is quite a record.

I supported the original Sunday trading Bill. The retail sector provides about a third of the jobs in my constituency, so it is extremely important. I am one of those sad people who have been known to shop on Boxing day. I feel that when we debated the Bill originally we did not think about Christmas day; we were focused on Sunday trading. I do not believe that the House would ever have wished Christmas day to become a day like any other. It is a national holiday and we must preserve it as such. I entreat the right hon. Gentleman not to prejudice the passing of the Bill, which in a few minutes could become law. That would be an historic occasion. I ask him not to put to a vote amendments that are tangential to the Bill.

Mr. Bercow: In considering the Lords amendments, we are thrice blessed. We are blessed by the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), to whose assiduity and careful preparation I enthusiastically pay tribute. We are blessed, secondly, by the presence and participation of my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who has given careful thought to the questions of loading and unloading. I discussed these issues with him at some reasonable length earlier this morning—it was some time before 9 o'clock. It is particularly welcome that my right hon. Friend has been prepared to take an interest, to become involved and to be present in the Chamber today.

I am not sure that we are very good at paying tribute to our right hon. and hon. Friends. I want to do so because my right hon. Friend's celebrity in this place should not be understated. He is a former Deputy Chief Whip. The fact that someone who has been a senior member of the Government machine can, nevertheless, trouble himself to come to the House on a Friday and take part in a narrow but important debate, in terms of the impact on human life and the local environment, is much to his credit.

I said thrice blessed because I was concerned that proper recognition would not be paid to the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). It is extremely welcome that the former Secretary of State for Work and Pensions—a prominent Brown ally and a man of noted significance in the House—should take part in a debate on loading and unloading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman might now limit his remarks to the amendment and not extend them to personalities in the Chamber.

Mr. Bercow: Of course, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was referring to personality only, as you will readily concede, I am sure, as a prelude to the observation that the right hon. Gentleman has a substantial retail and industrial set of facilities within his constituency. Therefore, he speaks today not only out of parliamentary consideration for others but on the basis of some background knowledge and concern.

Let us be clear. In thinking about the issues that are raised by the amendments, we on the Opposition Benches face a peculiar dilemma. That dilemma has been animadverted to periodically by several of my right hon. and hon. Friends. On the one hand, we are the party of free enterprise, individual initiative, entrepreneurship and capitalism. On the other hand, we are the party that has a particular regard for national tradition, the significance of Christmas and the legitimate demands of quietude. In that sense, it is quite difficult to know on which side of the argument we should fall.

[Mr. Bercow]

On this occasion, I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh). I usually do so but not on moral matters, on which my hon. Friend is almost invariably wrong. I think that he has jumped to the wrong conclusion. He is concerned that the effect of the regulation on loading itself, and at least as importantly, if not more so, the effect of the amendment that would allow for the exercise of discretion and variability as to time—discretion to be exercised by local authorities, to which my hon. Friend is extremely hostile—means that we are getting into the business of over-regulation.

The basis for my hon. Friend's concerns about the loading and unloading amendments is derived from the legendary and generally wise observations of our noble Friend Lord Lawson of Blaby. Although I have not discussed loading and unloading with him, he probably more pithily than any other colleague, living or dead, encapsulated the Conservative attitude to government and business. He famously said that, as far as Conservatives are concerned, the business of government is not the government of business. As eloquently described by the American observer, Walter Lippman, in a different way—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think we understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. Again I ask him to comment on the amendments.

Mr. Bercow: I certainly will, Madam Deputy Speaker; I am itching to do so.

In a free society, the state does not administer the affairs of men and women, but it does administer justice among men and women who conduct their own affairs. That is the basis for the belief that, now and again, the state can legislate properly to protect the local or national interest.

There is a good argument for having a restriction on loading. It strikes me as very unsatisfactory that we should leave open the possibility that such conduct should take place on Christmas day. If, in fact, there is a real risk that such behaviour will be widespread, we are entirely justified—in a sense, as an anticipatory and preventive measure—in legislating against it. We know that we are anticipating legislating against, and helping to prevent or deter, what would otherwise be a widespread and socially unacceptable practice.

If, on the other hand—as I think is the sense of the point expressed by my hon. Friend—it is not very likely that the activity will take place on a significant scale, my conclusion would be: what conceivable objection can businesses have to our including a modest amendment with no significant costs in a Bill that we otherwise agree is very good? The regulatory impact assessment is of the essence here. If we consider the issue in the way that the Government and Opposition traditionally do in terms of the regulatory impact-assessment—what the consequences for business will be and what the costs imposed will entail—it is pretty clear that the impact will be extremely modest.

Mr. Gale rose—

Mr. Bercow: I believe that my hon. Friend is twitching.

Mr. Gale: When I spoke, my hon. Friend appeared to share my concern about the powers of the local authority under the Lords amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) painted a lovely vision of queues of German lorries trailing back down the side roads of Uxbridge waiting for the gates of Randall's to open. I had an even lovelier vision of slumbering German lorry drivers being awoken at 4 o'clock in the morning by young Oliver Bercow banging his first Christmas drum. However, to put that to one side, has my hon. Friend any concept of how long the unloading process will take? I see a situation in which a local authority varies to an earlier hour and there is a cacophony of sound from unloading from the early hours of the morning until possibly midday on Christmas day.

Mr. Bercow: As is usually the case, my hon. Friend, whose perspicacity in the House is legendary, has effectively expanded the parameters of the debate. I am grateful to him for doing so. On the basis of the evidence that I have thus far adduced, it is more likely that little Oliver will be making a speech on Christmas day than banging a drum. There is an element of heredity in these matters, and he is more likely to copy me in that respect. I have no drum-playing skills of note.

My hon. Friend has highlighted the important point that there may not be enormous abuse around the country, but it is perfectly possible that there will be concentrations of activity in particular areas. That is perfectly sufficient to irritate and disrupt the lives of many people on Christmas day. Many right hon. and hon. Members might be inclined to wear their halos and say, "What are Conservative Members bothered about? No large retailer in my constituency would dream of behaving in this way for fear of provoking local consternation and damaging business, causing undue and adverse publicity." We know as legislators that it takes only a relatively small number of recalcitrants to cause untold misery.

As far as the Uxbridge area is concerned, from my fairly regular experience of the A40, travelling to and from my Buckingham constituency, I can well imagine that there could be a substantial gathering of vehicles moving towards the intended destination to load or unload, and that the noise would be considerable. I do not think for one moment that my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) would be a willing sponsor of such antisocial behaviour, but I can perfectly concede that others might be. We must have—I say this as a passionate believer in free enterprise capitalism—a protective cloak of legal regulation that guards against the danger that those who have no regard for the interests of others will abuse a loophole in the law to advance their own interests.

Mr. Greg Knight: In passing, if Oliver does want a drum lesson, I am happy to give him a free one.

Will my hon. Friend put our hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) right when he says that the problem is primarily one of unloading? The scope of the problem includes loading and many large shops have waste to remove, such as food that is out of date. It is not just a case of big vehicles unloading.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful for the offer of the free lesson, but I will not dwell on it because I would probably incur your disfavour, Madam Deputy Speaker. The thought of your usually shining countenance being transformed into an expression of disapproval is something that I find too unattractive to contemplate.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend has drawn attention to the possibility of loading. The omission by my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) was entirely inadvertent. My right hon. Friend is right that loading can take place. I had not thought of the other unattractive accompanying consequence of a considerable and possibly potent smell. That is the ugly spectre that he conjures up, and I do not like the sound or the smell of it. It certainly could happen and we should legislate to avert that eventuality.

On amendment (b), which deals with discretionary hours, I hope that my right hon. Friend will not think that I am abandoning him. I said, although I do not feel bound by it, that I was minded to support the amendments, but I was under a misapprehension. I thought that the variability amendment on hours was variability allowing for later loading or unloading. The thought had not occurred to me that it might be possible, under the aegis of this otherwise well intentioned discretion-based amendment, for loading to take place substantially earlier. That is simply not acceptable to me and I think he will find that it is not acceptable to a good many other Members either.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Variability is down to the local authority. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that paragraphs 7(a) and (b) of schedule 3 of the Sunday Trading Act 1994 contain powers that enable the local authority to revoke consent, first, if the applicant has committed an offence in breach of its conditions, and, secondly and more importantly, if the local authority is satisfied that consent given to loading and unloading has caused undue nuisance to local residents?

Mr. Bercow: That is welcome, though precisely what its practical impact would be is rather uncertain, to put it mildly. I was keen to underline that it should be possible—I believe that it is—to take a mixed view on the merits of the amendments. I was a little concerned by the general drift of the argument of the hon. Member for North Durham, ably supported by the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey), which was that we ought simply to accept the Bill, and any attempted amendment would risk the Bill being lost, with all the sad consequences that would flow from that.

I do not think that we ought to legislate in haste on this matter; it is more important to get the Bill right. Although, as I have indicated, one of the amendments I do not think desirable, and it may be desirable to amend it or substitute another for it, Amendment (a), which would shift from 9 am back to 10 am the permitted time at which loading or unloading could take place, seems thoroughly sensible. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for North Durham, in his legitimate and thirsty quest for legislative satisfaction, will not conclude that anyone who offers a differential view on the various amendments before us is somehow threatening the advance of his Bill. I would like nothing more than to be able, metaphorically or actually, to pat the hon. Gentleman on the back and congratulate him on the successful passage and translation into law of his Bill, but we must get it right and he must not be too impatient.

Mr. Jones: I concur with the hon. Gentleman: we must get the Bill right. Certainly, on Second Reading and on Report, I, as the promoter, have been conscious of the need to take on board the points made in debate. That is why we are considering a Lords amendment. The spirit in which I have tried to ensure the Bill's passage has been one of trying to compromise where possible.

Mr. Bercow: Compromise where possible; legislation if and when necessary. It is desirable that we should legislate, but it is necessary that we do so to best possible effect.

Mr. Greg Knight: My hon. Friend is making a speech of the highest order, but will he address my concerns about his remarks on amendment (b)? Surely the local authority in any area is the body best placed to make a decision about what will be acceptable to people who reside in the area. Amendment (b) is loosely drafted precisely to give local authorities that freedom. It may be that because of some event in the locality a local authority wants all loading carried out in the morning, rather than dragging on into the afternoon.

Mr. Bercow: I accept with due humility the possibility that my right hon. Friend is right and I am not. My only concern on this point derives from my belief that there is a great difference between the quality of local government to be found in the county of Buckinghamshire and that which is regularly on display, to its considerable discredit, in other parts of the country. I know that I will have enthusiastic agreement on this matter from my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve).

I do not want to make the point too forcefully—I am not a member of the council, so I am not in any sense congratulating myself—but Aylesbury Vale district council, under which my constituency falls, is an authority of the highest order, and its good burghers would not dream of behaving in an antisocial way. The same might also be said of Buckinghamshire county council. Some local authorities, however, seem inclined to make decisions of such bewildering stupidity and antisocial character that there is something to be said for Parliament adopting a belt-and-braces approach to deny them the opportunity to do so.

[Mr. Bercow]

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire might not like my answer or think it satisfactory, but it is an answer, and a clear and honest one at that. I do not wish to tax your patience, Madam Deputy Speaker, or that of other right hon. and hon. Members, and I am sure that they will all be pleased to know that my speech is now at an end.

Mr. Grieve: It can, I am sure, be said that scrutiny of this Bill has not been lacking in thoroughness. As the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) knows, his Bill enjoys the blessing and support of the official Opposition, because we believe that it was a mistake to fail to deal properly with Christmas day opening when Sunday trading was debated and the Bill goes a long way towards rectifying that mistake.

Today, we have carefully examined the Lords amendments to the Bill. It seems to me that they are in spirit extremely well intentioned. However, I share some of the concern that my right hon. and hon. Friends have voiced about whether Lords amendment No. 1 covers well enough the mischief that needs to be addressed. The argument is that the drafting leaves loopholes whereby a large number of deliveries could take place at a store because the goods in question are not part of "the trade or business carried on in the shop".

That argument has some force. The difficulty is that we must not be unfair to those who run stores.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) touched on the point that sometimes it will be necessary urgently to carry out works or bring supplies to a store on Christmas day because some problem has arisen. I recollect that at least one of the really notable snowstorms that took place during the 19th century occurred on Christmas eve. Although such events might be a thing of the past owing to global warming, they could reoccur and result in damage being caused to premises that require repair. To prevent a person from bringing to a store a load of tiles to replace those that had been ripped off the roof by a high wind would clearly be undesirable. Although the new clause makes provision for getting the local authority's consent to operating at an earlier hour than the one set down, it is stretching credulity to imagine that in the early hours of Christmas morning it will be easy to get the local authority to take a rapid decision in one's favour on altering the regulations.

Mr. Leigh: One of the difficulties of our procedure is that it is now almost too late to deal with the problem. However, we could have resolved it by inserting after the words "on that day". Doing so would have prevented people from loading or unloading before 9 am simply to facilitate that day's delivery, but allowed them to deal with leaks or disasters.

"trade or business carried on in the shop"

Mr. Grieve: It may indeed be too late, because the House must reach a decision on whether it wishes to prolong the debate and thereby lose the Bill. However, I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Inserting the words "on that day" would mean that there should be no activities relating to the Bill taking place on that day, because the Bill prohibits Christmas day trading except for certain exempted premises. We would thereby create a loophole. In addition, I am not sure that the words he suggests would add much to the Bill. If I have misunderstood my hon. Friend's point, I am sure that he will intervene to clarify it.

The amendment proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) to change from 9 to 10 o'clock the hour at which such activities may commence seems to me to have a considerable degree of force. However, it must be seen in the context of whether such a late amendment, carrying with it the near certainty that the Bill would be lost, is justified. I must tell my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire that any resulting improvement would be wholly negated by losing an extremely important measure, and I hope that he considers that carefully before pressing his amendment to a vote.

Another of my right hon. Friend's thoughtful proposals, amendment (b), allows a local authority to "vary the time at which loading or unloading goods under subsection (1) may commence."

However, it does not add very much to the Lords amendment. His concern that the fine for loading is only set at level 3 on the standard scale has much more force. I agree wholeheartedly that a fine of £1,000 is derisory, given the commercial activities that take place in large retail premises. Indeed, even a level 4 fine of £2,500, as was suggested, may be inadequate. I am afraid that I must part company with my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), who takes an elevated view of the morality that prevails among people who run large commercial organisations. My own professional experience of undertaking a considerable amount of enforcement work for local authorities in the planning and regulatory sphere persuades me that that morality is, generally speaking, non-existent if people can make a neat calculation that the fine is far less than their profit from continuing with the activity in flagrant violation of the law. I witnessed such behaviour on many occasions, and I hope that I do not digress if I say that it is a problem that the House will have to tackle in future. While there is indeed provision to secure injunctions against repeat offenders, the procedure is ponderous and difficult. It is only used as a last resort and is extremely costly, so many local authorities hesitate to invoke it. We need to look again at simplifying the system, so that if someone commits two or three offences an automatic injunction can be granted somewhere other than the High Court, violation of which would lead to imprisonment. If the Government introduced such proposals, many hon. Members and I would welcome them, because I am afraid that the law is repeatedly violated in a number of regulatory areas.

The House therefore faces a choice. Commendably, the Lords amendment has gone some way towards meeting the criticisms on Report that loading is not included in the Bill. We have performed the valuable exercise of highlighting other ways of approaching the problem, and the Minister's advisers and people who work in back offices considering matters suitable for future legislation may find it useful. However, I very much hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire will not find it necessary to put his amendment to the vote. I hope that he and the House accept the Lords amendment, enabling the Bill to complete its passage and become law.

Mr. Sutcliffe: It is a privilege and a pleasure to join the debate and speak on behalf of the Government on the Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) on securing the opportunity to introduce the Bill and on the immense amount of work that he has done, which is evident not only in today's proceedings, in Committee and on Report, but from his deep involvement with many organisations and bodies that he consulted on the scope of the Bill. I refer particularly to my hon. Friend's work with the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers and other representative bodies that had an interest in the Bill.

I put on record my thanks to the many right hon. and hon. Members who contributed throughout the lifespan of the Bill, and especially today—the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), to whom I shall return, the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) and the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who is no longer in his place. It was interesting to hear them speak from their technical knowledge of these matters. I, too, was once a shop worker for two years after leaving school, so I can speak with some knowledge of the issues. We have had a wide-ranging debate on the Lords amendments and those tabled by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire.

I thank the business managers for ensuring that the Bill was afforded sufficient time to be amended, debated and returned to the House for consideration. The agreement reached on those procedural matters demonstrates a shared concern in both Houses to preserve the special nature of a tradition that the majority in this country value highly.

As I said in our previous discussion of the Bill, the overwhelming support expressed in the House and the other place is further evidence of the desirability of the Bill, and reflects its popularity among the public, as has been said. Given the rapid and wide-ranging pace of change in many spheres of modern life, I am not surprised that the preservation of something that provides a collective sense of identity and shared experience should resonate with the public. Maintaining the special nature of Christmas day contributes to that nationally and at a more personal and local level provides the opportunity to unite both the immediate and extended family. That is a social good which it is important to preserve.

On Report Opposition Members tabled a number of amendments, two of which were discussed in some depth. Those who were present may recall that the amendments were not accepted at that time, for what could be described as technical reasons. I signalled a preference to take an informed look into the possible consequences, were the amendments to be accepted in one form or another. I therefore undertook to consider the two proposed amendments and make changes accordingly subject, of course, to parliamentary time and with the benefit of consultation.

The first amendment, which was proposed by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire, was to include large pharmacies in the list of exemptions to a prohibition on opening. In particular, he proposed that where there was currently an exemption for pharmacies whose trading consists solely of medicinal or surgical appliances under the Sunday Trading Act 1994, that should be amended to read "mainly" those products. In assessing the practical implications of the amendment, my Department made some limited inquiries and found that currently no pharmacies match this description.

It is interesting that the type of shops that I believe the right hon. Gentleman had in mind are not in favour of the proposed amendment. For example, Boots expressed a preference to continue opening its pharmacy counters while cordoning off the remainder of the store. This is what Boots currently does on Sundays and what it has signalled that it will continue to do on Christmas day. Hon. Members may recall that my main concern was that pharmacy services should continue to be delivered on that day, and I believe that that will still happen. By maintaining the status quo, not only is that achieved, but the potential for undermining the purpose of the Bill is averted.

The second amendment at that time was proposed by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and related to loading and unloading at large shops on Christmas day. I miss the right hon. Gentleman's presence during the debate. He demonstrated a lively involvement on Report and I add my congratulations to those of my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham. During the discussion that day, it was remarked that private Members' Bills allow for detailed scrutiny, for whatever motivation may drive right hon. and hon. Members to do that. I acknowledge the role that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst has played.

The regulation of loading and unloading by large shops was covered by the Sunday Trading Act 1994 but was not carried over into the Bill. In discussing the right hon. Gentleman's amendment, I recall that the House agreed that it was not only consistent with the aims of the Bill, but was an extension of the logic of preserving the special nature of Christmas day. That is why the Government amended the Bill in the other place and we all agreed on the merits of the proposal.

The core amendment would simply prohibit loading and unloading before 9 am on Christmas day in areas designated by the local authority as loading control areas. They would be the same as those designated under section 2 of the Sunday Trading Act 1994. A person contravening such a prohibition would be liable to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, currently £1,000. Debate centred on the relevance of that amount.

To achieve that prohibition, several minor consequential amendments were made, such as changing the long title to include the words "loading or unloading". The principal benefits of the amendments, and indeed the reason that many consider Lords amendment No. 1 an improvement, is that they would reduce the risk of Christmas morning becoming a noisy affair for people living in close proximity to large shops.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

Like Sunday, when such provisions already apply under the 1994 Act, Christmas day is always considered a day when ordinary weekday sounds are not welcome. We have heard some good examples this morning of the type of sounds that people feel are unwelcome—the banging of drums and so on. Most of us would not relish waking to the sound of pneumatic road tools on a Sunday and we would also agree that the noise emitted by lorry engines, refrigeration units and manoeuvring forklift trucks would be an unwelcome feature of Christmas morning.

Although the provisions of the 1994 Act are not widely applied by local authorities, nor do many large shops open on Christmas day at present. As has been said, the Bill is a pre-emptive measure and giving local authorities the power to prohibit loading and unloading on Christmas day must also be considered as such. Although most local authorities from our consultation sample confirmed that they had not used the provisions under the Sunday Trading Act, they none the less all believed that the proposal was a good and sensible idea. That is certainly the case when one considers that in preparation for the busy sales period beginning on Boxing day many large shops will, in practice, be tempted to load and unload before 9 am.

The Lords amendments are both necessary and worth while and I thank the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst for raising those matters on Report.

Mr. Greg Knight: Can the Minister tell us why he feels that the words are essential?

"in connection with the trade or business carried on in the shop"

Mr. Sutcliffe: We believe that they maintain the scope of the Bill. There is a direct link to the provisions of the Sunday Trading Act and, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham pointed out earlier, we would be going beyond that if we changed the words significantly. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman accepts that.

I noted the right hon. Gentleman's points about the change from 9 to 10 o'clock, but again we were asked for consistency—joined-up government. A change would make the position different from that in the Sunday Trading Act.

Mr. Grieve: It seems to me that those words—

"in connection with the trade or business"— are the correct ones, because they cover bringing in not only goods that are to be sold but also hoardings, advertising material and other related things. They would not cover—properly—the need to bring in bricks or material to repair the structure if it had been damaged during the night.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Exactly. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making those points and to the Opposition for their support for the Bill.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister respond to the point I made? The amendment deals with large shops that do not open on Christmas day but does not actually cover loading and unloading restrictions on the few large shops that will be exempt from the controls and will be able to open on Christmas day.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Under the legislation, it will be small shops that are exempt. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham about the existing restrictions and regulations that local authorities can apply. There would be no significant move away from that.

The key point is the pre-emptive nature of what we are trying to achieve. If one big store opened the rest would feel obliged to do so, too, and that is why the legislation is vital.

I was asked who will deal with enforcement. Clearly, the various local authority departments, including trading standards departments, will deal with that issue. Fines will be consistent with those in the Sunday Trading Act 1994.

I am grateful to Members for the way in which they have discussed the Lords amendment and the amendments tabled by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire. I am also pleased that we discussed shop workers being disadvantaged at Christmas time—even though we did not focus on that issue—when the rest of us are able to enjoy the festivities. This is a major Bill affecting shop workers, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) for their comments on them.

I respectfully ask the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire to withdraw his amendments, as he has been urged to do by Labour Members and many of his colleagues, notwithstanding the sincerity with which he tabled them. I ask the whole House to support the Lords amendment and to give the Bill good passage.

Mr. Greg Knight: We have had a very good debate and there have been a number of powerful speeches, including in particular those by my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and for North Thanet (Mr. Gale). The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) also made an excellent contribution, as did the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) and my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) made a very passionate speech, although it will come as no surprise to him to learn that I do not agree with his conclusions.

I want also to pay tribute to the Minister. When we were last here debating this subject, I raised a number of issues with him, as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), whose ghost, I feel, is with us, even though he is not. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] I understand that he is on a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association visit, looking at trading practices overseas.

Mr. Dismore: Where?

Mr. Knight: I am not prepared to say where.

Mr. Leigh: Yet our right hon. Friend is the man who constantly derides the rest of us for not being in our place and for not being good parliamentarians.

Mr. Knight: I do not want to go there, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. It may just be that a question of security is involved in keeping the whereabouts of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) quiet. [Laughter.]

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to you for your protection and suggestion, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I pay tribute, as I said, to the Minister. The concerns that we raised with him when we were last here were genuine, and he undertook to look at them. Most unusually for this Government, he did indeed do so. He also said that he would contact me, which he did, and he also contacted my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst. Indeed, he went even further. Where he thought it appropriate, he acted on the concerns expressed by arranging for an amendment to be moved in another place. I hope that I will not blight his future career in saying that he has behaved impeccably throughout this process. We are delighted that he has done so.

I did have a number of concerns about the wording of the Lords amendment, particularly, as I have mentioned several times before, the inclusion of the phrase

"in connection with the trade or business carried on in the shop", but the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) have convinced me that I need not worry about that, so I am happy with the scope of the Lords amendment.

Most commonly in this place, one tables an amendment or new clause and argues why it is necessary, only to hear the ministerial response and realise that one's concerns are unfounded. Of course, one is then happy and willing to withdraw it. What has happened today has not quite followed that usual procedure. Conservatives have argued why amendments (a), (b) and (c) should be accepted, and those arguments were overwhelming. The Minister has done nothing to make me think that they are any less compelling.

Secondary issues are not normally our main concern in this place, because we are legislating and seeking to get such legislation right. But I accept that our procedural rules could cause a difficulty for the Bill that might prove fatal, were I to press my amendments to a vote. Someone said earlier that the hon. Member for North Durham is a political virgin. Well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I do not want to put myself in the way of his first consummation, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 6 agreed to.

Mr. Gale: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier this morning, a point of order was raised with your colleague about the publication of a report on housing in the east of England. You will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in view of the location of your constituency, of the importance of that report. Your colleague was asked whether any Minister had expressed a wish to discuss the report before the House. The answer was no. Can you tell the House whether, by now, any indication has been given to Mr. Speaker that a statement will be made on Monday?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid that I know nothing that I can add to what has already been said from the Chair. I am not aware that any notification has been given. If there were any intention to make a statement to the House, no doubt a request to do so would reach Mr. Speaker on Monday.

Crown Employment (Nationality) Bill

Not amended in Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

APPEALS

'(1) A person who is ineligible to be employed or hold office in a civil capacity under the Crown by reason of the rules made under section 2 ("the rules") may appeal to a Crown Employment (Nationality) Rules Tribunal ("the Tribunal") for an exemption from the rules.

(2) In determining an appeal the Tribunal may recommend to a Minister of the Crown (or any person or body to whom the power has been delegated under section 2(3)) that an exemption to the rules be made.

(3) The Secretary of State shall make regulations with the respect to the composition, conduct and operation of the Tribunal.

(4) The Secretary of State may not make regulations under this section unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(5) The power to make regulations under this section is exercisable by statutory instrument.'—[Mr. Chope.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause would effectively introduce some control over the very open wording of clause 2. To show how wide-ranging that clause is, one could do worse than quote the promoter of the Bill in Committee on 7 June. It was all too brief a sitting on Monday 7 June. All that was said about clause 2 was:

"The clause is the mirror image of clause 1 in that it gives Ministers the power to make rules in respect of the nationality requirements of certain categories of post, which I envisage are those where it is clearly necessary in the national interest for a job to be reserved for a UK national. Those would account for about 10 per cent. of civil service posts. It is expected that the Bill would open up about 90 per cent. of posts to selection on merit, regardless of nationality. That would enable us to build a civil service that reflects the diversity of the society that it serves."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 7 June 2004; c. 9.]

That was the full extent of the Committee debate on this wide-ranging clause.

Clause 2 confers the power to impose new nationality requirements, stating:

"Rules may be made imposing requirements as to nationality, which must be satisfied by a person employed or holding office in a civil capacity under the Crown specified in the rules."

It continues:

"The rules may also impose requirements as to nationality which must be satisfied by persons of a description specified in the rules who are related to, or living with, such a person."

The rules, it continues, may be made by a "Minister of the Crown" or by somebody effectively under his control and may include provision for some exemptions.

The problem is that there is no control at all, as the clause stands, over the way in which the Minister or the person or body to whom power has been delegated by a Minister exercises that power. Indeed, there is an absolute discretion vested in the Minister, or someone beholden to him, to make rules as he sees fit. The implications of those rules could be very serious.

The first scenario I shall describe is that of someone who wishes to take up employment but is barred from doing so under the rules. Without new clause 1, that person would have no remedy. He would be at the mercy of Government fiat. However, under the new clause, if the person were concerned about the decision that had been reached, he would be able to appeal to a Crown employment nationality rules tribunal for an exemption from those rules. The tribunal would be able to listen to the evidence and decide to make a recommendation to a Minister or any person to whom the power had been delegated by the Minister that an exemption should be made.

The Secretary of State would be required to make regulations about the composition, conduct and operation of the tribunal and he would not be allowed to make regulations unless a draft of the regulations had been laid before and approved by resolution of each House of Parliament. That power to make regulations would be exercisable by statutory instrument.

In the scenario that I have described, the person who wanted to apply for a post but found that rules had been made under clause 2 that prevented him from taking up that post would be able to apply to a tribunal for an exemption. The second scenario I shall put before the House is possibly more serious and demands some proper redress, as provided in new clause 1. What happens if someone is already in employment or holds office under the Crown and the rules are changed by the Minister, thus barring that person from the job that he has been doing, perhaps for many years? Under the Bill as drafted, he would have no rights, unless the Minister volunteered to exempt him.

In that situation, the Minister could decide, on a day-to-day basis, the nationality of those eligible to be Crown civil servants. The Minister could change the rules, and people who were already civil servants could be disqualified from holding their positions. There is a good introduction to the problems that could be faced by employees of the Crown in today's news about what has been happening in Uzbekistan. I do not know whether the Government would intend to include nationals of Uzbekistan in the list of those entitled to hold positions in the civil service under the Bill, were it to become law. If the Government did intend to do so, some people might be concerned about that in the light of the evidence provided by our erstwhile man in Tashkent, Mr. Craig Murray.

Let us suppose that Mr. Murray, or someone like him, was serving as a civil servant. He might find that the nationality of his wife became relevant. Let us also suppose that the situation in Uzbekistan went from bad to worse and the Minister decided to change the rules so that Uzbeki nationals were no longer entitled to hold office under the Crown as civil servants. Although our man in Tashkent might be a British rather than an Uzbeki citizen himself, his wife might be Uzbeki. Indeed, that might be one of the reasons why he was qualified to serve in that overseas civil service posting in Uzbekistan. Then, however, the status of Uzbekistan, under the control of the Government, might change, and that country would shift from being a country whose nationals were entitled and welcome to be members of our civil service, to being one whose citizens were disentitled, and unwelcome.

Under the wide terms of clause 2, that would read across not only to employees of the Crown, because of their own nationality, but to the nationality of their wife or husband. Somebody in the civil service who was married to a foreign national would be disqualified from their employment because the foreign national had moved from a category acceptable to the Government to an unacceptable one. Surely the least we would expect in such a situation is a right of appeal, which new clause 1 would add to the Bill.

The next possible scenario involves a relative of someone seeking employment, if a Minister decreed that their nationality was forbidden. Why should the applicant for employment be discriminated against because of the nationality of his or her relative, without recourse to having the case considered by an objective panel, as would be provided by the new clause?

The relative might be a close relative, such as a brother, sister, father or mother—and one might be able to argue that it would be in the national interest that someone with such a relative who was a national of a country hostile to this country's national interests should not be entitled to enter the civil service. However, the Bill goes wider and specifies not a close relative, but any relative. That relative could be an in-law, an aunt, a stepchild or whatever. Under the Civil Partnership Bill, which we discussed earlier this week, a relative might even include the civil partner of a brother, sister or child. Again there should be a right of appeal.

Absolute power would be vested in a Minister, and the Opposition are becoming increasingly concerned about the way in which Ministers exercise some of the powers that have been given to them.

The most dangerous scenario in terms of individual liberty, the right to employment and human rights in general involves the person already employed or holding office in a civil capacity under the Crown who finds that his sister, brother, son or daughter has chosen to marry someone of a forbidden nationality while he is serving. How can the Government think that as a consequence the person should lose their job? In any other world, people would say that that would be wholly discriminatory and unreasonable, yet under the terms of clause 2 that is exactly what could happen.

Let us suppose that someone is pursuing a career, perhaps very successfully, and they know that their child has fallen in love with a person of a prohibited nationality. Does that mean that when the son or daughter comes and asks, "Daddy, can I get married?" the father is put in the invidious position of replying, "Of course you can get married but the consequence of your getting married is that I will lose my job"? What a burden to put on a family relationship—yet that is exactly what the Bill contemplates.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I confess that I am rather alarmed by what my hon. Friend has just reported to the House. Neither of us has ever been known for an enthusiasm for matters European, but both of us are committed to the application of the law. Would not such a provision cause the Bill to become incompatible with the European convention on human rights?

Mr. Chope: I do not know. It might, but quite often when Ministers have signed off Bills, saying that they are compliant with the European convention on human rights, we find out later that they are not or may not be. However, my hon. Friend makes a valid point.

All that we can do at the moment is try to prevent the worst excesses by allowing at least a right of appeal, so that the person may seek an exemption for the situation that I have described, but it is invidious that someone should even be pushed into a position where they have to seek such an exemption, and that it would then be open to the Government to rule them out of order and to effectively terminate their contract of employment.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): But would not the same rules apply to members of the tribunal?

Mr. Chope: They would. Obviously, if the members of the tribunal were themselves foreign nationals, they could find themselves in that situation. Indeed, there might be a scenario in which the Government knew that a case was being referred to the tribunal, the tribunal's membership had been established, and the Government knew—because the Government know everything these days—the nationality not only of members of the tribunal but of their spouses and relatives close and distant. If they did not like a member of that tribunal and wanted to remove them from it by taking away their employment, they might introduce a rule with the effect that from then on, people who were married to anyone who was a North Korean citizen would no longer be eligible to serve as employees in the civil service. As a consequence, the person who would have adjudicated on the tribunal would no longer be able to do so. That is a possible scenario and, knowing the Government, I do not think that it is necessarily too far-fetched, particularly in view of the account given by our erstwhile representative in Tashkent, Craig Murray. We have to be concerned about this issue and the amount of power that clause 2 would give to the Executive, particularly Ministers.

The fifth scenario that I want to share with the House is one in which the applicant for a job is living with a person of an outlawed nationality. What if that person is qualified to become naturalised as a British citizen, but has not yet been able to do so? There will be a time gap. That is a real scenario today, and I am sure I am not the only Member to whose advice centre people have come saying that, while in the process of applying for British naturalisation, they have found that they now cannot acquire it because they must demonstrate that they can pass an English-speaking test. Those new rules were introduced in July. Although there is provision for the Government to allow authenticated persons to certify that someone can speak English, the Government have not yet got around to deciding who they might be—although there is a rumour that Members of Parliament might be included.

In any event, the process of acquiring naturalisation as a British citizen is now much more long-winded. A constituent of mine came here about 40 years ago, and has been married to a British citizen for about 25 years. She wanted to become a British citizen herself, but her naturalisation papers have been sent back to her because there is no certificate stating that she can speak English—although she has been conversing with her

[Mr. Chope]

English husband for 25 years, and has lived in this country for about 40. The situation is ironic. The test of whether an applicant can speak English is, or used to be, pretty fundamental to whether he can be employed in the civil service, but it would not be enough now—a naturalisation certificate would also be needed.

What would happen in the intervening period? Someone might say, "My partner"—or wife, or husband—"is desperately trying to obtain naturalisation, but cannot do so, so I am seeking an exemption under the rules." What will that person do if the exemption application is rejected? He or she will have no right of appeal, and I think that that is wrong.

Clause 2 includes the phrase "living with", which is an extremely broad definition. It could apply not just to people living as man and wife or even as civil partners, but could extend to any people sharing a house or flat, if not a bedroom. That throws up all sorts of examples of what could happen. Let us suppose that someone is sharing—this is the case with many young professionals such as civil servants, or aspiring civil servants—a flat in a big city with half a dozen others. According to the very wide definition in clause 2, if one of them were of a nationality verboten by the Government, the others would be disentitled to remain in the civil service, or to join it. I hope that the Minister and the hon. Member for Hendon agree that such scenarios require a remedy.

To sum up, the purpose behind the new clause is to ensure that many more people would be protected from being adversely affected by a Government arbitrarily changing the list of nationalities to be excluded from eligibility to work in the British civil service.

1 pm

As we know, what might be described colloquially as the pariah nations are always changing. There may be some pretty regular members of that group. In the eyes of many European Union countries, including the UK, Libya has recently left that group. However, it seems that Iran is coming back into the group pretty fast. North Korea is still there. Sudan may be about to enter the group, if it is not already there. I suppose that that depends on how soon the Government of Sudan will be prevented from running rings round western diplomats, as they seem to be doing so successfully at present.

Then we have Zimbabwe, with its erstwhile Commonwealth status. Is it a pariah nation? There is also the perennial Taiwan and China question. The Taiwanese are finding it extremely difficult to find any countries that are prepared to recognise their very existence, notwithstanding the length of time that they have obviously been an independent sovereign nation state.

These are the scenarios in which people might wish to apply for exemption so that they can continue in employment or obtain employment under the Crown. That brings me to subsection (2) of the new clause, which reads:

> "In determining an appeal the Tribunal may recommend to a Minister . . . to whom the power has been delegated . . . that an exemption to the rules be made."

The tribunal would not be able to impose its will on a Minister. Some right hon. and hon. Members might say, "Why should the tribunal not be able to impose its will?" I suppose the answer is that one would hope a Minister would, in the spirit of public accountability, accept a recommendation from a tribunal on such a matter. That is why subsection (2) is worded in such an open way. I do not think that any Minister could object to being subject to a recommendation by a tribunal, suggesting that perhaps discretion could have been exercised differently.

Subsection (3) gives the Secretary of State the power—indeed, the duty—to make regulations with > "respect to the composition, conduct and operation of the Tribunal."

The tribunal, although standing on its own, would probably best be considered as a body that would come under the auspices of the tribunals and inquiries Acts. It would probably need to comprise more than one person. It may be appropriate to have some expert advisers on hand to assist the tribunal in its deliberations.

The question would arise whether the tribunal should sit in public or in private because of the sensitivity of some of the issues it might be having to consider. There will be issues as to whether it would have to meet immediately because someone has sought to have their exemption upheld or the Government ruling overturned, or whether there would have to be a time lag before that. I hope that any Secretary of State tabling regulations under subsection (3) would ensure that the tribunal met almost immediately. For that reason, it might be an ad hoc, rather than a standing, tribunal. It would meet only on those occasions it was required to do so.

The issue would then arise as to whether the tribunal should listen to people in person or whether the requirement should be that they are represented by lawyers. It would probably be better to have both options available, so that people could make representations themselves or through legal counsel should they so desire. Would money be available for the costs of those who were unsuccessful before the tribunal or for those applicants who were successful? Should legal aid be available to people seeking to bring cases before the tribunal? That is another relevant issue.

We also have to consider whether the tribunal would meet only in the United Kingdom—perhaps in London or the other major capitals in the UK—or whether it could move to the location overseas where the person appealing was located. The Secretary of State would have to take account of such issues when making the regulations. I am sure that much more detail beyond that would also have to be considered.

I am just thinking aloud about the tribunal's work, but it is clear that that could be contentious territory. That is why subsections (4) and (5) make it clear that the power would have to be subject to regulations that would have to be approved by both Houses of Parliament.

The tribunal appeal system would force Ministers to behave reasonably. They would know that if they did not, their decisions and judgments could be questioned by an independent tribunal. It would also provide people thinking of or already working in the civil service with the confidence that they need not worry or have sleepless nights if their son or daughter married, let us say, a North Korean. They would know that that would not jeopardise their career. They would be sure in the knowledge that a reasonable tribunal would say that the ability of someone to serve their nation as a member of Her Majesty's civil service should not be questioned because their son or daughter chose to marry a North Korean.

I have nothing against North Korea. You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that if Members start speaking about a country, it is normally not long before a representative of that country invites them to visit it. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is not in North Korea, but I am not sure whether there is an all-party North Korean group. If there were, I certainly would have no intention of belonging to it, and I do not aspire to visit the country.

It would be wrong to single out one country, because there are more than 150 members of the United Nations. Those countries move almost overnight from being threats to world peace and security in this country to a more benign status. The Bill's only merit is that it offers flexibility in such a situation. The other side of the coin, however, is that such flexibility should not be exercised to the detriment of people who are engaged in proper employment.

The worst-case scenario would be the Foreign Office wanting to get rid of a British ambassador. It knows that he has a relative who is of a particular nationality and decides to change the rules so that anyone of that nationality or related to them is excluded from being a member of the civil service. By doing that it achieves its objective of removing the person it had set its eyes on. The tribunal process would ensure that such jiggery-pokery by the Foreign Office or any other part of the civil service would be brought to the public's attention. It may have been fanciful to contemplate such scenarios before, but we now have to do that and guard against them.

Mr. Greg Knight: The new clause has been tabled for some time. Has my hon. Friend received any indication from the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) that he is prepared to accept the provision?

Mr. Chope: I am sad to report to my right hon. Friend that I have received no communication whatever. In fairness, it may be that because my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst is the lead name on the new clause, he has been the recipient of such information. However, had the Bill's promoter wanted to discuss the merits of the new clause, he would have sought and obtained the opportunity to do so by now. In the absence of anything from the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), one assumes that he and perhaps the Government oppose it. We shall have to find out.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) has done a signal service in bringing the new clause to our attention. When the Bill came into Committee, as so often happens with private Member's business, we proceeded expeditiously on the sound basis that the best place for such a short Bill to receive scrutiny is on Report.

The hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) will recollect that I expressed reservations about the workings in practice of the proposal. Although it looks good on paper in terms of freeing up what has been called an archaic procedure, it has the consequence of leaving open an anxiety in the public's mind about what constitutes a civil servant and whether that requires a high standard of conduct and confidence in them. It also has the consequence, as has been highlighted, of doing something that we do frequently in this place. It pretends to remove what had been a blanket prohibition with very limited exceptions, but then gives Ministers power to regulate entirely as they see fit—in this case so as to pick and choose which foreign nationals may thereafter be able to work in the civil service—setting out rules that, to all intents and purposes, will be devoid of parliamentary scrutiny.

1.15 pm

That is a serious matter, because once we, as a House, pass this Bill, we surrender our scrutiny rights, and it will be for Ministers to make those regulations. There must be a fear that, in the process, people will start to consider that they have been treated unfairly. They will have had their expectations raised as to their ability to apply for a civil service job, notwithstanding the fact that they are foreign nationals. However, they will then find that they are prevented from being in that employment by potentially complex rules introduced by the Government. They might be excluded because they are of a nationality that the Government regard as dubious in relation to working in the civil service because it might prejudice their impartiality or their ability to be a loyal servant of the Crown, or, even worse, as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch pointed out, because they are married or related to somebody who falls into a category regarded as being of dubious loyalty to this country, or even as having inimical views about it. Effectively they would have no redress.

I suppose that the situation might be susceptible to judicial review, but that is a ponderous process, as we all know, and it is the only mechanism by which the Government's rules and guidelines would be capable of being tested. My hon. Friend has therefore touched on an important issue. If we are to free up the civil service in the way that the hon. Member for Hendon wants—I understand that the Government support his ideas—there ought to be a tribunal system to allow for an easy method of appeal if somebody feels that they have been unfairly excluded from taking employment with the Crown.

In Committee, I proposed a way round that, or at least one that might go some way to solving the problem. I suggested that an oath be taken by those who want to take up Crown employment in a civil capacity, on the basis that people might be uneasy about taking such an oath if they had hostile intentions towards this country. It would at least put people on the spot and require them to state publicly whether they intended to be a loyal Crown servant. That did not commend itself to the Government or the hon. Gentleman, and it was suggested to me that such an oath would present certain problems because it would have to apply to everybody, not just foreign nationals, and that could not be done in this Bill.

[Mr. Dominic Grieve]

I was therefore unable to take my idea further, but it was a matter that troubled me a great deal at the time, and the new clause goes some way towards solving the problem in a satisfactory manner. It provides for a framework of greater fairness and, above all, ensures that the Government are not simply given free rein to pick and choose which country is on the list of those prohibited. After all, such a list might change from week to week. It seems to me that an individual's country of origin has very little bearing on his likely loyalty to this country. Indeed, arguably, those who come from the countries that are most hostile to ours, and are perhaps living here as refugees, might be the keenest to serve this country and the Crown in a civil capacity and might do so extremely well. Yet in all likelihood those are the very people whom the Government will exclude, without any means of redress.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): It is precisely the people who fled Nazi Germany in the 1930s, because they hated Nazi Germany, who were interned by the Government. That makes the point that the people who are here are often those whom we should trust most.

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister how the categories of countries are to be determined and what the rationale will be. I know that the Government exercised a supportive hand in relation to the Bill. Presumably, they would not have encouraged the hon. Member for Hendon to present the Bill in its current form had they not had in mind regulations and countries that would fall within those regulations. Given that the issue has not been debated in Committee, the Minister must now give the House chapter and verse on those countries that she envisages will present difficulties.

We are talking of two different things. The first is an individual's personal characteristics, which could lead them to be turned down for work in the civil service even if they are a British national. The second is the fact that an individual is associated with a specific foreign country. The Government must already know which foreign countries they will put on the blacklist, and in the course of this afternoon's debate the House should be told which.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Is it sufficient to have a country blacklisted? There may well be within a country with a pernicious regime nationals who oppose that regime and who would therefore be perfectly acceptable.

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely. One could break down the categories. Certain segments of the population in some countries are hostile to the Governments of those countries; such people could be regarded on first assessment as likely to be extremely loyal to this country. Then again, we must face the fact that we live in a diverse world and we are all individuals. To say something pleasant about the Bill, I have always maintained that its merit is that it correctly identifies the fact that blanket prohibitions are often foolish. We highlighted in Committee examples of British citizens who in the 18th century went abroad to take service with foreign Governments, which was fully permissible because they did not have an Act of Settlement as we have. One of my forebears did precisely that in Russia. They served those foreign Governments very well, but apparently that did not interfere with their loyalty to this country, as they tended to retire here.

Concentrating on an individual's qualities or lack thereof is very sensible. However, the Bill replaces one set of prejudices with another. A blanket prohibition whereby only British nationals may be British civil servants—other than in exceptional cases, when an Order in Council has to be passed and signed to enable them to take up service—at least has the merit of having some rational sense behind it. The Bill would replace that with a system whereby the Government can pick and choose what regulatory framework they want to set up to facilitate the nationals of some foreign countries, who might turn out to be disloyal, and to disadvantage the nationals of other foreign countries, who might have served this country well.

That is why I think that the new clause proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch should be supported. Subject to the Minister's response, to which we will listen carefully, I shall support the new clause if it is pressed to a vote, and I encourage other hon. Members to do so as well.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): As has been mentioned, we are somewhat haunted by the absence of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), in whose name the amendments originally stood. I am sure that he is working extremely hard on behalf of the taxpayer—in the Maldives I think, and no doubt I shall be corrected if I am wrong.

The arguments that have been advanced in support of the new clause are disingenuous, because it is essentially about wrecking the Bill. The right hon. and hon. Members who have put their names to it have all expressed opposition in principle to the Bill. In that connection, I exclude the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), who has honourably indicated overall support for the Bill. He believes strongly that something needs to be done, but I suspect that he is somewhat out of step with the large number of Back Benchers who have queued up to try to wreck the Bill, no doubt for their own reasons.

Mr. Chope: Has a new Government doctrine spread to the Back Benches? Is it the case that anyone who seeks to amend a piece of legislation is regarded as an enemy of the people for wanting to wreck it?

Mr. Dismore: Certainly not. I suspect that some Opposition Members may be here today as enemies of the hon. Member for Hendon, given my track record on Fridays, but I certainly have not adopted such a doctrine. However, based on previous occasions on which the Bill was discussed, I believe that certain Members, including the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, have no time whatsoever for the notion of a multicultural society and will do everything that they can to frustrate the progress of the measure.

I am neutral about the amendment, and understand the arguments behind it, although some of them are a little disingenuous and far-fetched. We must keep our feet on the ground. As the hon. Member for Beaconsfield said, the rules will be subject to judicial review, the procedure for which has improved dramatically in recent years, as he will concede. It is sensible and cost-effective to use the systems already available, as setting up a new tribunal would create a new layer of bureaucracy and red tape, which the Opposition oppose. Interestingly, one or two signatories to the amendment are at the forefront of opposition to red tape but are now suggesting a new form of bureaucracy. Tribunals would be used rarely and setting them up would involve substantial costs and bureaucracy. They would not be financially viable, so we would be using a sledgehammer to crack a nut. I do not have strong feelings about the amendment, but the Government will resist it. To ensure that the Bill makes progress, as I hope it will, I will fall in behind them.

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Ruth Kelly): My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and I have had many exchanges in the Chamber on a Friday and I congratulate him, not only on introducing the Bill but on his tenacity in securing its progress. I believe that this is the furthest stage that it will manage to reach in the House but, none the less, it is an extremely good and important measure with a significant deregulatory effect. I am only sorry that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is not here to pick me up on some of the arguments I am about to make.

There has been misunderstanding about some of the Bill's proposals. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is worried about the blacklisting of certain nationalities, but the rules will not result in such a blacklisting. The Bill reserves certain posts to British citizens where necessary—a very different proposition—who are still subject to European law restrictions. Anyone taking up such a position will of course be subject to the usual security checks governing such posts. There is not an absolute power for the UK Government—not only do European law restrictions apply but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon ably pointed out, there will still be a provision for judicial review, enabling cases to be settled prior to a hearing, which is probably as effective as any industrial tribunal system.

Mr. Chope: Does the Minister not agree that judicial review is incredibly expensive to access let alone to undertake? How will people who want to become relatively junior members of the civil service engage in judicial review to secure their rights?

1.30 pm

Ruth Kelly: I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman. The judicial review process has been streamlined and there are now effective mechanisms for settling cases prior to the hearing taking place. There is no guarantee that an industrial tribunal would be any more effective. In fact, the tribunal would consider general public law principles—exactly the sort of issues that would normally be subject to judicial review. In addition, at a time when the public finances must be kept under control, it would be fiscally irresponsible to set up a duplicate mechanism—an industrial tribunal—when such a resolution mechanism already exists through the judicial review system. On those grounds, the clause should be resisted.

Mr. Chope: What a fascinating debate. We have drawn out the promoter of the Bill—he made a short contribution—and the Minister has told us where the Government stand on the matter. I am disappointed with her approach. Whatever may be the informal processes prior to a judicial review hearing, not many individuals would be prepared to contemplate the enormous financial burden and risk involved in engaging in judicial review.

I need only look at my constituency caseload of people who are dissatisfied with planning decisions. Those are people who, for the most part, have property, so they have capital against which they could borrow, but they are very reluctant to engage in judicial review, even when a decision has been taken that seems to be in breach of all natural justice. It is totally unrealistic to expect people who are teetering on the brink of joining the civil service or who are junior civil servants to engage in judicial review when they come up against the Government.

Perhaps we shall see whether our erstwhile representative in Uzbekistan seeks judicial review in order to try and remedy the gross injustice that he seems to have suffered at the hands of the Foreign Office, as reported in the newspapers today. There is a further example from another jurisdiction, which again features in this week's newspapers and concerns the European Union employee Marta Andreasen, who has been kept hanging round for years hoping that justice would be delivered and now finds that she, too, will be out of a job, because she had the temerity to criticise and whistleblow what was going on on the part of her employers.

I do not accept that it will be easy for people who are disadvantaged by the Government's proposals, particularly people from blacklisted countries, any more than it is easy for people who whistleblow against the Government.

Mr. Grieve: My hon. Friend will have listened carefully, as I did, to the Minister's comments that it was not the Government's intention to blacklist countries, but he may agree with me that if it is intended to reserve certain jobs for UK nationals, the wording of clause 2 could have been different to restrict it to that specific purpose. Although the Government have clearly indicated their intention, the rules as drafted in clause 2 would allow them to regulate much more widely.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is right to draw that to the attention of the House. That is the pattern of behaviour of the Government. They put words on paper, which are summarised orally to give the impression that they mean something different or have a more limited application. This is the last time this week that I shall refer to it, but the Civil Partnership Bill is nothing to do with civil partnerships: it is about same-sex partnerships. That is another example of the Government choosing language to create one impression, whereas a totally different impression is gained from the language they use in the small print. I share my hon. Friend's articulate critique of what the Government are about. Contrary to what the promoter of the Bill says, I can see that there is a case for rationalising the situation.

Indeed, that is what motivated many Opposition Members to support some form of amendment to the present civil service regime. However, to replace a set of firm principles, however anomalous, with a system whereby the Government would have carte blanche to do whatever they wanted would be a step in the wrong direction, especially if it was not accompanied by the protection—albeit limited—of my new clause. I shall, therefore, put new clause 1 to the test.

It appearing on the report of the Division that 40 Members were not present, MR DEPUTY SPEAKER declared that the Question was not decided, and the business under consideration stood over until the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Dismore: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Bearing in mind the fact that the Conservative party generally expressed support for my Bill, are you surprised to hear that Opposition Whips advised Conservative Members not to take part in the Division to ensure that the Bill was frustrated today? Is not that a complete negation of their position? Is it not an abuse of Parliament for Whips to engage in such practices on private Members' Bills on a Friday?

Mr. Greg Knight: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I certainly advised my right hon. and hon. Friends not to vote, but I have not been a Whip since 1996.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Many things happen at Friday sittings of this House that do not surprise me. Given the experience of the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), I would not imagine that he could ever be surprised by such things.

Sex Discrimination (Clubs and Other Private Associations) Bill

Not amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

Clause 1

DISCRIMINATION: PRIVATE CLUBS

1.51 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, line 35 at end insert—

> '29E Unreasonable works and alterations
> Nothing in the provisions of sections 29Ato 29D requires unreasonable works or alterations to be carried out on existing buildings.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 43, in page 3, line 35, at end insert—

> '29E Limit to expenditure on works and alterations
> There shall be a limit on works and alterations to facilities and buildings required by sections 29A to 29D of five per cent of the assessed value of the premises occupied by the association.'.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On inquiry at the Vote Office, it appears that there are neither notes on clauses nor an impact assessment for this particular Bill. That is a particular problem as we debate amendment No. 3, because we will not be able to quantify what might be unreasonable or incurs extra expenditure without those documents, to which the House is normally entitled. Have you any information about whether those documents are available or will be made available during the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no such information, but those documents are not always available in the case of private Member's legislation.

Mr. Chope: The previous Bill was enthusiastically supported by the Government, and we saw where they got to with it. Let us see how they do with this one.

I hope that the promoter of the Bill will accept my amendments, although I have not received any indication from him that he intends to do so. The amendments would prevent the financial burden that would fall on the clubs that would be subject to this Bill being too great. Amendment No. 3 provides that nothing in the Bill would result in the clubs having to carry out unreasonable works or alterations to existing buildings. Amendment No. 43 provides for a limit on works or alterations to facilities and buildings of 5 per cent. of the assessed value of the premises occupied by the association, which is an ingenious way of putting a limit on such expenditure. In answer to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), it does not matter what the overall cost of the Bill would be, because the limit in amendment No. 43 would apply to protect private clubs and their members.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I refer to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests on this issue.

My hon. Friend makes an interesting case for the inclusion of the amendments in the Bill, but is he aware that many clubs are in financial difficulty already? If they had to carry out substantial building works as a result of the Bill, it might prove fatal for some of them.

Mr. Chope: I agree. One of the reasons why some clubs face financial pressure is because their members want access to Sky Sports, but that company keeps putting up the cost of the service that it provides to clubs. It is now a significant burden for many clubs, although not as great as the potential burden under this Bill if it remains unamended.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): I hope to be able to respond to the hon. Gentleman's remarks in a few moments if I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the point is that the Bill relates to mixed-sex clubs, which will already have facilities for both sexes because both women and men are members of them. Why would such clubs have to spend more cash making alterations?

Mr. Chope: In that case, I see no reason why the hon. Gentleman will not accept our amendments.

David Wright: I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who summarised the amendments well in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who, we have heard, is away performing other duties today. A phrase employed during the last quarter of American football matches is the "hurry-up", and every Friday I have presented the Bill to the House I have been on what the National Football League would call the hurry-up. I do not want to detain the House too long, but I want to talk about how clubs can adapt their premises and move forward effectively to provide equal access for men and women.

The amendment would require a reasonableness test, to be judged by the courts, to assess whether clubs carrying out works had complied with the Bill. It would be an incredibly complex process for the courts to assess whether changes were reasonable, and I think that the amendment is unnecessary. I remind hon. Members that, as I said in my intervention on the hon. Member for Christchurch, the Bill would provide that clubs that already admit both men and women should treat them without discrimination. It is not about clubs being required to make extensive changes—for example, for people with disabilities who cannot gain access to premises. Such matters are subject to other legislation that we have passed in recent years to tackle discrimination against particular groups of people.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I am a reasonable man, and so is my hon. Friend—but has he given any thought to the analysis of the word "reasonable" in this context? I am not paying tribute to the late Jacques Derrida and talking about semiotic deconstruction, but surely reasonableness could mean anything we want it to. I would be glad to be reassured by my hon. Friend that the amendment is not an example of that crude tactic known as the wrecking motion.

David Wright: I could not, of course, assess whether the amendment is a wrecking motion by the Opposition, although it may well be. Their tactics on the previous Bill showed that they are capable of such behaviour.

Clearly, the Bill is about ensuring that people have equal access to mixed-sex clubs. There are many clubs that offer different levels of membership for men and women. Golf clubs often give men full membership rights and women lesser rights in terms of course time, and using bars and facilities. The Bill would give men and women equal status in membership. For example, a man would be able to apply for reduced membership rights in a golf club, with reduced green time and reduced access to bars. That seems reasonable. Women could apply for full membership and have complete rights. That seems reasonable, too. This is about allowing both men and women access to the different levels of membership.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I did not participate in the earlier debates on the Bill, so will the hon. Gentleman clarify something for me? What about all-women clubs, of which there are a number? I am trying to understand what would happen to them under the Bill.

David Wright: The Bill would apply to clubs with 25 or more members, but not to single-sex clubs. A club established purely for men or purely for women would be excluded from its scope. It is about giving equal access and treatment to men and women in clubs that purport to be open to both. So for example, in relation to a club that was merely for men, where only men could secure membership, if women were invited to an event in that club one evening they would have to be afforded equal access and equal rights on that evening, but that club would not be required to admit women members.

2 pm

Mr. Greg Knight: The hon. Gentleman has been telling us about his Bill in the round. Will he now tell us about its minutiae? Proposed new section 29A(4) states:

> "It is unlawful for an association to which this section applies, in the case of a woman who is a member or associate of the association, to discriminate against her—
> (a) in the way it affords her access to any benefits, facilities or services".

Does not that mean that if a club has a ladies' lavatory on the first floor and a gentlemen's lavatory on the ground floor, if the Bill became law the club could be forced to install an extra ladies' lavatory on the ground floor, because otherwise it would be deemed to be discriminating against them? That was the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) was seeking to make when he spoke to his amendment.

David Wright: I am grateful for the intervention. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that that would not happen under the remit of the Bill. In fact during debate on the Bill we have heard a lot about the Bill being couched in terms of she, rather than she or he; of course, under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 both apply, so the Bill would apply equally to men and to women. But as to whether a lavatory would have to be moved from a second floor to comply with the Bill, I do not think that that would be applicable here.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): Is my hon. Friend not surprised that the detailed points that have been raised by Opposition Members flow against the central thrust of the Bill, which is the issues surrounding the Sex Discrimination Act 1975? No attempt is being made to cause clubs to incur any extra costs anywhere. Is not my hon. Friend surprised that Opposition Members are focusing on these minutiae instead of accepting the principle of what we are trying to achieve?

David Wright: I totally agree with my hon. Friend. The Bill is about giving people who have been excluded from clubs that purport to be open to all members access to those clubs.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman uses the expression, "clubs that purport to be open to all members", but what are the criteria? Most clubs have their origin in a group of people deciding to set up a club. If they decide that it is for male members or for female members, that is their decision. An outsider may well look at the club and say, "Given the activities that you are doing and the sort of people that you are attracting, you should have members of both sexes." In the case of the club to which I belong, I have voted consistently to admit women—unsuccessfully, and I regret very much that that should be the case, but the fact is that it was set up as a men's club and, in my view, it is only when the men decide to change their view about that that women should be admitted.

David Wright: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his stand in relation to the club of which he is a member. This legislation would relate to clubs that are open to both sexes already. We already know that many clubs, such as working men's clubs, discriminate against women. They do not allow them to use certain bar facilities. They do not allow them to take part in annual general meetings. They do not allow them to vote in proceedings in their club. About 50 per cent. of working men's clubs currently do not allow women to participate fully, even though they open their doors to them for membership. So the Bill is about giving people access.

The amendment talks about changes to buildings. What we are trying to do here is to allow women to use the snooker room, for example. There is no particular problem in allowing women to use the snooker room or to vote at the AGM of their club or to use the golf course on the same day as men. It seems to me ridiculous, in this day and age, that women should be excluded from using the snooker room in a club purely because they are women.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is a danger that if the Bill were to become law it would encourage clubs to become single-sex clubs in order to avoid the law? The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) makes a very fair point about women-only clubs or predominantly female clubs. My brother belongs to a ladies' golf club. He chooses to do so because it is cheaper than joining a male golf club and he is perfectly happy with the arrangements that the ladies have made for him as an associate member, yet the Bill would prevent that arrangement from continuing. So the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) would be interfering with the workings of existing clubs and in danger of having the opposite effect to the one he wants, namely driving more clubs to become single sex rather than opening them up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) is making a valiant effort to speak to the amendment, but I suspect that others are making observations that would have been better made on Second Reading.

David Wright: I value your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Having considered the issues pretty extensively in Committee and before that, I acknowledge the point made by the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce).

Throughout the Bill's progress, assurances have been given—by the Government, indeed—about the provision of a reasonable transition period for clubs that need to carry out works. I hope that, on that basis, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) will accept that the amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. Fallon: The hon. Gentleman now seems to be contradicting his earlier statement that not much work would be required, and the Minister's assertion that not much expense would be involved. He cannot have it both ways. If not much expense is involved and the transition period is relatively short, why will he not accept the amendment, with its test of reasonableness?

David Wright: I do not believe that there is a significant amount of work to be undertaken. Clubs have approached me and told me that they would like a transition period relating to the entire Bill. If that were to apply, they would want to consider the elements covered by the amendment in that context.

The Royal & Ancient golf club at St. Andrews has covered much of the ground in lobbying over the Bill. It has come up with the notion that clubs would have to address issues of > "design, layout and decoration so as to accommodate the different tastes of the male and female membership".

A court would find it very difficult to determine what type of wallpaper men or women would prefer in their club. Is that what is meant by a test of reasonableness? It would mean an incredible waste of court time for clubs and other organisations attempting to block the Bill.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Clause 4 gives the Secretary of State power to introduce transitional arrangements.

David Wright: I was trying to stick to the amendment, as you insisted I should, Mr. Deputy Speaker; but clause 4 does indeed cover the point.

The key question is not whether the decoration in a bar is appropriate to men or to women. In many mixed-sex clubs, women are not even allowed to go into the bar. I am all in favour of women being allowed to go into a bar and buy a drink—I am sure we all agree about that—but I do not think that the decoration of a club bar is particularly important.

I do not accept that the transition period would involve significant costs. I think that the amendment is entirely unnecessary, and I hope it will be resisted.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) for clarifying one or two points that I raised with him. I will confine my remarks to the amendment, although in doing so I may have to touch on some slightly wider issues.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's motivation in concentrating on clubs that admit members on a differential or two-tier basis, or prohibit members of one sex from using certain parts of the club. The Bill, however, constitutes a flagrant interference in private rights—the right of people to form their own associations and their own rules for the purpose of sociability. If they want to establish a club for both men and women but to allow only men to use the bar, that is entirely a matter for them.

Moreover, the Bill's wording—this is why the amendment is absolutely right—will undoubtedly lead to knock-on financial consequences in terms of building work that will have to be carried out. I think it appalling that Parliament should legislate to dictate to people about the need to spend money. As a consequence, many of these clubs will revert to single sex male clubs, which I regard as socially undesirable. The mixing of the sexes, where people wish to do it, is a good thing. I support the amendment; it is sensible. It is wrong that if the Bill is to be enacted, which I hope it is not, the consequence will be to require clubs to carry out works or alterations at the cost of the membership.

Mr. Fallon: The amendment is not only sensible but necessary. Long-established clubs may well be in long-established buildings that are listed and therefore involve much more expense when alterations have to be made.

Mr. Grieve: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

This piece of proposed legislation is the triumph, to an extent, of good intentions, or high moral intentions, over reality. At every level, it will penalise people in terms of their private associations. That is a deplorable state of affairs. If we cannot stop the passage of the Bill, which I hope we may be able to do, we should certainly regard the amendment as a step in the right direction.

Malcolm Bruce: I concur with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). I, too, was not present when the Bill was considered on Second Reading. I shall try to confine myself to the amendment, and my intervention was relevant to it.

I shall take my example of an all-women's club. If that club felt that it had to conform with the proposed legislation, and there were costs associated with that, the consequence would be increased subscriptions, and male members' subscriptions would increase by more than the subscriptions of female members. Therefore, a satisfactory arrangement, which both sexes find to their mutual agreement, would be prejudiced. That is a specific example.

I am much in sympathy with the thrust of the Bill. I would like clubs generally to be more relaxed and to be more mixed sex. These are genuine points of issue that a piece of legislation may eventually have to address. In principle, we have always accepted that clubs are entitled to define, within the broader law rather than sex discrimination legislation, their own parameters. It would be a big step if we were to tear that up.

I guess that the Bill's passage has probably shed some light on the difficulties of applying this sort of legislation. However, that is not a case for abandoning it. It may well be a case for accepting that the Bill is not quite the right vehicle.

Mr. Sutcliffe: First, I apologise to the House for not being present at the start of the debate. I was stuck in a lift at the Department of Trade and Industry.

David Wright: Was the lift open to men and to women to be stuck in?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Well, the lift was never open at all in terms of getting into the House.

I shall return to the amendment. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) that there is no need for the amendment. Such a provision was not seen as necessary when the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 was enacted. That legislation imposed more sweeping demands on employers and providers of goods and services, and very little by way of physical alteration to premises that is likely to be needed in the great majority of these cases. If a compelling need can be demonstrated, provision can be made under the transitional arrangements that are provided for in clause 4.

The Bill relates to clubs that already admit both men and women who are members. The men should not be the subject of discrimination. The Bill is not about making clubs undertake extensive changes to provide for people with disabilities to enable them to access premises. Disability discrimination in relation to private clubs will be dealt with by other means. Through disability legislation, the test of reasonableness already exists.

The purpose behind the Bill is to let women who are already members of clubs use, for example, the snooker room or to vote at the annual general meeting, or to have access to the golf course on different days. There is no change in the way in which single sex clubs are organised.

Members quite rightly like to consider private Member's Bill line by line, but my hon. Friend, whom I congratulate on developing the Bill through much consultation, has tried to deliver that. However, clause 4 provides the opportunity to deal with any transitional costs, and we are not attacking the principle of association. We are saying that when people are legitimate members, they should be given the opportunity to participate fully.

2.15 pm

I hope that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) will withdraw the amendment and support the thrust of my hon. Friend's Bill. The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 was introduced nearly 30 years ago, but we still face a ridiculous situation. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) described what he had tried to do in the clubs that he was a member of, and I wholeheartedly agree with him. I am a member of the CIU and hon. Members will be aware of the great debate in which women have been trying to obtain full rights in the CIU. The executive supports that aim, but cannot get the two-thirds majority to have the change accepted at the annual conference.

As my hon. Friend has said, I hope that the hon. Member for Christchurch will see the issue in the round and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Chope: The best thing to do is put the amendment to a vote.

GP Services (South Lincolnshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Paul Clark.]

2.37 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): This is an occasion when 90 per cent. of the purpose of a debate has been achieved before it has commenced. In a dramatic reversal yesterday, the Government announced that they were restoring GP accessibility at night in south-west Lincolnshire. That does not mean that there is little point in holding this debate, nor does it reduce my great gratitude to Mr. Speaker for allowing me the opportunity to do so. Far from it—Mr. Speaker's decision to allow a debate is justified, and Parliament has been memorably and strikingly effective in changing policy and removing a considerable problem.

Parliament is the only forum in which Ministers can be held to account. Of course, they speak to the press all the time and give press conferences, issue press statements and answer questions when they feel like it. However, they are compelled to come to the House to answer for what has been done in their name. That is a generally accepted principle, and on this occasion it has proved enormously effective in its practical consequences.

It is less widely recognised that an Adjournment debate also provides an opportunity for Ministers to hold to account the bureaucracy for which they are responsible. Before attending such a debate, they ask questions about the background to it, and investigate the reason why a Member has asked for it and why Mr. Speaker has granted it. They must satisfy themselves that they are willing to defend what has been done. To his great credit, the Minister clearly has examined the position and decided that he did not want to defend the indefensible today, so yesterday he changed the position to a defensible one. Of course I am grateful for that. I am aware of the difficulties that the Government will have had in making such a change in policy, so I shall not carp, crow or score party political points. The matter is far too important for that. It goes to the most important issue of all—people's lives. One can get seriously ill at 3 am just as easily as at 3 pm on a working day. It is just as important that one should have access to a doctor at night as it is during the working week.

The role of GPs in making an initial diagnosis when something goes wrong and in making the essential clinical judgment as to what is to be done is indispensable. While I have been fighting this campaign over the past few weeks, one of the most foolish things said to me by those who tried to defend the changes that they had made in Lincolnshire was that they had put in place a system of trained nurse practitioners that was better than the availability of GPs at night, which we have always had in Lincolnshire, as in other parts of the country, since 1946, as the Minister well knows.

How could such a system be better? Nurses do wonderful work. In any context, I would be the first to praise what they do and the high standards of their profession. I recognise that as time proceeds they have an ever greater degree of training and they can be used in an ever greater number of roles, but those roles should not seek or pretend to replace the role of a doctor. In the function of diagnosis, the doctor's role is and must be irreplaceable. In making a diagnosis, a doctor draws not only on probably years of experience but on that deep immersion in the clinical disciplines of anatomy, physiology, biochemistry and pharmacology which a nurse does not have available to him or to her.

If it were true that a nurse was as good as a doctor at making a diagnosis, often in difficult circumstances in the middle of the night when something goes badly wrong, we should say that nurses are doctors. They ought to have MD, MRCP or FRCP after their name, if one argued that they were equally able to fulfil the traditional vital role of doctors. The second thing wrong with that stupid argument was the response—perhaps a slightly Socratic response—that I gave to the person who put it to me. I said, "If you are right that the new system is better for patients, you ought to have it round the clock. You ought to get rid of GPs in the morning, in the afternoon and on weekdays as well. We should just have nurses and no GPs at all." There was no response to that, of course.

I said that I would not carp and I shall not, but I must ask a number of questions to clarify the position and remove the remaining anxieties, fears and concerns, which have been very great over the past few weeks and months, about the consequences of what was being done in south-west Lincolnshire, and to prevent it happening again. Why was there so little public consultation before the change was made, and no consultation at all with local elected representatives? There was no consultation with me or with local district councils.

Two weeks ago in the Grantham Journal the leader of the Labour group of the South Kesteven district council, Councillor John Hurst, wrote in support of what I was doing in my campaign. He shared my views about the urgent necessity to bring back doctors at night. Of course, he is a clever politician. He did not want me to have a monopoly of the issue and he was trying to defend the Government's back. I understand that. However, there was no doubt about his sincerity, nor that he was as shocked and surprised as I was to discover—as I only did from patients during the summer recess—what was actually going on.

When the Government abolished community health councils, which was a mistake, they gave a commitment that they would carry out more consultation, not less, with the public and elected representatives. That was far from the case; on this occasion, there was no consultation. Of course, the Minister will have been briefed to say that there was some public meeting attended by two passers-by and a dog and that a statement was made last March that GP night-time services would be removed. However, there was no public consultation; the process was thoroughly inadequate.

Is it true, as has been put to me, that the primary care trust, in deciding to remove night-time access to GPs last April, was implementing earlier Government guidance? Is it also true, as has also been put to me, that the Government did not understand the implications for out-of-hours care of the new GP contract, which they negotiated last year, and that that is why the original guidance was faulty?

After the introduction of the new contract, why did the PCT refuse even to negotiate on the offer made by Welldoc—a co-operative consortium of GP practices and health centres in my constituency—which had been supplying night cover for many years in a large part of the area, to provide cover for the whole south-west Lincolnshire area, which corresponds, more or less, to my constituency? That offer was dismissed out of hand. The PCT apparently did not even ask Welldoc what the system would cost or how it would run. Why not?

Why did the PCT seem determined to eliminate GP services at night at all costs? Does the Minister recognise that that behaviour, and indeed the lack of consultation with the public and with elected representatives, created a crisis of confidence in the PCT, both among many GPs and among elected representatives in the area—in no way confined to elected representatives of my party political complexion.

Does the Minister recognise that a series of recent Government actions has tended to devalue—or looked as though it were intended to devalue—the role of the GP. The process started with NHS Direct, whereby nurses diagnose on the telephone patients they have never seen and for whom they have no medical records, with no access to a doctor. At least use of that service was voluntary; people could still call a GP at night, so there was no particular reason to object to NHS Direct—indeed, I have never done so. The system was voluntary and there were alternatives; nevertheless, it is something of a waste of resources.

The system in place over the past few months was quite different. As a result of the Government's assurances, given yesterday, I hope that it will soon come to an end. It was not voluntary, and it was quite impossible to see a doctor at night unless one could get to a hospital or was already in hospital.

Another worrying and sinister development, which is going in the same direction, has occurred in my constituency: the system for triaging referrals. In my constituency, in an increasing number of specialities, GPs do not make a referral to a particular surgeon or physician at a hospital: a triaging committee decides whether the patient is to be referred to the secondary sector and, if so, to whom. That is a fundamental devaluation of the role of the doctor. Is there not a danger that such measures are damaging the morale of GPs and directly affecting the willingness of young medical students to enter general practice?

I can see from the Minister's body language that he does not agree with some of the strictures implied in my remarks. Will he state unambiguously that the role of the GP in medicine, especially in the vital aspects of initial diagnosis and clinical judgment, remains as important as ever in the protection of the nation's health? Will he tell us that his Government have no intention of eroding or devaluing either that role or the influence that GPs can exert on the secondary sector on behalf of their patients? Will the Government make those commitments clear both to existing GPs and to all medical students who may be contemplating careers as generalist physicians?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): As the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) supposed, I do not entirely agree with everything that he said. I nevertheless congratulate him on raising this important matter and on his interest in health issues. I know that this subject is of great importance to his constituents, and that he is delighted about yesterday's Government announcement concerning out-of-hours services. I have to disappoint him slightly, in that that announcement was not entirely in response to the prospect of this Adjournment debate. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), has been concerned about the way in which out-of-hours services are being implemented in certain areas for some time, and has said so publicly. He has worked very hard for some time to produce guidance that will provide Members such as the hon. Gentleman with the assurances that they need.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I understand that the Government have some face to save today; however, the primary issue is the future of health care. Is the Minister seriously trying to tell the House that it was a complete coincidence that, just after Mr. Speaker granted me this debate some four weeks ago, the Secretary of State said that he was contemplating new guidance, and a complete coincidence that the statement was made yesterday, just 24 hours before this debate?

Dr. Ladyman: The Government of course have the greatest respect for Parliament, but on this occasion, yes, it was a coincidence. We recognised that the public are concerned about the way in which out-of-hours services are developing, and we made a statement pointing out that we are going to do something to address that concern.

Mr. Davies: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Ladyman: Very briefly; otherwise, I will not be able to deal with all the hon. Gentleman's points.

Mr. Davies: Nobody will believe what the Minister has just said. Certainly, no one in Lincolnshire will believe it, and the PCT itself knows perfectly well that it is untrue. This was not a coincidence: it was simply against the backdrop of today's debate that the Government took this decision, which I continue to welcome.

Dr. Ladyman: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman continues to welcome the decision; we will simply have to agree to differ on the motivation for it. That is not to say that I minimise in any way the importance of Adjournment debates. I do a great many of them and they are valuable in terms both of raising local issues and of focusing Ministers' minds on Members' concerns, thereby ensuring that we focus our officials' minds on them.

I congratulate health service staff across the whole of Lincolnshire on their work and I thank them for their efforts in delivering high-quality services. They are dedicated to producing a good service for everyone, and they deserve our admiration and gratitude.

Back in April 2002, we announced that local health services would be given the freedom to commission care in order to get the best services for their own people, subject to the highest clinical standards and best value for money. These wide-ranging health care changes mean that strategic health authorities and locally based PCTs now have the role of running the national health service—of making real health improvements in their areas. It is not for Ministers miles away in Whitehall to second-guess them. At the centre, the Government set the strategic framework, but local delivery decisions are very much for local people in the local NHS. The job of running local health services is theirs, as is that of driving up standards and making improvements.

I will return to the regard in which we hold general practitioners, but I should point out now that if we in any way wanted to diminish the role of GPs, why on earth would we have put the NHS's future and strategy into the hands of PCTs? It is because we understand the importance of primary care and the role of GPs in it that we now devolve 86 per cent. of NHS money to PCTs, so that decisions on such matters are made by local people based in primary care, including GPs themselves.

Mr. Davies: I am sorry to interrupt and correct the Minister once again, but in fact he destroyed the system of fundholding practices, through which GPs themselves commissioned secondary care, and replaced it with another form of bureaucracy. PCTs are responsible for spending a lot of money but they do not necessarily have to spend it on GPs. Indeed, in this case the PCT decided—foolishly and wrongly, as the Minister has now conceded—to spend it on nurse practitioners rather than on GPs.

Dr. Ladyman: Primary care trusts consist of local people who make local decisions. They include decisions on general practice and the funding for it, and on the commissioning of all other health services in the PCT area. I encourage the hon. Gentleman to engage more closely with his PCT, so that he can be better involved in some of the decisions. I have regular timetabled meetings with my PCT, as do the other MPs in my area. As a result, we feel involved in the process, just as councillors, GPs and others involved in the health service do.

South West Lincolnshire PCT has made considerable improvements and I would like to begin by congratulating the trust on achieving three-star status earlier this year, which the hon. Gentleman did not mention in his comments. Not only is it a high-performing trust, it is one of the first PCTs in the country to achieve teaching status, offering wider career development opportunities to clinicians to improve recruitment and retention of staff. Acquiring teaching status means, of course, that it will be very much easier to recruit the general practitioners that are needed in the area.

The trust has been innovative in its approach to service redesign and work force development and has a good track record of consulting local general practitioners and engaging the general public. The hon. Gentleman suggested that there had been no consultation on the changes to out-of-hours services, but 30,000 information leaflets and 500 posters were distributed in his area. There were briefings to all the local newspapers, which featured articles about the changes, and there were a number of presentations at public meetings. For example, two annual public meetings of the PCT were held in open, at which these matters were fully discussed. It is a matter of considerable surprise to me that the hon. Gentleman, who I know takes a great interest in his constituency, seems unaware that all that consultation was taking place—very publicly and very openly—over a considerable period of time.

The PCT is responsible for training the first wave of first contact practitioners on behalf of the National Health Service university. It has been actively involved in international recruitment of GPs from Spain and a similar campaign is under way to recruit Spanish dentists. In no way does the hon. Gentleman's PCT underestimate the value of general practitioners. I would say that he should be proud and supportive of its work. It is an excellent PCT.

Of course, Members attach the highest importance to developments in the NHS and the quality of local care within their constituencies. That is absolutely right. It is a matter of great importance to our constituents and Members should be involved in the process. The development of out-of-hours services and unscheduled care services is of great concern to many people. That is why there was an independent review of GP out-of-hours services in 2000, which is when we began the process of review. The Government accepted the recommendations of that independent review in full, and a key principle of them—they have shaped policy for out-of-hours services—is to deliver an integrated model of out-of-hours services, in which a high quality of care is available to everyone irrespective of where they live and who provides it.

Following the review, we introduced national quality standards to act as the benchmark for providers of out-of-hours care. Those standards ensure that out-of-hours care, wherever provided, is delivered to a consistently high standard. They cover areas such as clinical governance, organisational and service standards, patient access and clinical assessment. Those are the standards that we are setting centrally, but I reiterate that delivery is a matter for local discretion.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the impact of the new general medical services contract, but it fully supports the development of an integrated system of high-quality out-of-hours care. Prior to the contract, most GP practices sub-contracted their out-of-hours responsibility to providers such as GP co-ops. The new contract allows practices to transfer that responsibility to the PCTs—the lead commissioners of NHS services. PCTs are now commissioning services from providers or organising provision themselves. It is a choice that they make and it provides an opportunity for PCTs to rethink and reconfigure the provision of out-of-hours services across their area and to co-ordinate it with other services, including accident and emergency, social care, and NHS walk-in centres. The long-term aim is for out-of-hours to be part of a seamlessly integrated unscheduled care network, which brings together all services meeting patients' unplanned needs.

We have greatly increased investment to support all that at the centre. We have doubled the out-of-hours development fund this year to £92 million. We have provided additional resources of £14 million to assist PCTs in very rural and urban areas, and we have made available to them £30 million in capital incentives.

Mr. Davies: No one is going to object to the Minister's bureaucratic jargon about seamless integration and so forth. What is important to my constituents is that they have access to a doctor at night. Can the Minister confirm that, as the PCT told me yesterday, from November, it will once again, after a sad interval of several months, be able to provide such access? In the first instance, the call may well be taken by a nurse—that happens when one walks into a doctor's surgery: one sees a nurse first and it may not be necessary to waste the doctor's time—but the important thing is that patients have access to doctors. Will the Minister also confirm that, if a patient insists on his or her right to speak to a doctor, that right will be granted?

Dr. Ladyman: I can indeed assure the hon. Gentleman that his local PCT is adjusting its arrangements to ensure that where medically necessary, people will be able to obtain access to a GP out of hours. In addition to the funding changes that I have already mentioned—

Mr. Davies: Answer the question.

Dr. Ladyman: I will come back to those issues in a moment, but I want to put on record that, in addition to the other incentives that I have mentioned, there is some £180 million available, which was previously given to practices to pay for out-of-hours services. Under the new contract, which the hon. Gentleman criticised, that money goes to the PCTs to enable them to fulfil the obligations. In total, £316 million is available for out-of-hours services. That does not include the additional investment that we have made available in PCT unified budgets for out-of-hours services. For South West Lincolnshire PCT, that figure is more than £156 million in this financial year.

The most effective out-of-hours care is that which permits patients to receive the advice or treatment they need from the professional with the right skills to deliver it. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree. The effective use of skill-mix and team working is well established in in-hours primary and secondary care. Out-of-hours care is embracing the opportunities of the contract to capitalise similarly on the skills of the NHS.

The new arrangements will depend on the effective use of a multi-professional approach. However, there remains the need for GPs to continue to play a leading role in helping to deliver out-of-hours services, working alongside nurses and other practitioners to ensure that patients get the right service at the right time from the right person.

PCTs need to plan for services that are provided by a number of networked and integrated providers with multidisciplinary teams, making more use of telephony and a wider range of professional skills, including nurses and paramedics. PCTs are already laying the foundations in developing training opportunities for staff and broadening their vocational experiences, so that they can bring their skills and experience to bear in the future.

The model of out-of-hours provision in the South West Lincolnshire PCT provides a good example of that multi-professional working, in its use of GPs, alongside first contact practitioners and paramedics, working in partnership with colleagues in accident and emergency departments. Patients access the service via a dedicated phone number. Patients can be assessed on the phone and referred to the appropriate course of action. They may be requested to attend the emergency care centre to be seen by the appropriate professional for their needs or visited at home.

The service currently provided meets the national quality standards for out-of-hours care, which all organised providers must meet. Those standards remain in force until the end of the year. From 1 January, they will be replaced by the new national quality requirements, which the Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness launched yesterday. The requirements will be a contractual obligation on providers, who will be performance-managed by PCTs in the delivery of their contracts.

Mr. Davies: The Minister is giving me all sorts of answers and abstractions that I do not need. He seems to be intoxicated by his own bureaucratic gobbledegook. Can he just answer my question? Now that the Government have made a necessary reversal of policy, can we look forward in south Lincolnshire to a patient being able to see a GP if he or she considers it necessary, even in the middle of the night?

Dr. Ladyman: That is the position that the new guidance will ensure.

The new requirements provide clear guidance to PCTs on what is expected of their out-of-hours services while continuing to build on the existing high-quality services that all organised out-of-hours providers currently have to meet. The requirements will offer reassurance to patients that whenever they access out-of-hours services, they will receive high-quality, responsive care.

The requirements guarantee that patients will be treated by the professional best equipped to meet their needs. When it is clinically appropriate, patients will be able to have a face-to-face consultation with a GP, including when necessary, at a patient's home. I hope that that is the assurance that the hon. Gentleman seeks. The telephone assessment and subsequent triage will identify clinical need, and determine the nature of the subsequent consultation or referral, which is an established process in out-of-hours services. The new requirements will keep GPs at the heart of out-of-hours services. Indeed, those services will continue to be supported by a large GP work force.

At this point I shall deal with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that we are underestimating the value of GPs. Had we not made the changes and given GPs the freedom to alter the services that they provide and take advantage of the new arrangements, it would have become increasingly difficult for us to recruit GPs. One of the messages that we got from GPs was that it was necessary to allow them, if they wanted to, to opt out of providing out-of-hours services themselves, because they considered providing those services too great a burden, and it was making it very difficult for us to recruit. Now that primary care trusts are providing out-of-hours services, they can commission them from GPs who want to provide them.

Mr. Davies: I understand that, as the Minister says, GPs should be allowed to opt out of out-of-hours responsibilities individually, but as I have just told him, one of the GP co-operatives in my constituency, Welldoc, offered to take over the whole night-time responsibility, and the offer was not even negotiated on.

Dr. Ladyman: That is a matter for the local primary care trust. It has the responsibility to commission a service that provides the highest quality in the best and most cost-efficient way for its local area. All sorts of providers might want to provide services for remuneration, but that does not mean that primary care trusts have to accept them. They have to make a decision about how best to deliver services for their area, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want it any other way.

I can provide the hon. Gentleman with the assurance that South West Lincolnshire PCT, and indeed all PCTs in England, will provide a service that will meet the quality requirements from 1 January, so that patients with clinical need can have a consultation with a GP, including, where necessary, a home visit. Trent strategic health authority will also continue to play a strong role in ensuring that out-of-hours services are developed and delivered appropriately for the population of south-west Lincolnshire.

I would like to emphasise that, contrary to recent press comment, there is no evidence to suggest that a rise in accident and emergency attendance is linked to the handover of responsibility for evening and weekend medical cover from GP practices to PCTs. In fact, there has been an overall decrease in emergency admissions at Grantham accident and emergency department, and patient waiting times are falling.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Burial Law

1. Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): What progress is being made with the review of burial law. [191190]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): We are completing an extensive consultation on the review of burial law, to which we have received more than 400 responses. We are considering them very carefully, and I hope to be able to announce detailed proposals early next year.

Andrew Bennett: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply; but does he accept that it is more than four years since the Select Committee reported to the House on the very worrying state of cemeteries in many parts of the country, the lack of burial spaces for future interments and all the other problems that go with that? Will he bring a little more urgency to getting those problems sorted out?

Paul Goggins: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's work on the Environment, Transport, and Regional Affairs Committee; the report of the Sub-Committee that he chaired was an important piece of work. I was reading that report recently and noticed that, in the first section, it quoted a remark made by one of my predecessors, who stated that the issue was only exceeded in its importance by its difficulty. That predecessor was speaking in 1846 and he promptly rushed to legislation. It is important that we get the matter right. My hon. Friend is correct: we need to look at sensitive issues, such as the reuse of burial grounds. We are doing that carefully and I promise him that we shall introduce proposals, based on the consultations, as soon as possible.

Helen Southworth (Warrington, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend knows that the gaps in the current legislation can result in difficult and distressing cases that are hard to deal with, so will he pay particular attention during the review to requiring all burial authorities to give specific consideration to the needs of bereaved relatives? Families can be extremely distressed in those circumstances and it is important that all burial authorities give proper consideration and respect to their needs at such times.

Paul Goggins: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend. It is true that sometimes I have to make some very difficult decisions on those matters. It is important that burial authorities have due regard to the needs of bereaved families at such a difficult and sensitive time. I want to see a commitment not only on that issue but on death certification, too, where it is vital that our public officials, who bear responsibility for those services, have due regard to the feelings of families.

Gun Crime

2. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): How many drive-by shootings have been recorded in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [191191]

4. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): What action he is taking in response to the latest incidents of gun crime in Nottingham. [191193]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): This is the first opportunity that I and the House have had to send our condolences and our heartfelt sympathies to the family and friends of Danielle Beccan. All gun crime is a tragedy, but the death of a child is a bigger tragedy than any other.

We do not collect statistics on drive-by shootings, but the statistics we do collect demonstrate a fall in the number of deaths from gun crime over the last three years, while there was a rapidly rising curve until 2001 in relation to the use of guns. That has been stabilised but it is still not acceptable. Although 77 per cent. of all gun crime ends up with no one being hurt and only 18 per cent. have some minor hurt, it is a tragedy for individuals, families and communities that even a small number of people are killed by guns. It is, therefore, beholden on all of us to ensure that we join together to find the solutions.

Mr. Prentice: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply; we all think of the victims of those senseless, drive-by shootings. Did he see the piece in The Observer yesterday, quoting the Manchester police, who say that the average life expectancy of those involved in gun crime in Manchester is 24? Who are the people supplying those guns? Surely we need to come down like a ton of bricks on those who supply illegal firearms. A sentence of five years is far too lenient.

Mr. Blunkett: We can certainly debate whether five years as a minimum is unsatisfactory, but when the House debated the matter the average sentence for carrying a gun was 18 months. I think we all agreed that that was outrageous and that something should be done about it. I have to point out that, for the first time ever, we have raised the minimum sentence for death from use of a gun to a minimum starting point of 30 years. Every time we make proposals to the House on minimum sentences, there is conflict within, as well as between, parties about whether it is right for us to do so. The measures that we took last year, including those that we added to the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, are a starting point, not an end point, for getting a grip on gun crime. Gun crime deaths amount to 8 per cent. of all murders in this country, and with the use of other weapons, including knives, we face another major challenge in protecting our communities.

Alan Simpson: I thank the Home Secretary for his kind words about Danielle Beccan, and I pay tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell), in whose constituency the family live. Will the Home Secretary, however, accept that the best way in which we can overcome the problem of guns on our streets is to stop the guns getting there in the first place and to look carefully at how those guns get through the current system? Will he also support the initiatives that are being taken by the local authority and local communities in Nottingham? One of our most urgent challenges is to give those in the communities the confidence to come forward with evidence about the holding of guns, without putting their own lives at risk. In that context, will he send support to the local communities and local authority in Nottingham for their initiative next Friday, when, with Danielle Beccan's family, people will stand together in Nottingham in an act of solidarity and defiance against the gun crime that we face?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall be very happy indeed to send a message of support. The whole ministerial team will visit Nottingham and the east midlands on 4 and 5 November, and we have already agreed to meet representatives of the communities most affected. Indeed, in July, we gave £145,000 to the community of St. Ann's and Radford. I want to reinforce my tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell), who is unable to raise these issues this afternoon because of his position on the Front Bench. We have also given £10,000 to Mothers Against Guns, which is playing a signal role in changing the culture and attitudes of local people. It is only through a combination of working within and from the community that the action plan that was agreed with the Association of Chief Police Officers a year ago can be made effective in Nottingham and throughout the country.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Surely the current position is entirely unacceptable. The stark fact is that gun crime has doubled in the past five years. In trying to tackle the supply of guns and to return to the position that originally obtained, will the Home Secretary consider imitation firearms, which, as the all-party group on gun crime found, have been converted on far too many occasions to fire live ammunition?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, we will. Although we were sceptical about the ability to differentiate between the different types of model gun, given that we had to avoid criminalising toy guns, it is an offence to carry a model gun in public, and the police have the power to intervene if they think that someone is carrying a gun. There is a lot more to do, and although everyone agrees that it would be a good idea to do it, they have not yet produced an acceptable definition of such a firearm, even though we have now taken the steps to which the House agreed last year—unanimously, if my memory serves me correct. It is clear from that that we did not disagree about banning the import and sale of such weapons, about the arrest of people carrying them and, of course, about dealing with Brocock guns. There is more to be done, but we have made progress in the past two years. We certainly needed to do so because, as we acknowledged, the carrying and, regrettably, the use of guns had grown exponentially from the mid-1990s onwards.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I join the Home Secretary in offering condolences to the family and friends of Danielle Beccan and, indeed, the families and friends of the other people who have died in Nottingham in the past year.

Although I understand the Home Secretary's response to the original question on the measurement of drive-by shootings, given the changing nature of shootings in Britain recently, it might be worth while to consider reclassifying or attempting to reclassify some of the measurements of such shootings. I understand only too well the problems that he faces with the definition of replica firearms—that needs to be dealt with—but may I take it from the tone of his comments that he does not agree with the director of the police standards unit, Paul Evans, who said that we have "a very, very small gun problem"?

Mr. Blunkett: On the right hon. Gentleman's first observation, we obviously have a degree of common cause in trying to find a definition of replica and model guns that would work and that would be usable by the police.

On the right hon. Gentleman's second question, the head of the police standards unit—who, having been the chief of police in Boston, has more experience of gun crime than I or anyone in this Chamber—was reflecting on the relative incidence of gun crime, the relative incidence of death from gun crime and the relative incidence of serious injury from gun crime. There is no difference between us in accepting that the carrying, use and availability of guns is totally unacceptable. The issue between us is only how we tackle that and whether we are able, working with the communities most affected, to ensure that we do not exaggerate the situation to the point where it looks as though there is nothing that can be done and that it is out of control. That would play into the hands of those who want to foster among young men, in particular, a view that they are invincible, that authority can do nothing and that the carrying and use of guns is somehow trendy and a fashion accessory that makes others proud of them. None of us wants that. That is why the head of the police standards unit merely made the observation that we should not exaggerate.

David Davis: I thank the Home Secretary for that; no doubt, we will return to the issue in detail later today.

I would not normally ask the Home Secretary an operational question, but there was a write-up in the weekend press that, three months ago, the National Crime Squad had ceased an intelligence operation in Nottingham that was aimed at the very gangs that have been causing some of these problems. As I said, I would not normally ask an operational question, but will he at least consider that decision? If it was necessary to withdraw an intelligence operation against the advice of the people involved in it, either there are not enough resources in the National Crime Squad or there was a strategic misjudgment in withdrawing it from one of the more dangerous cities in Britain.

Mr. Blunkett: I appreciate the way in which the right hon. Gentleman puts the question. We are always being harangued for not getting involved in operational decisions from the Dispatch Box. I take the point entirely and I would be very happy for him to talk to Bill Hughes, the head of the National Crime Squad, about its work and how it has been working with Operation Stealth, which has successfully begun the process of turning the situation round in Nottingham, as has the Sherwood initiative, which deals with the corollary of drug crime. I will happily arrange for such discussions; I appreciate the nature of the question.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): As yet, few, if any, cases of possession of firearms have found their way through the criminal justice system to have the new mandatory minimum sentence applied. That sentence was aimed particularly not so much at the hardened criminals who are determined to use guns but at the young men whom my right hon. Friend mentioned a few moments ago and who might casually carry guns and become involved in gun crime. In the period before that sentence is seen to bite, will he see whether more can be done to get across the fact that the sentence is now in the system and that the price to be paid for casually carrying guns is now very high?

Mr. Blunkett: My right hon. Friend is correct. As we know, even with a speeded-up criminal justice system, the ability to take someone through the courts on this charge has not yet been possible. We have just initiated a poster campaign, but we probably need to think even more imaginatively about how we get the message across. Without making a party political point, I note that, when I was in Brixton at the beginning of August, I found that young men and women were very keen to work with us in developing their music as part of the message. If the music can become the message, the culture itself might change.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): May I also express the sympathy of the Liberal Democrats to the family of Danielle?

The Home Secretary is obviously aware that one of the problems with firearms is the number of them that come into the country illegally. With that in mind, will he look again at the structures that we have to police our ports and airports? Police officers, Customs officers and immigration officers are currently involved and there is quite a bit of overlapping work. Will he look again at the suggestion that has been made by a number of people to set up a dedicated national border force? Having that in place may actually make our borders more secure and, in doing so, may help to stop some of the traffic of guns into this country.

Mr. Blunkett: The new Serious Organised Crime Agency will join together the police, Customs and the immigration service in a combined operation that will use the intelligence of the National Criminal Intelligence Service and be joined with the National Crime Squad. We will have a unified approach to tackle the organised smuggling of guns and thus the ability to address the problem. Part of the challenge that we face is those who are adapting existing weapons in this country, part is the use of the internet—we need to clamp down on the availability of such weapons through the internet—and part is the smuggling of weapons, sometimes from former Communist central and eastern European countries. When taken together, the measures that we have already enunciated can work. A border control force relates to a different issue, but if it were to be needed, it could be established as a subset of the Serious Organised Crime Agency.

Fireworks

3. Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab): What action is being taken to tackle the misuse of fireworks. [191192]

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): Over the past 18 months, we have introduced new legislation to control the supply, possession and use of fireworks. In addition to the existing criminal sanctions for committing those offences, earlier this month we extended the penalty notices for the disorder scheme to include three new firework offences. That provides the police with an alternative sanction, if they consider it appropriate, by punishing offenders immediately with on-the-spot fines.

Mr. Drew: I thank the Minister for her reply. She will be aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) is a hero in Stroud, as he is in many other constituencies, for piloting his private Member's Bill. Of course, the legislation can only be as effective as the police choose to make it, so will she guarantee that she is informing the police and the ancillary services that the matter is a priority? Will she assure me that the police will deal with the problem, because although any improvement could only be a step in the right direction, we have a long way to go?

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend is absolutely right that my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South is a hero, but my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) is also something of a hero because he chairs the all-party fireworks group and has made a tremendous contribution. He is absolutely right that the misuse of fireworks causes misery and distress to thousands of people and their families throughout the country. I recently received a dossier from Liverpool police showing where fireworks are being used as explosives to blow up cars, rather than for fun and entertainment. I assure him that I am in discussion with the police and trading standards and environmental health officers because tackling such antisocial behaviour is a matter for not only the police, but all our agencies.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): In joining the hon. Member for Stroud in commending the private Member's Bill of the hon. Member for Hamilton, South that was successfully enacted, will the Minister examine the specific problem of the selling of illegal fireworks, which is a cause of concern despite the welcome tightening of the regulations? Will she take this opportunity to praise the British Fireworks Association for doing everything possible to co-operate towards ensuring that the new legislation will be effective?

Ms Blears: The hon. Gentleman is right that it is important to tackle the issue on two fronts: first, the misuse of fireworks and, secondly, the import, supply and licensing of fireworks. We must follow fireworks that enter this country to ensure that they are not sold illegally and used for the activities that I outlined. I am in close contact with my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury to examine import, supply and licensing issues. We will continue to bear down on the misuse and illegal use of fireworks, which causes much anguish and distress to many people.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): May I reinforce the point on the importation of fireworks? Some companies that bring fireworks into the country have no legal licensed storage areas. The fireworks go to farms and are then sold indiscriminately to white-van cowboys. Unless we deal with the individuals responsible for that, antisocial behaviour problems caused by fireworks will continue. Will my hon. Friend closely look into companies that are importing fireworks in such a manner and prevent that from happening in the future?

Ms Blears: I am delighted to give my hon. Friend that assurance. It is vital that such fireworks are properly tracked so that we know where they are going, and that they are not going to unlicensed suppliers. My hon. Friend has done a marvellous job in highlighting this issue. Before his involvement, there was a tendency to say that fireworks were harmless fun, but we all know from our postbags that that is not the case for people throughout this country. The misery and distress that has been caused is a matter of great concern to the House, and I can assure my hon. Friend that we will continue to press particularly on licensing and supply, which are as important as bearing down on actual misuse on the streets.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend look again at the possibility of a universal licensing system for all firework outlets? Will she also consider giving greater powers to trading standards officers to revoke licences under particular circumstances? Although the Fireworks Act 2003, which was originally proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South, is extremely welcome, there could be loopholes in how it was redrafted as a Government Bill, which would leave the way open for unscrupulous traders.

Ms Blears: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns, but I believe that the current legislation means that a robust set of measures are in place. Of course we will want to monitor the impact, and if it is necessary to have a further review, we will do that. The range of measures that we now have includes a curfew on the use of fireworks during night hours, banning the supply of category 3 fireworks, ensuring that category 4 fireworks can be used only by professionals and ensuring that there are offences covering the throwing of fireworks in the street and youngsters under 18 who have adult fireworks in their possession. That is a major package of measures, and together with the tracking and licensing, it will provide robust legislation to minimise the problems. We will keep the situation under review, but all Members will agree that the measures that have been taken in recent times should make a significant difference to the problems that have been caused.

Mentally Ill Prisoners

5. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What provision is made for the supervision of mentally ill individuals on probation on release from prison. [191194]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): Prisoners who are released into probation supervision in the community are subject to licence conditions. Every licensee will be allocated a designated probation supervising officer who is responsible for developing with the individual a supervision plan based on a careful assessment of risk and need. Where a prisoner who is released on licence is identified as having a mental health problem, arrangements will be made either by the prison prior to release or by the supervising probation officer for the individual to be referred for assessment and appropriate treatment through the primary care trust local to the area in which he or she will be residing.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's answer, but actually, it is the Under-Secretary, her hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), who has been dealing with the specific case I have in mind, which is very serious. The gentleman in question, who is at serious risk of reoffending, is of no fixed abode and has no specific supervision over him. There is a multiplicity of agencies in charge, but not one in overall control. In the event that this young lad reoffends, who will take responsibility for that?

Fiona Mactaggart: I have spoken to my hon. Friend about the case to which the hon. Lady referred, in which a multi-agency public protection arrangement is in place. It tries to draw together a range of services—health and housing services, for example—in order to prevent offending. If the hon. Lady is saying that present arrangements are not satisfactory in terms of having a designated, fundamentally responsible person, she is right. That is precisely the reason for developing the National Offender Management Service, which will provide a named person to act as back-stop for any offender in such a position.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that a high proportion of prisoners released suffer from not just mental health problems but personality disorders. Many also have a dual diagnosis of alcohol and drug addition. Is proper monitoring taking place, and are arrangements in place to ensure that they have proper support for all their problems?

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right. A survey conducted in 1997 found that nine out of 10 mentally disordered offenders had one of the conditions to which he referred. We need to draw together the provision available to support people in the community. That is why we are working on a strategy for mentally disordered offenders, which will build on the work done in prisons—substantial extra investment has been made in mental health care in prisons—and ensure that there is carry-through into the health service.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): As one whose constituency is not far from mine, the Minister might be aware that the northern end of my constituency is very close to Broadmoor hospital—indeed, schools in that part of the constituency all have Broadmoor alarms. The hon. Lady knows that recently, while on leave from Broadmoor to visit a hospital, a prisoner managed to escape the guards. That has caused considerable concern in my constituency and throughout the country. People might have got the impression from her answers today that the system remains far too bureaucratic. Sadly, in far too many cases, there are far too many cooks spoiling the broth. Does she recognise how much concern there is about this matter and that, for far too long, there has been confusion in government and bureaucratic systems about mentally disordered offenders who pose a risk to the public? I appreciate that she is trying to do something about the problem, but it is urgent.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman knows that we have a good record on dealing with escapes—the original focus of his question. Our fundamental aim is to try to prevent escapes and reduce their number, and we have achieved great successes in that respect. We have made substantial extra investment in mental health care for prisoners and people on release, which is beginning to show results. The impression that he is trying to spread is unfounded.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins), it is clear that many criminals who fall into that category are in danger of self-harm. In several incidents in south Wales, criminals on release have taken their own life. In developing new suggestions, will my hon. Friend the Minister work closely with the health service and the National Assembly for Wales to make sure there is follow-through in terms of ensuring support for vulnerable criminals in both England and Wales?

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right that the issue is important. I assure him that we have never done more than we are doing now, but I shall communicate his concerns to the Assembly. I agree that we should be able to create effective follow-through for all prisoners, wherever they are released.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): But the Minister must know that there is a problem. The probation service is so overstretched that administrative workers are covering supervisors' jobs; parole and court reports are late, or so last-minute that risk assessment processes are compromised; and now probation officers are being prevented from making prison visits to offenders who are due for release. With 60,000 prisoners with mental health problems released from prison each year, does the hon. Lady really feel that the public are adequately protected?

Fiona Mactaggart: They are more adequately protected than they have ever been. The hon. Lady should look at the investment that has been put in, resulting in 1,800 additional probation offices and 300-plus extra staff dealing with the mental health of prisoners and released prisoners. We are making the investment that would not have been made had the Conservatives remained in charge.

Police Funding

6. Tony Lloyd (Manchester Central) (Lab): What steps he has taken to define objective measures of performance of policing to provide a standard base of funding for police forces in England. [191195]

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): Most grant funding is distributed by formula broadly to reflect the relative needs of forces, taking account of local resources; it is not based on performance. We are working with the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of Police Authorities to ensure that the formula remains up to date and continues to take account of the requirements of modern-day policing.

Tony Lloyd: My constituents inevitably judge the local police force by things such as the police not answering the telephone or failing to respond to serious incidents in a timely fashion, but we need proper, objective standards to enable us to judge whether the Greater Manchester police force really deserves its place near the bottom of the ranking by most objective measures of policing, or whether the force is improving, as my hon. Friend the Minister has told me it is. In the end, Greater Manchester police's contention that they are underfunded would be better addressed if we could arrive at an objective view on whether their performance is good or bad compared with other inner-city police forces.

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend is right, and I have a personal interest in making sure that GMP's performance is of the highest possible standard. I refer him to the police performance monitors, which were published about six weeks ago and provide an objective assessment of a police force's performances compared with that of similar forces. Although Greater Manchester still has a long way to go, it improved its performance in reducing crime, with burglary down by nearly 11 per cent., vehicle crime by 12 per cent. and robbery by 14 per cent., and there has been quite a good improvement in detections. Even though it is not doing anything as well as it ought to, its efforts to reduce the fear of crime have improved significantly. Police performance monitors provide the objective assessment that my hon. Friend is seeking.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Would not the best way of improving police performance and getting value from funding be to have less central control and paperwork so that police officers did not take several hours to perform a simple arrest and spend vast amounts of time filling forms with information, much of which is used for those ever increasing numbers of performance measures?

Ms Blears: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not heard about fixed-penalty notices, which provide the police with a cost-effective way of disposing of crime. Twenty thousand such notices have been issued for disorder offences, and each one saves the police two and a half hours. That is just one example of the way in which we are freeing up police forces from the bureaucracy that has been imposed on them. A measure of central intervention and support is vital. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the performance of the forces engaged with the Police Standards Unit, he will see that their reductions in crime are greater than those for forces that are not so engaged, which shows that if the centre and the forces work together, we can reduce crime and protect our communities better.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): Thanks to changes both to funding and to the formula, West Yorkshire police have received an increase of about £30 for every single citizen in west Yorkshire since 1997, for which we thank the Minister, and we have gone from being below average to above average. During the recess, I met residents of Girnhill lane in Featherstone, who said that their partnership with the police was becoming stronger every day. In Moorthorpe in my constituency, I heard how the recidivists—40 of the worst criminals in the area—were going to be tackled. Despite the increases, we are still underfunded relative to comparable authorities. Will the Minister look at making further increases in police funding over the coming period?

Ms Blears: I am delighted to hear such a great deal about the improvements in west Yorkshire, particularly the evidence of a stronger partnership between the police and local residents. However, I realise that this year's funding settlement impacted on the force's funding. We are keen to return to a system of floors and ceilings rather than a flat-rate increase if we can, and we are doing everything we can to maximise the settlement for the police. I am delighted, however, that the settlement is having such a good effect in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Prison Population

7. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): What forecasts he has made for the prison population over the next 10 years. [191196]

8. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the reasons for the change in the numbers of women in prison over the past 10 years. [191197]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): The most recent prison population projections were published in September 2003. A new projection, which will take into account changes in sentencing trends and reforms to the criminal justice system, will be published later this year. Between 1993 and 2003, the female prison population increased by almost 200 per cent. The main reasons for this increase were a growth in the number of women sentenced for drugs offences and more severe sentencing.

Mr. Swayne: My experience over a number of years as a prison visitor leads me to believe that we must never underestimate the redemptive power of grace, but given the growth in violent crime, does the Minister agree that it is both expedient and prudent to continue to plan to accommodate a significant increase in the prison population?

Paul Goggins: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for his important work as a prison visitor. I agree entirely that people who commit acts of violence should go to prison and, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made clear earlier, should go to prison for longer than they have done in the past. That is why he announced at the end of September that, following some new investment, we would have more than 80,000 prison places available by 2006. We are also investing in the probation service so that we can deliver robust community sentences as an alternative to short-term prison sentences.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does the Minister share my concern and alarm about the massive increase in the number of women in prison? In the 10 years until the end of last year, the number was up by 173 per cent. from 1,500 to 4,299. The number is now up by 200 per cent. As this is the largest increase ever recorded in the history of the United Kingdom, should not he give us a more detailed explanation of why he thinks there has been such a huge increase, particularly as the number of men in prison increased by only 55 per cent. in the same period? Is he wise to say that the increase has to do with tougher sentencing, bearing in mind that there has been a more liberal attitude to letting women out of prison? Should not we have a detailed study to find out why things have gone so terribly wrong and what we can do about it?

Paul Goggins: The reason more women have gone to prison is that sentences have sent them there. My responsibility as the Minister for Correctional Services is to ensure that we have robust alternatives to prison sentences, where that is merited. I share the hon. Gentleman's concerns about the increase in the number of women going to prison, which is why, earlier this year, I launched the women's offending reduction programme, which looks at the causes of women's offending and seeks to reduce the number of women in prison. Last Friday there were fewer women in prison than there were on the same Friday the previous year, so we are making some progress. There are fewer women in prison this year than last year.

Mrs. Helen Clark (Peterborough) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the new prison in Peterborough, and will he condemn the Peterborough Conservative Association, which clearly does not understand the policy of its own party or its own shadow Home—

Mr. Speaker: Order. [Interruption.] The hon. Lady must please have a seat; she has finished. The Minister may mention the prison in his reply, but not the Conservative party.

Paul Goggins: I join my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Clark) in welcoming the opening this year of Bronzefield prison for women and, next year, of Peterborough prison for men and women. That is adding to the quality of the prison estate, which we need to invest in so that we have a prison estate that is fit for purpose.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that because of overcrowding, decisions have been made to house sex offenders in open conditions at Prescoed in my constituency? Within two days of a prisoner being allocated there the week before last, a very serious sex offender absconded. Does the Minister understand the deep anxiety in my constituency about the fact that, despite all the assurances that the prisoners would be low risk, one who absconded was deemed to be a danger to children? I ask the Minister to reverse the policy.

Paul Goggins: The decision to place a limited number of sex offenders who are coming to the end of their prison sentence in Prescoed prison was not the result of overcrowding but part of a planned programme under which suitable risk assessment takes place. Of course, I understand the anxiety that my hon. Friend expresses on behalf of his constituents. I have written to him and to other local representatives to confirm that I will monitor the programme carefully. I will meet him and other representatives in the near future to discuss the issue.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Should not whoever dreamed up the title "Minister for Correctional Services" be sentenced to detention to study the Queen's English?

Paul Goggins: I apologise to the House; it slipped out, as it occasionally does. I am the Minister with responsibility for prisons and probation.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): May I welcome the visit that my hon. Friend the Minister and other hon. Friends paid to Devon and Cornwall, and say how much I learned from accompanying him on the visit to Exeter prison about how to try to prevent the revolving-door syndrome? On women prisoners, has he discussed with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), the very good provision in Plymouth that she visited? Trevi house is a model for preventing women from going into prison so that they may stay with young children and learn not only how to kick their drug habit, but how to become good mothers.

Paul Goggins: I thank my hon. Friend for accompanying me on the visit to Exeter prison. It was indeed an encouraging visit, during which we saw many dedicated staff working very hard with prisoners on resettlement. I saw similar work at Dartmoor prison the following day. I pay tribute to all the staff involved and to the facility that she mentioned, which works with women who have a drug problem. Of course, such a problem needs to be dealt with and it sometimes can be dealt with outside prison. If women can keep contact with their children, so much the better. We are also seeking to develop a range of other alternatives, including the greater use of intermittent custody, which allows women to serve part of their sentence in prison during the week and to look after their children at other times. We have to be imaginative in trying to tackle this problem, but we are determined to do so.

Rifles

9. Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): What restrictions there are on the firing of rifles in the open countryside. [191198]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): It is an offence under section 19 of the Firearms Act 1968 for a person to have a firearm in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse. It is also an offence, subject to an exemption under the Act, for a person to possess a firearm without a current certificate.

Under section 27(2) of the Firearms Act 1968, it is for the police to determine when issuing a firearms certificate what conditions should be applied. New shooters in particular are restricted to shooting on land deemed suitable by the chief officer of police for the area concerned. In all cases, the certificate holder must have permission from the landowner or occupier.

Mr. Rendel: Given that the use of rifles in the open countryside for shooting foxes is likely to increase after the ban on hunting is introduced, what further steps does the Minister intend to take to ensure that those involved in lamping are properly trained and competent to use rifles in those conditions properly, safely and effectively?

Caroline Flint: For anybody to have certain firearms, they have to be certificated, and local police decide the conditions on the basis of guidelines. The hon. Gentleman raises an important point about access to open countryside and, as he will be aware, while the Firearms Act 1968 makes it an offence for a person to have a firearm in a public place, the Government believe that that does not prevent landowners and their invited guests from carrying out legitimate activities such as organised shoots and pest control on land to which there is a right of access under the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. The Countryside Agency has issued guidance to land managers on practical ways to manage public access, but action must be taken against those who break the law in circumstances such as those that he described, and they must be charged for doing so.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): If the Government's Bill on fox hunting gets through, will the use of rifles in the countryside increase or decrease?

Caroline Flint: Rifles are used in the countryside for a variety of activities, including target shooting and sports, which we support, and the running of land for farming and other pursuits. Of course, rifles have been used and will continue to be used for vermin control and the control of foxes. I cannot say how much that will increase, but such activities should be carried out in safety and in accordance with certification and licensing. We have just had a consultation on firearms legislation to which there were more than 4,000 replies. I look forward to seeing what they might say about certification, training and other issues of public safety.

Police Numbers

10. Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): What recent representations he has received about police numbers; and if he will make a statement. [191199]

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): The Government have responded to the concerns of all hon. Members and their constituents by providing record police numbers. There are now nearly 140,000 police officers, an achievement of historic proportions and a record that we will continue to protect.

Mr. Goodman: Our local police force in the High Wycombe and Marlow area has lost 18 officers to other forces in the past year, including 15 to the Met, where the starting salary is £6,000 higher. What does the Minister propose to do to stop that drift of officers from areas such as ours with very high housing costs to the Met and other better-paid forces?

Ms Blears: The hon. Gentleman failed to mention that Thames Valley police has 339 more officers than it did when this Government came to power. That said, I recognise the issues about retention and housing costs, and I am delighted to say that the Government have introduced a £2,000 a year allowance for officers in such circumstances. We have also introduced the key worker housing scheme, which has assisted 175 people in the hon. Gentleman's area. This year, Thames Valley police received £4.7 million more than the sum granted by the formula. Given the key worker housing, the extra police officers and the extra grant, Thames Valley is doing significantly better under this Government than it ever did under the Conservative party.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): Just four years ago, we had 899 officers in Warwickshire; now the figure is 1,011, which is a record. That increase was both necessary and welcome, but does my hon. Friend agree that the issue is not only police numbers, but deployment and procedural reforms? Such changes were just as beneficial as the increase in numbers in Warwickshire.

Ms Blears: I am delighted to agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that all hon. Members welcome increased police numbers, but the issue is not only police numbers, but what the police do. He knows that we have funded, to the tune of £13 million, a range of work force modernisation pilots up and down the country, including in his area. Increasingly, civilian staff carry out functions such as custody, detention, investigation and escorting, freeing up more police officers to do front-line work. The public want to see the police out on the beat, patrolling and providing reassurance. We have also introduced nearly 4,000 community support officers, who are welcome in every community and who reassure the public.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Does the Minister accept that it was a mistake to allow special constables, who, unlike community support officers, have the power to arrest, to decline in number by more than 40 per cent. since 1997? Is it not extremely important to boost that vital area of policing, which reassures the public and is particularly cost-effective?

Ms Blears: I am delighted to welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new Front-Bench position and look forward to many robust and lively debates on policing. It is interesting that he seeks to highlight the contribution of specials, who do a fantastic job policing our communities. Is that because he is reluctant to discuss police officers? Police numbers fell by 1,100 under the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), whereas the figure has increased by 12,500 under this Government. Many special constables have been recruited into the full-time force, where they have been well supported, and we are delighted to welcome them to the police. We have a big programme to increase the number of specials over forthcoming years.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Is not the key factor not the increased police numbers—to which the Minister referred and which are welcome—community safety officers or neighbourhood wardens, but seeing increased numbers on the streets, which gives the public confidence and stops a mindless minority from destroying the lives of the majority? The situation has been reversed since the previous Government were in office.

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend is right. I am sure that, like me and other hon. Members, he has seen the impact of increased police numbers, community support officers and our big push on tackling antisocial behaviour. The Together campaign has brought together local authorities and the police, and a record number—nearly 2,500—of antisocial behaviour orders have been issued. We are tackling, not tolerating, antisocial behaviour and constituents up and down the country are breathing a sigh of relief that someone is at long last taking notice of the issues that concern them. We are making a difference on the front line by reducing not only crime, but antisocial behaviour, which blights far too many people's lives.

Animal Rights Terrorism

11. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): If he will make a statement on animal rights terrorism. [191200]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): In July, we set out in the paper, "Animal Welfare—Human Rights: protecting people from animal rights extremists", additional measures that we intend to take and on which we want to legislate this winter. All hon. Members will join me in condemning the bestial extremists who desecrated a grave in Staffordshire 10 days ago and in sending our sympathy to the family. Our licensing laws in that area are the strongest in the world, but now we must take the strongest action to ensure that people can go about their business of increasing our safety and enhancing our health without their being intimidated.

Dr. Cable: Will these additional measures provide sufficient reassurance to an elderly couple in my constituency, the Halls, about whom I wrote to the Home Secretary 18 months ago, who continue to be terrorised by having acid thrown over their car, for example, despite having disposed of their Huntingdon shares some time ago? In particular, will the measures enable the police to close the SHAC—Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty—website, which specifically targets victims' homes?

Mr. Blunkett: The new legislation will aim specifically to protect people such as the hon. Gentleman's constituents. We are amending the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, enhancing what used to be called the rattening laws in relation to attacks on people's homes, and ensuring that the police presence for those most affected can be stepped up. We now have a taskforce, under an assistant chief constable, which will prioritise and target resources, and we will ensure that it does its job properly. If the hon. Gentleman's constituents continue to feel harassed and intimidated, I ask him to get directly in touch with me again.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): There is an animal-breeding establishment between the villages of Belton and Osgathorpe in my constituency, and we have seen activities by some protesters that would come within the remit of the question. Does the Home Secretary believe that the time will eventually come when it will be necessary to tackle animal rights terrorism through a single piece of legislation that strikes a balance between protecting those who legitimately try to persuade and coming down very heavily on those who use intimidation in a criminal and violent way?

Mr. Blunkett: New legislation is required, as well as increasing the use of available powers and ensuring that the tactical co-ordination unit does its job better. The real issue for the coming Session, although obviously I cannot announce the Queen's Speech before she does—[Interruption.] I do my best to write my bit of it. We need to ensure that the proposed legislation gets on to the statute book as speedily as possible; if I can use a vehicle that has already been agreed, that would be the most sensible way of proceeding.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): How many more scientists, research workers and their suppliers will feel afraid to drive home from work, sit up at night awake with scared children waiting for their cars to be fire-bombed and their houses daubed, have their neighbours harassed and, now, have their dead relatives dug up from graveyards? That will continue until such time as the Government stop shilly-shallying about and get on with protecting the British research industry and its workers, which they have consistently failed to do.

Mr. Blunkett: I do not mind our being taken to task when we are not doing anything, but that is a bit rich given that we have put a very large sum of money, including £3 million over the past three years for the Cambridgeshire constabulary, into dealing with the problem. In addition, we have set up the new co-ordinated tactical force, agreed to legislate this Session, increased arrests and charges from 109 to 179 last year and ensured that the police are aware that every right-thinking person wants us to get hold of these extremists and protect their victims. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who has been doing a first-class job with me on this issue, has met those in the industry and victims, all of whom know that we are responding to and acting on their requirements, which we will continue to do.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for mentioning the desecration of the grave in Yoxall in my constituency. Is he aware, however, that that is just the culmination of more than five years of intimidation of not only the Hall family, who breed guinea pigs in my constituency for medical research, but other villagers in Newchurch and Yoxall and people who supply the Hall family with everything from newspapers to groceries? Is the Home Secretary convinced that the legislation that he outlined will put an end to this intimidation once and for all?

Mr. Blunkett: With the very positive way in which the hon. Gentleman, alongside my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean), has been dealing with this issue, I believe that it will. It has already cost the taxpayer an additional £250,000 for Staffordshire to be able to police the guinea pig farm. It has been, as has correctly been spelled out, a nightmare for everyone involved and for the local community, trying to help one another. I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for the dedication with which he has engaged with Ministers on the issue, and I believe that if we work together we can get this right.

Vulnerable Adults

12. Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): What plans he has to introduce an offence of (a) causing harm to and (b) exploitation of a vulnerable adult. [191201]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): In addition to offences that protect any adult from violence, sexual exploitation, theft and fraud, we are introducing further measures, including the familial homicide provisions in the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill, making it an offence to cause or allow the death of a vulnerable adult within the household, and the Mental Capacity Bill, which will make it an offence to ill-treat or neglect an adult who lacks capacity.

Ms Munn: I know that my hon. Friend is very familiar with the Longcare inquiry, which reported in 1998. I pay tribute to her work in that area, but that inquiry recommended that there should be a specific arrestable offence of causing harm to or exploitation of a vulnerable adult, with a maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment, to reflect the seriousness of such offences. May I urge her and the Government to consider again introducing the offence, six years after the report was written?

Fiona Mactaggart: I thank my hon. Friend for her kind remarks. I am glad that she has taken over my former role in the all-party Voice group, which campaigns on these issues. The initiatives that we have taken to date, the new legislation that I described, the response following the consultation on the Mental Capacity Bill of increasing the penalty for such offences and the action that we have taken on care standards all need to bed down. Many of those steps will achieve the result that the Longcare inquiry identified as necessary, but if they do not, the Government will seriously consider introducing a further offence.

UK Forces (Iraq)

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the deployment of UK forces in Iraq.

There has been considerable speculation in the media over the past several days about the United Kingdom deploying forces outside its current area of operations in southern Iraq. The only relevant fact is that the UK military received a request for assistance on 10 October from the US military command in Iraq. Such requests and discussions between allies are routine. There is regular dialogue with our coalition allies and with the Iraqi security forces on all aspects of operations in Iraq. Requests for assistance form part of these exchanges.

The disposition of coalition forces in Iraq has been adjusted regularly since the end of combat operations. The Danish contingent, for example, has taken on a greater share of responsibility within Multi-National Division (South-East), and the Japanese have deployed a 500-strong contingent into the Dutch area of operations.

This request, if agreed, would involve UK land forces operating outside MND(S-E). It is worth bearing it in mind that Royal Air Force personnel have been operating over the whole of Iraq when required to support the coalition, and that some British personnel are based in Baghdad to support coalition operations. Other British land forces have previously operated outside MND(S-E).

Iraqi security forces and coalition forces have recently been involved in intensified operations to restore areas under the control of militants and terrorists to the authority of the Iraqi Interim Government. Recent operations in Najaf, in Samarra and in North Babil have been undertaken as part of this effort. The political process is moving ahead as a result of these actions. This strategy is designed to increase pressure on and deal with those terrorists who are trying to prevent the rebuilding of Iraq, and who threaten the holding of free elections in January.

The US request is for a limited number of UK ground forces to be made available to relieve US forces, to allow them in turn to participate in further operations elsewhere in Iraq, to maintain the continuing pressure on terrorists. The request does not ask for UK troops to be deployed to Baghdad city or to Falluja.

We are obviously considering the request. A number of issues require assessment, including timing, the length of the potential operation, command and control arrangements, logistics and which forces would be the most appropriate to conduct the operation. None of these details has, as yet, been decided, and a UK reconnaissance team will deploy to the area tomorrow to provide further information, which will inform the chiefs of staff. I expect the final recommendation from the Chief of the Defence Staff by the middle of the week. All these factors require careful consideration. Once we have made a decision, I will inform the House in the usual way.

Speculation over the weekend has focused on the suggestion that the request is somehow political, and that its timing is linked to elections. I want to make it clear that the request is a military request, and although it is linked to elections, it is linked not to the US elections but with efforts to create the best possible security situation in which to hold the Iraqi elections in January.

A number of commentators have voiced concerns about UK forces coming under US command, and about the rules of engagement. If we agree to this request, the arrangements will ensure that UK forces have a specific task; they will be responsible for a particular area. There are no practical difficulties for UK forces operating alongside those from the US. Our forces are fully engaged with all our coalition partners at every level of planning. UK forces work daily alongside forces from Italy, Denmark and other nations, including Poland, the Netherlands and Japan. This is a matter of routine, and it is an effective and practical way of ensuring coherence in our own area and with the areas surrounding it.

UK rules of engagement are more than adequate for tasks of the type envisaged; there is no need to adjust them. They will provide proper protection for UK forces, as they have during operations in volatile areas in our own sector, such as in al-Amarah.

It is worth noting that as the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces develop, they will expand the areas under their independent control. As a result, coalition forces will need to become more able to act flexibly in support of the security forces as they, in turn, take on greater responsibility for the protection of Iraqi civilians and property.

The Government remain totally committed to the holding of free elections in January, and to seeing a Government in Iraq who take their rightful place in the international community and who deliver prosperity and a new future for the Iraqi people. That should unite all parts of the House. It is right that the United Kingdom should do what it can to contribute to this fundamental strategic objective.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and for providing an advance copy earlier today. I start by saying that the Opposition express again with great pride our highest confidence in, and admiration for, the professionalism, courage and skill of the men and women of the British armed forces serving in Iraq. We fully support the coalition as it seeks to bring democracy, stability and freedom to Iraq, and to preserve her territorial integrity; and we agree with the Secretary of State that we should do what we can to contribute to the fundamental strategic objective.

I note the Secretary of State's assertion that no decisions have yet been finally taken, but may I, on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, raise a number of important markers that we hope he will bear in mind? As he moves to a decision on this deployment, will he consider following? Although we of course instinctively wish to assist our American allies, does he not agree that such a deployment would leave a big capability gap in Multi-National Division (South-East)? Will he also confirm that as the British divisional reserve, the Black Watch has itself been heavily engaged in that role since its deployment in MND (S-E)?

Given that the security situation could well deteriorate between now and the Iraqi elections, how does the Secretary of State plan to fill such an important capability gap, were this deployment to be made? Which Warrior-equipped battle group would undertake the role of the divisional reserve?

I turn to the issue of British troops coming under United States' command. Britain and the United States are, after all, the closest of allies and we have always operated together, but will the Secretary of State spell out how he sees the important detail of the likely command and control arrangements? Such a deployment would represent a fundamental change. Despite the assurances given in his statement, does he not agree that the rules of engagement will need to be extremely robust to cope with the change of area and the possibility of support from the Americans, who may well be using almost entirely different ROE?

Further and vitally, may we have the Secretary of State's absolute assurance that British troops, who are subject to the International Criminal Court—in contrast to their US counterparts, who are not—will not be compromised by any likely changes in the rules of engagement? The Secretary of State must answer that question and give the House an absolute assurance in this respect: what limit in time and manpower do the Government intend to assign to the deployment?

Does the Secretary of State further agree that, if our troops are deployed, they should have the power to influence the decision-making process rather than just the responsibility to execute it? Is he accordingly satisfied as to the general scale and input of British views and expertise in current coalition counter-insurgency planning? What is the latest date on which the US has requested that our troops be deployed, and is it not leaving it all to rather short notice to send out a recce group tomorrow to report back with the Chief of the Defence Staff's decision due on Wednesday? Do not US forces have their own deployable reserves, or are they all already fully engaged? Will the Secretary of State explain to the House what he believes to be the operational justification for this proposed substantial change to our dispositions, and will he also explain the nature of the military advice that he has thus far been given?

In view of what the Secretary of State has said, is he aware that Black Watch was told last Tuesday that it would not be coming home in November and that it would be redeployed? The Secretary of State needs to understand the feelings of the families, who will have watched with disbelief the unfolding shambles of the last few days and the Government's uncertainty and inability to make clear and prompt decisions on such vital matters.

Finally, given recent events and the need to look to the future, does not the Secretary of State now accept that it is fundamentally irresponsible to cut four infantry battalions from the order of battle while the Army is so clearly and obviously under such great pressure?

Mr. Hoon: Again, I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's unqualified support, and I hope that our American allies feel the same about the support that he appeared to give them—not least because he was quoted in The Sunday Times this Sunday as saying:

> "The concept of peacekeeping is one alien to our American friends."

No doubt that will be read with great enthusiasm in the White House and, indeed, in the Pentagon. Notwithstanding the hon. Gentleman's criticisms of our American allies, this is about a request from a close ally to provide assistance in a very difficult operation in and around the important centres that the Americans have been attacking in recent days. That has been designed to ensure that the terrorists do not have the opportunity of killing more innocent Iraqis and more innocent citizens not only of the UK but of other countries as well. That is why it is so important that, if we accept the request, we take the necessary action. It is a coalition effort—one ally strongly supporting another.

I shall try to deal with each of the hon. Gentleman's questions as best I can, given that a number of the issues necessarily fall to be decided by the chiefs of staff following appropriate information on the reconnaissance, to which I referred. It is important that we bear in mind the importance of assisting allies. To that extent, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The Black Watch has been heavily engaged, and if we take the decision to move it or other appropriate forces north we should cover the gaps in our capability. We are mindful of that.

The rules of engagement that we provide for British troops are already extremely robust and I do not anticipate any difficulty with them, either in their own right or as far as any possible remote threat from the ICC is concerned. There will be no compromise on those rules of engagement. I was slightly surprised over the weekend to hear the hon. Gentleman apparently calling for their publication. No doubt he has since reflected on that, as no Government—certainly no Conservative Government—have contemplated that in the past. I draw his attention in that respect to his own remarks in Hansard when he was Minister of State for the Armed Forces.

It is right that we do not set out the time limit in detail; it is a matter for military advice. The situation is similar for the scale and input of the UK's contribution. That equally applies to any latest date for deployment. I have set out the strong operational justification for the deployment. I do not believe, however, that it in any way affects our decision to take advantage of the withdrawal of four battalions from Northern Ireland, not least because this is an extra deployment that will require support, as hon. Members will recognise if they consider the decision calmly and rationally. The reason for readjusting our Army numbers to allow more support to logisticians and signallers is to permit this type of extra commitment. There is no shortage of infantry battalions, but there is an acute shortage of those who support the battalions.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I also thank the Secretary of State for notice of his statement and associate Liberal Democrats with the statements of support for United Kingdom forces in Iraq. Their performance in difficult conditions has been outstanding and we offer them our wholehearted support.

The United States has 130,000 military personnel in Iraq. Is the proposed deployment of 650 extra British troops purely for operational reasons? If so, what are those reasons, and why specifically British forces and not other United States forces or other coalition forces used to working under US control? Are none of those available?

Will the Secretary of State be specific about whether he has put the Black Watch under a warning to stay inside Iraq? Given that the Black Watch is the reserve force for the south, what other arrangements will be made to ensure that the effective capability of our force in the south will not be affected, especially at a time when the situation could deteriorate? What consideration has been given to the logistics implications, in particular for Warrior vehicles taken away from the south? Will he comment on the morale of the Black Watch, given that it was supposed to return to the UK in two weeks?

We know that American military tactics in Iraq are different from our own. Indeed, General Jackson told the House of Commons Defence Committee just that two weeks ago. Will our forces have to work under a different military doctrine? If the deployment is required for convincing operational reasons, will the Secretary of State assure the House that he will not go against the advice of the chiefs of staff who are going out to Iraq tomorrow to make their assessments?

Mr. Hoon: I assure the House that this is a military request, as I made clear. It is made for clear operational reasons. The House will not be surprised to learn that there is a continuing effort against those parts of Iraq that have been harbouring and sheltering terrorists. It is necessary to deal with those areas, and some have already been dealt with. Samarra was an outstanding military operation and proved very successful. It is necessary to maintain such operations to ensure that free elections take place in January, so there is a clear operational justification.

Incidentally, I cannot think of any other country that has worked more closely with US forces in recent times than Britain has. If the hon. Gentleman's argument is that those countries that have worked closely with the US should step forward, we would be the first in the queue. Attention will be paid to the provision of appropriate reserve forces and to necessary logistics.

I, too, asked about morale in the Black Watch. I emphasise that the Black Watch is toured for six months, as all British Army units are, and it will be back in the UK before the completion of that tour of duty. I was concerned that members of the Black Watch had been told informally that they might expect to return before those six months had elapsed. Having raised the problem of morale, I was left in no doubt that if there was any question about their commitment to participate in such an operation, I could take my criticisms and put them somewhere else—I paraphrase.

I do not accept that the deployment will involve a different military approach from the one that the UK adopts in its area of operations. As I said, if the operation is agreed to, the UK forces will be responsible for a discrete and particular area.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State call to mind the statements of his counterpart in the United States and indeed the President that the US forces can handle events in Iraq and that there should be no need for UK forces to get involved? My right hon. Friend will also have noted reports of American statements that the British attitude is one of institutionalised cowardice. Will he assure the House that he will bear both those elements in mind before coming to a decision—if he has not already done so?

Mr. Hoon: I assure my hon. Friend that no decision has been reached. I have set out the necessary steps before any such decision is made and, as I have already indicated, I will inform the House as soon as possible once the decision has been taken. I will certainly take his observations into account, but I wish to emphasise to him and to the House that we are part of a coalition and it is necessary for the participants to support each other. That is one of the factors that we will have to take into account before reaching any conclusion on that request.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): As the MP for Perth, where the Black Watch has its regimental headquarters, I know that people in my constituency do not understand why it is operationally necessary to deploy the 600-plus battalion in the US zone, where there are already more than 130,000 US soldiers. What does the Secretary of State have to say to my constituents who are anxiously awaiting news about their loved ones, who are currently on their second tour of duty within a year and who are being stabbed in the back at home by the Government's plan to disband their historic regiment? My constituents want to know when the Black Watch will come home.

Mr. Hoon: I thought that I had explained. I recognise that the hon. Lady represents a number of people closely concerned with the Black Watch. The Black Watch would have expected to fulfil a six-month tour of duty, as is consistent with all Army units. However, informally, it might have expected to return after four months. Those expectations may not be satisfied if the request is agreed to on an early basis. I am sure that the Black Watch will have strong views about that and, as I said a few moments ago, I raised the question of morale in the Black Watch, given the efforts that it had made in the past. I am sure that the hon. Lady knows the Black Watch much better than I do, but the message that I got was that it was determined to carry through this operation should it be decided that it should participate.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend accept that there is a clear perception—among those, such as me, who opposed the war and those who supported it—that British troops have been more intelligently and sensitively led in Iraq than the US forces? At a time when two thirds of Iraqi civilians who are killed die at the hands of the coalition, is not this the time to review the conduct of the war rather than to place British forces, which have done a fantastic job in their own way, under the command of the US?

Mr. Hoon: I have had the privilege of visiting British troops in their area of operations on several occasions and I acknowledge the remarkable way in which they have gone about their job. It is sometimes unfair to compare them with US troops in and around Baghdad, who have faced a wholly different kind of threat from that faced by British troops in the south. There have been some real difficulties in our area of operation, such as in al-Amarah, which has been superbly handled but has put great strain on British troops. The insurgency and terrorist threats that the Americans are dealing with are of a different order from those that British troops have faced in, for example, Basra. It is important that we offer our assistance, as part of the coalition, when it is requested.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Warminster in my constituency is currently the home of Lieutenant-Colonel Cowan and his battalion, who face a move to northern Iraq. What assessment has been made of the likely casualties that may be sustained in the event that that move takes place? Many of my constituents and their families will be deeply concerned.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that issue. It is obviously a matter that will have to be taken into account, not only by the chiefs of staff as they reach their conclusion based on the reconnaissance that will take place tomorrow, but by Ministers, who will report to the House about it.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I echo the sentiments that have been expressed about the redeployment of the Black Watch for the third time. I have no doubt that the regiment will serve admirably, as always; it will do a great job and morale will be as good as ever. As there is obviously a greater need for American troops to be involved in combat in the run-up to the elections in January, does my right hon. Friend foresee further requests from the Americans for more British troops to be redeployed outwith their area of operations? Are we not getting into a quagmire, given the mishandling of the war by America, which could lead us into a Vietnam situation?

Mr. Hoon: I have been at great pains to emphasise that this is a specific request for a particular purpose, arising from the need to deal with the terrorist threat in particular cities. Those cities are well known; Samarra has already been dealt with, and there has been negotiation to reduce the level of threat in places such as Sadr City. Incidentally, that has been of considerable benefit to British forces in the south of the country, as there seems—at any rate, for the moment—to be agreement among certain of the Shi'a militant forces to relax their efforts. That has obviously made life calmer, for the present, in the south. It is important to emphasise that this is about ensuring that the terrorist threat in particular parts of the so-called Sunni triangle is reduced, to allow the prospect of elections in January.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): I am one of those who continue to support the war and believe that it is right and that what is going on is right to bring democratic government to Iraq, but it is important that when the Secretary of State comes to the Dispatch Box he clarifies the position exactly, to show that there will be a genuine and clear military advantage, that our troops, under the guidance of the chiefs of staff, will bring added value to the operations that are taking place in Iraq and that the rules of engagement are clear. I have one simple question about something that I feel he glossed over slightly and which was brought up by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames)—the ICC. Will the Secretary of State explain how our different approach will not end up creating huge problems for us in the conduct of operations under the command, or associated command, of the Americans?

Mr. Hoon: This is not necessarily the occasion on which to debate the precise terms of the ICC statute. The right hon. Gentleman knows that we have robust rules of engagement and that we have consistently supported our troops and will not allow them to be placed in jeopardy due to some legal failure, or indeed as a result of our signing up to a statute, which, among other things, requires that the ICC intervene only when the state—in this case, the United Kingdom—had not taken appropriate action. That is a clear difference between our position and that of almost any other country. We would take robust action where it was appropriate.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is the restraint that has been shown by British troops in peacekeeping that has earned them respect among the Iraqis? Will it really be possible for them to maintain that restraint if they are deployed to a US sector that has been policed for more than a year by US forces who have not shown the same level of restraint? Does my right hon. Friend recall that the last time US forces besieged Falluja, they left Iraq in uproar over the many civilian casualties? In assessing the request, will he consider carefully the risk to British troops, in that if they free up US forces for the next attack they may be seen by some Iraqis as equally responsible for civilian casualties over which neither he nor they will have any control whatever?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the tribute he pays to British troops, but I qualify his observation to this extent: British forces are able to adjust their approach and tactics in the light of the threat they face. They will have to be less restrained—if I may adopt his word—if there is a direct physical threat to them. I hope that will not be the case, but obviously they have the flexibility and sophistication to be able to adjust appropriately to the conditions. What has changed since the last time that Falluja was approached in the way that it is proposed to deal with it is that sovereignty has passed to the Iraqi Interim Government and it will ultimately be their decision as to whether those operations take place. Indeed, significant numbers of Iraqi forces on the ground will participate in any operation, as they did in Samarra. This is no longer simply a question of the Americans deciding and doing, but a matter for the Iraqi Interim Government.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the difference between the British and American approaches to peacekeeping is not just a question of defending themselves against attack—British troops are just as robust in defending themselves against direct attack as any of their allies—but involves an approach to peacekeeping based on trying to keep the support of all the favourably disposed, non-insurgent civilian population? As the latest deployment is plainly intended to facilitate a further assault on Falluja, will the Government take the opportunity to try to exercise more influence on the Americans in their conduct of operations? In particular, will they stress the need to ensure that the force used is proportionate to the threat that is definitely known, and that action is conducted on a basis that minimises the threat to civilians and reduces the amount of air and artillery attack on densely populated areas of a city?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is at risk of making unfortunate generalisations about the US and the UK. I have conceded already that, in those areas where US forces are under a direct and regular threat from terrorist organisations, they must necessarily respond robustly. He quite fairly said that that would be the case if British troops faced the same kind of threat, but he must recognise that there are large parts of Iraq where US forces are deployed where, frankly, there is a degree of restraint—to adopt a phrase used by my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook)—and a degree of interaction with the local population that are no different from the way in which British forces operate in the south. The response of any force to a particular situation must depend on the threat that it faces and how often that threat occurs.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): I accept what my right hon. Friend says about this being a military request; I also accept what he says about the response to that request being a matter of timing. Will he take into account the fact that many hon. Members would hope that that timing will take into account the possibility of United Kingdom forces risking their lives being exploited politically in a closely fought United States election?

Mr. Hoon: I am very conscious of that, which is why I was at pains to emphasise that this is not about the politics of the US election; it is, however, about the politics of the Iraqi election in January.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): The Secretary of State convinced the House that the terms of engagement will be sufficiently robust, and I have no doubt that our forces are quite capable of operating outside their current area of operations. The problem is that much of the terrorism that they will take on was inevitable because of the way in which we went into the war. Quite a lot of the problems that we and our American allies are experiencing result from the fact that we did not have a proper plan for the peace. Regardless of what the chiefs of staff say, what does he believe will make the British influence sufficient to ensure that we do not get ourselves sucked further into a morass in Iraq, which is very dangerous and unlikely to be stable before the elections in January?

Mr. Hoon: Generally, I would agree with the hon. Gentleman's premise, but on this occasion I do not quite follow why the current attacks by vicious, brutal and ruthless terrorists have anything to do with the way in which the war was prosecuted. Indeed, many of the people whom we are trying to deal with in places such as Falluja are not even Iraqi citizens and were not based in Iraq at the time. The truth is that we are trying to deal with people who have killed more Iraqis than they have killed coalition forces—by a huge number. Trying to deal with those people is vital, and I hope that all hon. Members will support that if we are to restore Iraq to the international community and to legitimacy.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): My right hon. Friend must be aware of the widespread public alarm at the possible deployment of British troops. Does he not realise that what the British people really want is a clearly defined exit strategy from Iraq, not greater commitments and greater danger for our troops out there?

Mr. Hoon: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I believe that there is a clear exit strategy: it is to ensure that elections can take place and that the security conditions are right to permit those elections and the election of a democratic Iraqi Government, together with, as I indicated, the training of Iraqi police, security forces and a new Iraqi army that increasingly takes responsibility for Iraqi security. That seems to me to be a clear exit strategy, and I hope that she supports it.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): May I remind the Secretary of State that 3,000 troops from the Colchester garrison served Queen and country in the Iraq war, a war that we now know was fought under a false prospectus, and that 500 further troops from Colchester served in the peacekeeping? He will be aware that several troops from Colchester lost their lives. He may be of the view that public opinion in this country does not link the request with the American presidential election, but clearly public opinion in this country does. May I ask him specifically whether, if the Black Watch is moved into the American zone, any further British troops will be called in to make up for the gap left by the Black Watch?

Mr. Hoon: I made it clear earlier that that will be one of the considerations that will have to be addressed if we decide to accept this request.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the same President Bush who now wants the British forces to bail him out is the same man who, more than 12 months ago, said that the war was over? Is there not a strange irony about that? Why is it that it has to be done before 2 November? If it is going to be done before then, it is political. It is handing an oxygen cylinder to this President Bush, who was not elected properly the first time, and giving him a lifeline in order to win again. I have to tell my right hon. Friend that I and many others, not only in the House but outside, do not take kindly to the idea that we are being engaged with President Bush and the Pentagon in order to bail them out.

Mr. Hoon: I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's remarks are fully and thoroughly communicated to our American allies as we consider the timing of any request.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): When the Secretary of State rebuked my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) for unfortunate generalisations, I assume that he included the Chief of the General Staff, who told the Defence Committee that we fight with the Americans but not necessarily as the Americans. The House will require a great deal of reassurance that this distinction, which is not lost on the Iraqis, can be sustained if this battle group finds itself under American command.

The Secretary of State also said that gaps must be covered. If he is to deploy the divisional reserve, I think that General Rollo and the rest of the troops—particularly those under such pressure in al-Amarah—will want the Secretary of State to be rather more than simply mindful of the need to replace the divisional reserve and give them and the House an assurance that the divisional reserve will be replaced if it is to be deployed under American command.

Mr. Hoon: I think that it is very important that we recognise that all countries have a particular style and way of conducting operations. In response to the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), I emphasised the importance of not simply generalising about the way in which different countries conduct military operations. There are many parts of Iraq where Americans are keeping the peace no differently from the way in which British soldiers keep the peace in the south of Iraq.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate) (Lab): If the request for assistance is, as has been widely reported, to enable American troops to launch an all-out attack on Falluja, why have the British Government not already said no? Such an attack would result in the deaths of innocent Iraqi civilians, the terrorists having long gone, and will serve only to underline the total failure of the American Government to win the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people. Surely it will afford those who are opposed to this country the oxygen to be able to say that one of the best and most highly skilled and disciplined fighting forces in the world—namely the British Army—has been reduced to the level of mercenaries for a Republican White House.

Mr. Hoon: Notwithstanding my hon. Friend's concluding remarks, I hope that she agrees that it is necessary to deal with the kinds of terrorist organisation that are operating from Falluja. It is vital that we deal with that threat to democracy and security. Knowing her very impressive record in condemning injustice, breaches of human rights and murder, I am slightly surprised that she is not saying that this is the right thing for coalition forces—not American forces—to do. As I indicated in response to an earlier question, the final decision as to whether operations are conducted against Falluja will be taken by the Iraqis. It is their country; it is their hearts and minds. If they judge it necessary to deal with the threat to Iraqi citizens, they will be the ones to take the decision.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Although I was one of the minority on the decision to invade Iraq, does the Secretary of State accept that many people feel that we are not winning the propaganda war in Iraq, especially that for the hearts and minds of the people there? To that extent, may I ask him a simple question: if he goes ahead with putting the extra troops where they are required, will he make it abundantly clear at the same time that the British and American Governments will withdraw their troops when the newly elected Government in Iraq take the view that they can look after the security of the country themselves?

Mr. Hoon: It is vital that the Iraqis are responsible for their own security, which is why British and other coalition forces are engaged in extensive training programmes to equip Iraq with the right kinds of security forces. I do not accept that the hon. Gentleman is right about the battle for hearts and minds and the question of public opinion in Iraq. If some slight good has come from the appalling and tragic death of Ken Bigley, it is that it has shown to huge numbers of people in Iraq and throughout the Arab world the appalling brutality of which the terrorists are capable. There are clear signs that that terrible death has swung opinion firmly on the side of those who are trying to deal with the terrorists.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): My right hon. Friend referred to political perception. Is it not a political reality that in the US election campaign, the role of the allies has become a central area of dispute between the two candidates? Is it not therefore essential that British troops are not seen as being used to favour one candidate over another?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly agree, and that will not happen.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): If we refuse the Americans' request, what penalties are we likely to incur?

Mr. Hoon: There would be no penalty, but we would have failed in our duty as an ally and as a country that has closely supported the United States—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): Given such serious worries as increased risk to our forces, mission creep, and British involvement in military strategies that could cause major civilian casualties, alienate more Iraqis and perhaps be distorted by US domestic politics, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that we will have a full opportunity to debate and deliberate before a decision is taken?

Mr. Hoon: The answer to my hon. Friend's question is the same as the one that I have given him on many previous occasions: it has never been this country's constitutional arrangement that the House of Commons necessarily approves the redeployment of forces that have already been committed to a specific theatre. He might take a different view of what the constitutional arrangements should be, but I assure him and other hon. Members that when any decision is taken I shall report it to the House immediately.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Is it not self-deluding to continue to describe the people defending Falluja as terrorists when the great majority of them are unquestionably Sunni nationalists who regard themselves as Arab patriots? Does the Secretary of State remember that before the war, from my personal experience, I warned him of the difficulties and dangers of fighting in Arab towns, to which he replied, "It depends which side the population is on"? He knows the answer to that question now, does he not?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that terrorists such as al-Zarqawi who lead significant numbers of foreign fighters in places such as Falluja are entitled in any way to be described as Sunni nationalists. They are brutal killers and they are killing Iraqis. It is our responsibility, on behalf of the coalition, to make the effort to deal with those people.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I listened to the Secretary of State and I think I am correct—he will confirm this—that a decision has not been made and that it will be taken on military terms. May I put this simply: I beg him not to accede to the request? In addition to the military aspect, there is a political dimension to the situation, and hon. Members are entitled to ask him to take their views on that into account. Not one member of the parliamentary Labour party has supported the deployment. Many of us find it totally incredible that the United States of America cannot find the logistic support and infantry to fill the gap. I found his response to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) deeply upsetting, because he said that he had not made up his mind but then said that to turn down the request would be letting down allies. It would not. The United Kingdom has given 110 per cent. on this issue, and some of us have provided political cover and support for this Government. I beg him not to try to stretch the envelope too much; otherwise it might burst. Some of us will not stomach it and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State replies, may I say that many hon. Members still wish to speak, and brief supplementaries would be very helpful?

Mr. Hoon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure that I can reply to my hon. Friend, because I did not detect a question, but I will certainly take his observations into account.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): Following earlier questions and answers, does the Secretary of State agree that the courage and determination of our armed forces are such that they will concur with any request that is made to them by the Government?

Mr. Hoon: That is the great strength of armed forces that are answerable constitutionally to Government and to this Parliament.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): It is clear that there might be a strong case for the need for more troops in the American sector, but can the Secretary of State spell out why those troops should be provided by the British Government and not the American Government?

Mr. Hoon: I have set out the case right from the start of my statement. These are extra operations being conducted in areas of particular difficulty. The US requires extra forces, and extra support from allies, including the United Kingdom, to be able to achieve those operations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that some of us who opposed this war, and still oppose it, believe none the less that, given the fact that we are there, and subject to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), it would be extremely difficult to refuse a request from the United States for military assistance? However, does it not also demonstrate the dangers of our presence? Therefore, will he give an undertaking to the House that he will give no assurance to anybody, explicit or implicit, that British forces will remain deployed there after the expiration of the current mandate in June next year?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. and learned Gentleman sets out an argument that I have sought to use to persuade hon. Members on both sides of the House. When those who have opposed military operations look at the situation today in Iraq, they should be saying precisely what he said: here we are, we have a very difficult situation, and we have to continue our efforts to restore a degree of security in Iraq, to allow democratic elections to take place and to defeat terrorism. That is precisely the argument that I hope all hon. Members will subscribe to. As for a time limit, I shall not give the right hon. and learned Gentleman any guarantees, but obviously there are legal requirements that the United Kingdom would have to satisfy were the mandate to continue beyond the date that he specified.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State tell us when exactly was the last time that British troops operated in a war zone under the direct control of a foreign country?

Mr. Hoon: UK forces regularly come under the command of others—and not only of the United States. Whether they are operating in the south, as they are today, or whether they operate, if this request is accepted, under the control of a US commander further north in Iraq, a US commander is still ultimately in charge. A British commander is the No. 2. Whenever we deploy on multinational operations, for example as part of NATO, the commander may well be American or from any other of the NATO states. What my hon. Friend suggests may be unusual is actually a regular occurrence.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): This is not a time for ambiguity, vacillation or prevarication of any kind: a decision needs to be taken.

[Mr. Quentin Davies]

Perhaps a decision already has been taken but, if it has not, may I express the hope that we will accede to the request, so long as our commanders on the spot confirm that we have the resources to do the job? We were right to get into this operation alongside our American allies; my only regret is that we did not do it before, and did not complete the job in 1991. Now that we are in, it is very important that we continue to show ourselves to be firm and reliable allies, utterly committed to seeing this thing through and therefore prepared to take our share of the risks of the operation. I believe that the gallant British servicemen and women whom I met in the Gulf on two occasions when I was a defence spokesman would want that.

Mr. Hoon: I have set out to the House the process that we will follow. I assure the hon. Gentleman that when a decision is reached, I shall report it to the House in the usual way.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Since the Secretary of State appears to have made up his mind, given his response to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), will he tell us whether British troops will be present in the anticipated all-out attack on Falluja after 2 November? Will they be expected to take casualties as the United States has, and will they be involved in that sort of operation? Does he actually have any control over the matter once he has acceded to the request?

Mr. Hoon: I made it clear in my statement that the request does not involve the deployment of British troops to Falluja.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The National Security Committee under the Iraqi Interim Government is attended by the American forces commander, but not the British one. Why is that? If we are to commit extra forces as the Secretary of State has outlined, will he seek attendance at that committee for the British commander, or is he content for us always to claim great influence over our allies while failing to deliver it where it counts—on the ground?

Mr. Hoon: There is significant British representation at that meeting at a very high level.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend explain why he is considering deploying additional British reserve troops when it is American forces that are under pressure? Will not the people of this country realise that this is political expediency with a large P?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that, and I believe that I have answered that question several times already. There is a clear operational reason for conducting the operation to remove the terrorist threat in places such as Falluja. The Americans have made a request of an ally to assist. We shall consider that request very carefully in the next few days.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): In answer to an earlier question, the Secretary of State accepted that our forces are so professional and well trained that they will rise to any challenge that is asked of them. Surely, therefore, their political masters have to be that much more responsible and careful about what challenges they ask them to rise to. To that end, what assessment has the right hon. Gentleman made of the overstretch in the US forces such that they cannot find the 600 troops from their own resources?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right that a careful assessment is required. That assessment will be conducted, but it does not include a detailed assessment of whether the United States is right to make the request. An ally has made a request. It is necessary that we consider it carefully.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has been at pains to say that our troops will not be committed in, for example, attacks on Falluja or direct action against terrorists. However, he has failed to say what precisely British troops will be required to do that cannot be done by the many American troops already present. That is particularly important given the fact that if British troops are deployed into the American zone, gaps will be created in the British zone.

Mr. Hoon: The specific reason is to free American forces to conduct extra operations in places such as Falluja where terrorists are well established and are attacking both coalition forces and innocent Iraqi civilians. We have been asked to fill in in the areas left by the American forces who will be engaged in such operations.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): If we start to serve in the American sector, what input in the decision-making process will British commanders on the ground have? What will the relationship with their American counterparts be? What discretion, if any, will they have? Does he not agree that his defence of the morale of the Black Watch is a vindication of the regimental system, which he has pledged to destroy?

Mr. Hoon: Let us just deal with the point about the regimental system. Opposition Members have had an entertaining time in their local and, indeed, national newspapers talking about attacks on that system, but there is no such attack. There will still be a regimental system, and I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman reads more carefully the statement that I made to the House and the material that has been published, he will accept that that is the case. That demonstrates the importance of studying the Government's proposals carefully.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Is there not a danger of exaggerating the political significance in the United States of any decision that we take? Is it not a fact that the woeful economic performance of the Bush Administration and Democrats' anger at what happened four years ago are more likely to decide the outcome of the election than any simple decision made in the House? Will my right hon. Friend assure me that whatever decision we make will be made in the light of sending a clear message to the Iraqi people that we will not desert them and will see things through to next year to help them in their elections?

Mr. Hoon: I suspect that there might be as much danger in answering the first part of my hon. Friend's question as there was in less friendly questions earlier today. It is important, however, that we consider the future of Iraq and make the decisions required to allow it to hold elections in January. That is what this is about.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): My interest is in the register.

The Secretary of State rightly spoke about the robust rules of engagement. I am inclined to support the deployment, but I have a reservation. Perhaps he can reassure me by telling me that he shares my anger and indignation that a soldier carrying out his mission in Iraq can be cleared of wrongdoing by his commanding officer and yet be arraigned at the Old Bailey? That is an outrage.

Mr. Hoon: That is a matter for the courts. The hon. Gentleman knows better than I do that it is best left to the legal authorities. It is not a matter for Ministers to comment on or, indeed—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I tell the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) that the Front Bench has had its turn, and he must be quiet?

Mr. Hoon: I was hoping that the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) would refer to his excellent work in co-ordinating our efforts with Italian forces, which was a valuable illustration of the importance of coalition activity. The House, and the Government in particular, are extremely grateful to him for the way in which he promoted good alliances with our coalition counterparts.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I know that the Secretary of State said that no decision has been made about the request, but given his answer to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), I was reminded of a line from a song in the musical "Oklahoma":

> "I'm jist a girl who cain't say no".

Can he tell the House of any occasion when a request from our American allies was turned down? If not, would he as Secretary of State place any limits on the deployment of British troops in out-of-area activities at the request of the Bush Administration?

Mr. Hoon: "Oklahoma" was a bit before my time.

Mr. Skinner: The actress's name was Gloria Grahame—an American.

Mr. Hoon: I am getting help with the participants; but I do not accept the assertion of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). It is important to concentrate on the operational nature of the deployment and recognise that it is in the interests of the Iraqi people.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Both the report by the Iraq survey group and the initial report by the Volcker inquiry highlighted the extent of corruption at the United Nations during the oil-for-food programme and its effect on the insurgency in Iraq. Given that Saddam Hussein and his entourage personally benefited to the tune of $10 billion, what effect is that having on the current insurgency, particularly in the Sunni areas, where our forces may be deployed?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman raises an extremely important issue. There is no doubt that some people who are continuing to fight are fighting for the restoration not of Saddam's regime in particular, but of the privileges and money that they enjoyed as a result of the corruption that existed during his time in office. There is no doubt that many of those people benefited significantly and are using some of those funds to buy weapons to kill not only members of the coalition, but Iraqis.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I salute the work of our troops in Iraq, but urge my right hon. Friend to treat the request with great circumspection for fear of putting them in greater danger. Can he explain how it is that, as he has repeatedly said, he is considering a request from the United States of America, when in theory earlier this year sovereignty was transferred in Iraq? Has there been any request from the Iraqi Government? Will he explain the command structure in that relationship?

Mr. Hoon: The request is from a fellow member of the multi-national force. We are there at the behest, and with the consent of, the Iraqi Interim Government and, as I indicated earlier, should there be any operations against Falluja, or any other place in Iraq, they will take place only with the agreement of the Interim Government.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The whole House will be conscious that the Secretary of State bears a heavy responsibility. Discharging that responsibility a little while ago, he said in response to a question that we would fail to support an ally if we were to turn down this request. How can he have come to so concrete a conclusion if, as he has claimed repeatedly this afternoon, no decision has yet been taken?

Mr. Hoon: It is clear that the reason why we would want to accede to this request—if that is what we decide to do—would be because we would be in support of an ally. We cannot go into a coalition and then simply cross our fingers and say that there are certain circumstances under which we will not participate. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that for a moment. Were we to refuse that request, it would go to the heart of our relationship not only with the United States, but with other members of that alliance.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend say a little about the logistical prerequisites of any such further deployment, with particular reference to the greater need for armoured vehicles?

Mr. Hoon: Those are matters that will be the subject of the reconnaissance that is about to take place and they will be taken into account by the chiefs of staff in their advice to Ministers.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that, from conflicts as diverse as Malaya in the 1950s to the Balkans in the 1990s, the British Army has both developed and implemented peacekeeping strategies that are superior to those of any other army in the world? Does he recall the dispute between the British and the Americans over the occupation of Pristina airport and the way in which that was resolved? Does he therefore think that he should pay more attention to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) that, if the British are deployed in this way, it is vital that they have a key input into the counter-insurgency strategy that is followed?

Mr. Hoon: As I made clear, the request is for British forces to participate in operations in a discrete and particular area of Iraq and therefore their position will be no different from the one that they are in today in conducting operations in the south of Iraq.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I join the Secretary of State in paying tribute not just to the troops, but to the excellent work of those in the RAF, many of whom will have come from the Vale of York. If he accedes to the request, will he not be moving further away from his target of having 24 months between operational tours? Does that not support the thesis of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) that we need more battalions rather than fewer?

Mr. Hoon: Unfortunately not, because the very people who have the least opportunity of a 24-month rotation are those who have precisely the kinds of skills that we are intending to reinforce by redeploying the four battalions from Northern Ireland into those areas of shortage. It is no good the hon. Lady shaking her head. If she really is concerned about those who have been most stretched in recent times, she needs to look at the logistics and at engineers, intelligence personnel and signallers, who are precisely the kind of people who support operations. If she looks carefully at what I said, she will see that our intention is to use the strength released from those four battalions to help those shortage areas.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): This is clearly no time for narrow partisanship or opportunistic repositioning. Speaking as one of those who voted for the war, would back exactly the same text again, believe that the Prime Minister has been honest on this subject throughout and think that the coalition forces should finish the job that they have quite properly started, may I put it to the Secretary of State that, subject to the caveats that he has very properly highlighted this afternoon, in seeking to reinforce United States efforts to establish security in Iraq and fight terrorism there, he is entitled to receive the strong, principled and consistent support of people in all parties for doing what is right, however inconvenient it may be?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I assume that he was not accusing the Government of opportunistic repositioning. He seemed to be directing his gaze towards his own Front Bench.

Tomlinson Working Group

4.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): I should like to make a statement on the reform of education and training for 14 to 19-year-olds on the occasion of the publication of the final report from Mike Tomlinson's working group on 14 to 19 reform.

I welcome the working group's report and commend it wholeheartedly to the House. I am extremely grateful to Mr. Tomlinson and his colleagues for their very hard work over the past 21 months. They have consulted widely and openly, and have now produced a cogently argued, challenging and compelling vision of the future. Through their regular engagement with the many stakeholders, including schools, colleges, universities and employers, I believe that they have laid the basis for the development of a broad consensus on the best way forward. I believe that it is important that this consensus extends across the whole House, so I have encouraged Mr. Tomlinson to keep in touch with the main Opposition parties and have authorised my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards to give early briefing to their spokespeople.

I appointed Mr. Tomlinson with the view that the status quo is not sustainable. Doing nothing is not an option. Under the current system, many of our young people achieve very high standards, whether in schools, colleges or work-based training, and move on to higher education or employment. But too many drop entirely out of education or training by the age of 17. Some do not have sufficient grasp of the core skills that they need for work and life. Others cannot find a straightforward path to meet their vocational ambitions. Some are simply not stretched enough to enable them to fulfil their own potential.

When we published our policy document "14–19: Opportunity and Excellence" at the beginning of last year, we concluded that those problems could not be solved simply by short-term measures, important though they are. Longer-term reform is also necessary. We therefore asked the working group to advise on a framework for qualifications that would enable all our young people to achieve their full potential, motivate them to stay in learning after the age of 16 and also reduce the burden of assessment on students, their teachers and the examinations system.

The working group's report covers all aspects of the curriculum and qualifications framework for the 14 to 19 phase. Its recommendations have far-reaching implications for the structures of education and training. They include proposals to introduce the study of core skills in literacy, numeracy, communication and ICT for all 14 to 19-year-olds; direct employer engagement in the development of vocational programmes; provision of coherent routes to fulfil vocational aspirations; the introduction of an extended project to replace coursework; and a more academically stretching system of assessment. Each of these will require short and medium-term reforms. On that basis, the report recommends development of the diploma, with the recommendation that, over time, all existing academic and vocational qualifications would be brought within its framework.

The report argues that that approach has many advantages. It would establish a single coherent, understood qualifications framework for the first time. It would put vocational and academic qualifications on a common footing, again for the first time. It would promote greater personalisation of the curriculum to meet the needs of individuals and greater choice for young people. The report also argues that a diploma would stretch our most able young people while re-engaging with those who currently drop out of learning. Such an approach would, of course, bring great challenges, as the working group acknowledges. It would be the biggest single reform of qualifications in any of our lifetimes.

Mr. Tomlinson's report rightly states that the Department for Education and Skills and its partner organisations must undertake further work before a blueprint for reform is drawn up and that the reforms will take at least 10 years to introduce. I agree with the careful, deliberate approach to reform adopted by the working group, and I accept it. Above all in that complex area, we owe it to our young people to ensure that the stability of the qualification system is paramount in our thinking and that reform is based on consensus, evolution, careful planning and the rigorous piloting of any change.

For those reasons, I shall, of course, consider the report carefully, and I intend to make positive and detailed proposals in a White Paper early in the new year. The White Paper will include my assessment of how the working group report measures up to the five tests that I set when the working group's interim report was published. The tests are: excellence—will the system stretch the most able; vocational—will it address the historical failure to provide a high-quality vocational offer that motivates young people; employability—will it prepare all young people for the world of work; assessment—will it reduce the burden of assessment; and disengagement—will it stop our high drop-out rate at 16?

In preparing the White Paper, I shall, of course, work closely with my colleagues with responsibility for education and training in Wales and Northern Ireland, which share our qualifications framework, and with our statutory partners. I am writing today to the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority to ask it to undertake the necessary work to enable us to develop our detailed proposals for the White Paper. I shall also discuss my proposals with a wide range of stakeholders, including schools, colleges, universities and employers, and I look forward to hearing the views of the Education and Skills Committee in due course. I expect this to be the first of many opportunities to consider those crucial issues in this House.

I am determined that any evolution of the system must increase public confidence in the system. My approach will therefore build on all that is good in the current system, including the real and great strengths of A-levels and GCSEs. The Tomlinson report rightly confirms the place in the system of A-levels and GCSEs, which it seeks to build on and which will stay as the building blocks of any new system. Mike Tomlinson's report also makes it clear that assessment must and will continue at all levels on the basis of rigorous, trusted and externally marked examinations, but, again as Mike's report proposes, we will need to consider the number and nature of those exams. We also believe it essential that full public accountability for results is maintained, including the publication nationally of exam results, school by school, at 16 and 19.

The Government have made tremendous strides in taking action to raise standards in primary and secondary schools, and we have also addressed both the challenges of higher education and the development of the nation's skills base. Now we must move on the reform of 14 to 19 education and training. A number of the most pressing problems are already being addressed. For example, this September saw the first 1,000 pupils on young apprenticeships start their programmes and the introduction into the national curriculum of work-related learning for all 14 to 16-year-olds, with an increased take-up of vocational qualifications. The increased flexibility programme allows 14 to 16-year-olds to spend time out of school in colleges or work-based learning, in which approximately 90,000 pupils are currently involved.

The working group's proposals give us an opportunity to consider more far-reaching reform that will shape 14 to 19 education for decades to come. Its proposals have implications for every young person in school, college or the workplace, and for those who work with them. The opportunity is great, but with it comes the heavy responsibility to turn Mike Tomlinson's vision of a 14 to 19 system that meets the needs and aspirations of all our young people into a practical reality, and I hope that both sides of the House share that objective.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): I thank both the Secretary of State and the Minister for School Standards not only for an advance copy of the statement, but for the constructive, positive and non-partisan way in which they have handled this important matter. As the Secretary of State said, today is hugely important for schools, employers and future generations of young people. I hope that he will pass on from both sides of the House our gratitude to Mike Tomlinson and his team for their diligent, detailed and painstaking work.

Does the Secretary of State agree that, given that what has been sketched out is a 10-year programme that is likely to stretch across three Parliaments, it is important to reach cross-party agreement on at least some aspects of the proposals? Does he accept that the objectives set out by the Tomlinson report—to raise core skills of literacy, numeracy and ICT, to improve vocational education, to encourage greater participation beyond the age of 16, and to stretch and differentiate the most able more clearly and rigorously—are issues on which we can and should all agree? In that spirit, does he accept that proposals to reduce coursework will be widely welcomed as a means by which simultaneously to reduce pupil and teacher workload and to tackle growing allegations about the prevalence of plagiarism, and that the extended project must not become a back-door route to the same problems?

Does the Secretary of State share our strong welcome for the proposal to make receipt of a diploma absolutely contingent on passing a tough, externally assessed literacy and numeracy test? Does he agree that the aim should be to put our young people through fewer but more rigorous exams and to encourage flair and originality rather than an excessively mechanistic approach? Does he further agree that we must move away from the days when academic subjects were exclusively for the best and vocational subjects entirely for the rest, and that in future every child will need the encouragement and incentive to do well, in challenging and inspiring ways, in both? Does he agree that if we get that right, we can make huge progress in reducing truancy and improving staying-on rates?

The Secretary of State rightly said that the report requires and deserves in-depth study before final detailed conclusions are reached. We entirely endorse that approach and will pursue it ourselves. However, may I press him on some issues not of detail but of principle? Does he agree that Britain, not for a few years under one party but for generations across all parties, has undervalued and under-invested in vocational education? Can we agree that getting it right will require substantial new resources and that we cannot and must not ask schools or colleges to transform their vocational offerings without the wherewithal to do so?

Does the Secretary of State agree with successive Labour and Conservative Ministers in the past 15 years that school league tables are valuable and useful to parents? Does he accept that one can have neither the Prime Minister's vision of choice for parents nor the Conservative vision without those league tables and does he recognise that external assessment at 16 is the absolute prerequisite for them? Does he accept the unequivocal view of the British Chambers of Commerce that external assessment at 16 is essential for employers too?

Does he agree in principle that greater differentiation of the most able means that fewer young people at 18 would get the very highest grade? Tomlinson recommends that the top 5 or 10 per cent. should get his proposed A-double-plus or distinction diploma. We take the view that 5 to 10 per cent. should get the very highest grade by norm referencing. We may well differ on the mechanism, but will he confirm that he accepts the principle that we can no longer have more than 20 per cent. of all A-level students attaining the very highest grade?

Does the Secretary of State agree that it is vital to make sure that all school leavers have some qualification, but that the way to do that is to raise teaching standards, not to give out qualifications without justification? In that context, will he be very careful about the report's idea that the first of the four proposed tiers of the diploma—the entry level—should be given to people who have not reached the standard of a level 1 NVQ or even a grade G at GCSE?

Does the Secretary of State agree with the CBI that the absolute priority for employers is to raise the standards of functional literacy and numeracy among school leavers, which have been unacceptably poor under successive Governments? Does he therefore agree that that aspect of reform requires the most urgent action? Does he agree with the CBI that an attempt to scrap all existing exams would be an unwelcome and unnecessary diversion from that task?

Finally and most importantly, does the Secretary of State agree that, although there are considerable virtues in the diploma idea, it should include, not replace, GCSEs and A-levels? As this is the most important issue for many of those observing these discussions, may I press him specifically? Is it his view, as it is mine, that the relevant diploma should have, up front on its front page, the subject and grade that a pupil has attained at A-level or GCSE? Does he agree with Mike Tomlinson's repeated denials in interviews that he is recommending the end of A-levels and GCSEs? If that is the Secretary of State's view, will he make it clear that he will not allow abolition to become the agenda of those who seek to implement recommendation 2 of the report, which is, as he knows, somewhat ambiguous? It says both that "the existing system of qualifications taken by 14–19 year-olds should be replaced" and that

"Existing qualifications such as GCSEs"

and

"A-levels . . . should cease to be free-standing qualifications in their own right but should evolve to become components of the Diploma".

Which is it? Will the Secretary of State join me in clearly, unequivocally and finally ruling out the abolition of those exams?

The Tomlinson report offers a real chance for progress if we focus absolutely on the imperatives of improving vocational education and raising basic standards of functional literacy and numeracy. We must not waste time instead on a debate about abolishing and replacing well-understood and respected GCSEs and A-levels. We must build on what works, not scrap everything and start all over again. Above all, we must raise standards, not water them down. I, too, hope that we can all agree about that.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his overall approach. I will pass on his gratitude to Mr. Tomlinson and his committee. I endorse what he said about having to work on a cross-party basis in so far as we can. That does not mean that we will agree on every particular—no one expects that—but it requires that we have a mature discussion in a positive way.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's general points about the extended project work and coursework, the external rigours of the diploma, the need for flair and originality and the importance of academic and vocational education. I also agree that the development of a proper vocational offer has resource implications that need to be dealt with properly, although I think that collaboration between schools and colleges and employers can take us some way down that route.

League tables do indeed have value at 16 and require rigorous external assessment. As I said in my statement, a rigorous external assessment regime at 16 is critical to the system.

I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's points about a quota for A-level grades. I heard his party leader making similar remarks earlier today. I believe that their view is an outdated concept of awarding A-level grades by quota, not quality, and I think it is entirely the wrong approach. It was in fact my predecessor, Sir Keith Joseph, who brought about the changes that led to the situation of which they are complaining. It is rare that I would applaud Sir Keith and pray him in aid against the current Conservative party, but the fact is that we have to have an assessment system that looks at people's quality and drives forward their attainment rather than taking some arbitrary "Graded grains make finer flour" approach.

The whole thrust of the proposals is to raise standards throughout, including in the core skills, such as literacy and numeracy, and we will certainly support that. I agree that progress can be made very quickly in this area, but perhaps I should emphasise that I announced the White Paper early in the new year because I want to set out a very clear programme of work dealing with all those proposals in order, precisely as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

I need to reassert what Mr. Tomlinson said today on A-levels and GCSEs. He said:

> "The point I would like to make very clear is that these proposals will not—and I do not know how many times I will have to repeat it—not mean the abolition of external examinations, nor the abolition of GCSE, AS and A-levels as courses and subjects."

I agree that this diploma must show the grades in each of the subjects and the particular level of qualification—that is what it ought to be.

Finally, I agree that the suggestion that the whole report is about the abolition of exams is a complete misreading of the whole thrust of what we are about. The report is about raising standards at all levels of education and ensuring that every young person can fulfil their aspirations in a way that the current system makes difficult rather than simple to achieve.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I, too, thank the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for the courtesy of an advance copy, and also for fully briefing myself and the Liberal Democrats on today's proposals from Mike Tomlinson. The Secretary of State's efforts to maintain a broad consensus over the key proposals is appreciated by my party, and we say that it is absolutely critical to their success. It is, however, a great pity that some have sought to undermine the review for narrow party political gain, without even considering the proposals in detail. I should also like to offer our appreciation to Mike Tomlinson and the 14 to 19 working group for undertaking what has been a Herculean task. They deserve the praise of the whole House.

As a party, we Liberal Democrats offer broad support for the review's overall direction and welcome the concept of the new diploma. We also welcome the time span involved in implementing various aspects of it and hope that it will be possible to introduce many of those aspects within that time scale, where appropriate.

I am absolutely delighted that the Secretary of State made it clear that he will have no truck with a return to norm referencing for any stage of the diploma. To deny young people recognition of their achievements on the basis of a mathematical quota would be unacceptable to my party, and I am delighted that it is unacceptable to him. But will he also make it clear—he did not do so in his answer to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins)—that he rejects a single-subject qualification structure within the diploma? We strongly support the principle, laid out by Mike Tomlinson today, of retaining much of the content of GCSEs and A-levels, but we agree that the qualifications themselves, as single subjects, must go. The diploma cannot simply be a wrapper for existing qualifications, and if the Secretary of State believes that Mike Tomlinson is saying that it can, perhaps he will say so at the Dispatch Box.

I am sure that the Secretary of State has noted the comments of the CBI and of the British Chambers of Commerce. We are delighted that there will be differentiation within the diploma at all levels, but will he confirm that unless a student gets the necessary grades in ICT, numeracy and literacy, they will not be awarded the diploma at the level in question? Will he also explain in what way he expects British business to be involved in and influence the vocational curriculum, because the record of such involvement is certainly not a good one to date?

Liberal Democrats support the use of internal assessment throughout the 14 to 19 phase and a move away from age-related examinations, but will the Secretary of State explain how it is possible to move away from such examinations while retaining league tables at 16, as he seemed to suggest earlier? The two ideas seem to contradict each other. We also support the concept of chartered examiners and accredited centres to guarantee quality. We find it remarkable that a first-year postgraduate is allowed to mark the work of an undergraduate, leading to the award of a degree, yet a teacher with 20 years' experience cannot mark the work of a 15-year-old.

The aspect of the Tomlinson reforms that pleases us most is that they begin to meet the needs of an army of young people who have so far been left out of a curriculum and qualifications structure that is largely irrelevant. How does the Secretary of State reconcile his own five-year plan, which encourages institutional autonomy, with a 14 to 19 review that seeks institutional collaboration? How does he propose to offer all young people independent quality guidance in the making of informed choices? How are young people going to access transport to enable them to move between institutions and the workplace? Crucially, how will the diploma stimulate learning post-16 for young people who are not in full-time education or training?

There are many vital issues that need clarification, and hopefully, when the Secretary of State introduces the White Paper it will deal not just with the Tomlinson reforms but with the entire 14 to 19 phase, including those vital issues. Today's report gives us a blueprint for the future, but we hope that it will prove to be more than just an interesting wrapper. We hope that, in 10 years' time, it will provide the four-year-olds of today with a completely new curriculum and choice.

Mr. Clarke: I echo what I said to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), in that I appreciate the constructive approach taken by the Liberal Democrats and the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) in particular. I shall respond to five of the points that were made. I do not believe that a diploma can, under any circumstances, be simply a wrapper for individual qualifications. The whole point of the proposed diploma as it evolves in five or 10 years' time—or whenever it may be—is that it should provide a way of interrelating the various qualifications arising at various points. That means that we still have the key A-level subjects or whatever at the top, but there is a relationship between the subjects, which I believe is the right way to proceed. It is certainly not simply a wrapper.

[Mr. Clarke]

On the core, the hon. Gentleman is entirely correct. He is right that Mike Tomlinson is suggesting that at each stage there should be a certain core of basic skills that everyone should have—and it will be tested. Incidentally, as Mike Tomlinson pointed out today, that is a sharper requirement than the current one for five A* to C GCSEs, because it requires English and maths to be part of that approach overall. It is a significant development—a toughness, in a way—to move forward on that basis.

I also agree with the hon. Gentleman's points about employers and would remark simply that Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, David Bell, particularly emphasised today the key role for employers in designing the curriculum. We believe that, through the sector skills councils and other work that we are carrying out, we are laying the proper basis for that to happen. That is why I very much hope that the CBI will adopt a positive approach towards it.

On the question of rigour, I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman. The key issue is how it is established at each stage of the examination regime—

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Rigor mortis.

Mr. Clarke: It is interesting to hear the Conservatives talking about rigor mortis, as it largely characterises their party.

On collaboration for the 14 to 19 phase, I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman, and we believe that the process that we already have in train will allow it to happen.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement to the House this afternoon. With respect to what is proposed for 14 to 19-year-olds and vocational training, may I tell him that we cannot get the places quickly enough? If he wants to make progress in advance of the 10 years that he anticipates, north Staffordshire would be happy to be involved in a pilot scheme between the college of further education and the schools.

On my right hon. Friend's statement and the taking of further advice from the Select Committee on Education and Skills, given that one of the really serious issues that we face today is climate change, I ask him to take seriously the issues in education for sustainable development and to use the Tomlinson report to integrate that subject into the new curriculum that we will be establishing.

Mr. Clarke: First, I enthusiastically accept my hon. Friend's offer to have Stoke help with the piloting work. Secondly, we published a year ago our action plan for sustainable development, which included particular aspects of curricular organisation, and I agree with my hon. Friend that this report provides important opportunities.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that one of the principal factors that has called the rigour of the current exam system into question is the increasing prevalence of course work in it? I welcome the Tomlinson commitment to reduce it. However, does he also accept that over the next 10 years many millions of young people will be taking exams as they are at the moment? What proposals does he have to bring forward the reduction in the amount of course work, so that those pupils can be brought into the new exam system before the Tomlinson report is fully implemented?

Mr. Clarke: I said in my earlier response that the White Paper will include a timetable for implementing the various changes. We will work in close consultation with the examination boards and others, precisely to address the points of rigour that the hon. Gentleman makes about the relative merits of course work vis-à-vis examinations and similar issues. One mistake that I do not intend to make is to introduce a set of changes in a relatively instantaneous way without consulting fully the relevant interests. I want to ensure that they are properly locked in, which is the principle that I shall apply to course work as to other issues.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): The whole House will be grateful to Mr. Tomlinson and his colleagues for their work. Does my right hon. Friend accept that a forlorn quest at 16 and 17 to achieve perhaps a D or an E at A-level never was part of any true gold standard? Does he not have some concern that a highly elaborate contrivance to certify within a single system basic numeracy and literacy, vocational skills and advanced conceptual ability may turn out to be fool's gold?

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that it is fool's gold, with very great respect to my right hon. Friend. The fact is that there are too many criticisms of the quality of the core skills of those entering employment and those going to university. Even if some of it is saloon bar comment, however, too much of it has some substance for me to be able to ignore it as I reflect on what changes should be made. That is why I believe that it is right to establish a proper core of skills that individuals should have as they leave school and either go to university or into employment. Is that fool's gold? I see no reason why it needs to be. There is no reason to assume that many more young people than now will not achieve the basic skills in literacy, numeracy and IT that are necessary to equip them for life. It is a reasonable ambition for a Government to seek to make that happen.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): We will all need some time to digest what Mr. Tomlinson has said, but I wish to express two general hopes to the Secretary of State. The first is that if we are going to endure the disruption of replacing one exam system with another—or developing the exam system in the way that is envisaged—we should put in place something that will last a generation. That means that it must have the support of schools, teachers, parents, employers, universities and as wide a range of political opinion as possible. Secondly, I hope that we end up at A-level with a genuine objective assessment of people's suitability for university education. It is widely accepted that the current A-level does not do that, but it is equally unacceptable that it should be adjusted in some subjective way to try to decide who is qualified for a university education. If the A-level that results from this process provides that genuine objective assessment, it will be a huge advance.

Mr. Clarke: I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman's first point. That is why I have approached the issue as I have done so far. I am also grateful to Conservative and Liberal Democrat Front Benchers who have participated in serious discussion with us on these questions. It would be extremely undesirable if we were to set off on some ideological bean feast, and I am well aware that consensus is important. I also agree that it is important to ensure that A-levels are fit for purpose in terms of determining university admission. It will require several reforms to A-levels, as Mike Tomlinson has set out, including the extended essay and the possible greater differentiation between awards at different levels. However, I cannot accept the proposal from the Leader of the Opposition that the quality of somebody's achievement at A-level is seen as irrelevant and that what is important is whether one comes in the top 5 per cent. of the cohort. The Leader of the Opposition is wrong, but the hon. Gentleman is right to say that we must aim for standards and quality at A-level to ensure that universities can choose those who will most benefit.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): I very much welcome the Tomlinson report, but I wish to draw my right hon. Friend's attention to one small element of it that causes a little concern, which is the greater use of mixed-age classes. That can be a great help because some have the opportunity to take exams early, but much international research suggests that if the age range is too wide it can cause personal and emotional development problems for the youngest and the oldest in the group. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take that into consideration before the White Paper is produced in the new year.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, but it is a question of horses for courses. It is, for example, possible to imagine learning a modern foreign language with people of a slightly wider range of ability working together, although one would not do that more generally across the curriculum for the emotional and developmental reasons that my hon. Friend mentions. I take his point seriously and will look into it carefully as we decide how to move from where we are now to the White Paper.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), I welcome the proposals that we think are in the Tomlinson report—I have not read it yet. Can the Secretary of State reassure me that my grandchildren, many of whom are just starting their school careers, will not be taught for the next 10 years by confused and muddled teachers who do not know what the new system involves?

Mr. Clarke: That is a rather unfair attack on the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). Confused and muddled is Liberal Democrat and teachers are teachers, and there we have both in Harrogate.

Mr. Willis: That is unfair.

Mr. Clarke: It is grossly unfair, indeed.

I accept that we need to increase the quality of teaching significantly. A central element of that is continuous professional development, and that is especially true in a climate in which we move to a greater parity between academic and vocational qualifications. I also accept that any process of reform, such as that set out by Mike Tomlinson today, must be slow, stable and mature, instead of being imposed by diktat at some given point. That is why I have been keen to operate on the basis of consensus and of clear signposts. I hope that the White Paper sets out the way in which we intend to do that to the hon. Lady's satisfaction.
